THE UNIVERSAL ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

A

AA, a-a, is probably derived either from the Celtic Ach or the Teutonic Aha, signifying water. Hence, there are several rivers of that name in France, Holland, Russia, Germany, and Switzerland, as many as forty having been enumerated, some very insignificant. The more important are— 1. A river of Belgium, in the province of Antwerp, which falls into the Neethe. 2. A river of Holland, in Groningen, of the name of Westerwolder Aa Overyssel, which falls into the Dollart. 3. Another in North Brabant, which, after passing Helmont, joins the Dommel at Bois-le-Duc. 4. Another in Overyssel, which, after uniting its waters with the Vecht, flows into the Zuyder Zee. 5. Another in Brabant, near Buda. 6. Another in Jutland. 7. A river of Russia in Europe, in the province of Livonia, which flows from E. to S.W., into the Bay of Riga. 8. Another in Courland, which flows into the Dwina, near Riga. 9. A river of Switzerland, in the canton of Aargau, which carries the waters of the Hallyler Sea into the Aar. 10. Another which carries the waters of the Lake of Sarnen, canton Underwalden, into the Lake of Lucerne. 11. Another which drains the valley of Egleberg, in Underwalden, and falls into a bay near the middle of the south side of the Lake of Lucerne. 12. A river of Hanover, which flows into the Ems, in the province of Lingen. 13 A river of France, rising in the department of Le Nord, becoming navigable for barges at St. Omer, and, after pursuing a course of forty miles, falling into the sea at Gravelines.

AA, GERARD VAN DER, a-a. This individual, and his two sons, Philip and Adolphus, have acquired honourable historical notice in the annals of the United Provinces, from the strenuous efforts they made to resist Philip II. of Spain in his endeavours to tyrannize over their country, as well as from the distinguished part they took in its liberation, 1571.

AA, PETER VAN DER, an eminent lawyer known as Petrus Vanderanus, who, in 1574, became president of the High Court of Justice of Luxembourg.

Killed in a quarrel between the French and the Gascons, 1004.

ABBOT, CHARLES. (See COLCHESTER, Lord.)

ABBOT, GEORGE, ăb'-bot, an English prelate, whose father was a weaver. After receiving a succession of preferments, he was appointed one of the divines to translate the present version of the Bible. In 1609 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whence, the same year, he was translated to London, and in 1610 to Canterbury. About the close of his life he, by accident, shot to death a keeper of the deer of Lord Zouch, whilst engaged in the exercise of hunting. This calamitous event clouded the remainder of his life. He ever after kept a monthly fast on account of the misfortune, and settled 20*l.* a year on the widow of the keeper. He attended King James on his death-bed, and assisted at the coronation of Charles I., whose favour he subsequently lost, for refusing to license an objectionable sermon preached by Dr. Sibthorpe.

Born at Guildford, 1562; died at Croydon, 1633.

ABBOT, GEORGE, theologian and scholar, known as "The Puritan," son or grandson of Sir Thomas Abbot, of Easington, Yorkshire. Member of the Long Parliament for Tamworth, and distinguished himself as a soldier in the civil war. Wrote treatises on the Book of Job, the Sabbath, and the Book of Psalms.

Born at Easington, 1604; died 1648.

The church of St. Lawrence, an old building, containing many fine monuments, was restored in 1867. It has extensive paper-mills. Pop. 2,638.

ABBOTT, CHARLES. (See TENTERDEN, Lord.)

ABB'S HEAD, St., ab's hed, a promontory or headland in Berwickshire, Scotland. It is the southern extremity of the Frith of Forth. Lat. 55° 55′ N. Lon. 1° 56′ W.

ABBT, THOMAS, abt, a German writer, whose precocity of talent enabled him to produce, at the age of 13, a work deemed of great ability, and entitled "Historia Vitæ Magistra." He subsequently attracted the notice of Prince Schaumberg-Lippe, by whom he was held in high estimation, and liberally patronised.

Born at Ulm, in Suabia, 1738; died 1766.

ABCASSIA, ăb-kăsh'-e-a, or ABASSIA, a subdivision of Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey, being the most northern part of that province. The inhabitants live in mean, low huts, and go almost naked. Each person has an idea that his neighbour is his enemy; and if, by any stratagem, he can catch him, sells him for a slave to the first Turk, Persian, or Tartar, that appears in the country. Lat. 43° to 45° N. Lon. 39° to 43° E.

ABCOUDE, ăb'-kood, a village about 9 miles distant from Amsterdam, on the road to Utrecht.

ABDA, a province of Morocco, on the Atlantic coast. Some parts of the interior are said to be fertile.

ABDALLA, ăb-dăl-la, father of Mahomet. He was only a camel-driver; but the Mussulmans, having nothing better to boast of concerning him, declare that he was offered the finest women of his tribe when he was fourscore years old, and that on his wedding night, a hundred girls died of grief, for having lost the honour of being his bride.

ABDALLAH-EBN-ALI, ăb-dăl'-la-en-ăli, uncle of the two first caliphs of the Abbasides, under whom he served as a general against the caliph Merwan, whom he vanquished, and proclaimed his nephew in his stead. He was guilty of horrible cruelties on the family of the Ommiades, the name of the rival family of caliphs. When his eldest nephew died, his brother Almanzor assumed the government, which so displeased Abdallah, that he raised an army against him, but was defeated. Put to death, 754.

ABDALLAH-EBN-ZOBIER, ăb-dăl'-la-en-zo-beer, an Arabian chief, who seized the caliphate in 680, notwithstanding the claim of Yezid, and enjoyed the dignity nine years. Fell fighting in the defence of Mecca, in his 72nd year.

ABDALLATIF, ăb-dăl-lat'-tif, a distinguished Arabic writer, who produced an admirable history of Egypt.

Born at Bagdad, 1161; died 1231.

ABDALMALEK, ăb-dăl'-mă-lek, fifth caliph of the race of the Ommiades. His reign was very successful; and on account of his great avarice, he was named the peeler of stone. The vulgar saying of skinning a flint is supposed to be derived from this circumstance. He reigned twenty-one years, at the close of the 7th and beginning of the 8th centuries

ABDALONYMUS, ăb-da-lon'-i-mus, king of Sidon, who, though only a gardener, was of the blood royal, and received the crown under the following circumstances:—When Alexander conquered that country, he allowed Hephæstion to dispose of the crown. Hephæstion offered it to three brothers, who all refused it; but being requested to point out a proper person, they fixed on Abdalonymus. Being brought to Alexander, the conqueror observed the dignity of his aspect, and said to his courtiers, "I wish to know how he bore his poverty." Abdalonymus, hearing this, said, "Would to heaven I may bear my prosperity as well!" This answer so pleased Alexander that he confirmed the appointment.

ABDALRAHMAN, ăb-dăl-ra'-măn, a Saracen general, and governor of Spain, who, after ravaging France with fire and sword, was vanquished at Tours by Charles Martel. Slain at Tours, 732.

ABDALRAHMAN, surnamed the Just, one of the family of the Ommiades, who went to Spain in 756, where he commanded the Saracens against their king, Joseph. Abdalrahman slew that prince, and was then acknowledged caliph. He also assumed the title of king of Cordova.

Died 790.

ABDAS, ăb-dăs, a Persian bishop in the time of the younger Theodosius, who brought upon the Christians a violent persecution, and was the first to fall in it. The clergy called in Theodosius, by whom the Persians were worsted; but the persecution raged forty years.

ABD-EL-KADER, ab-del-kaï'-der, or ka'-der, the third son of a marabout of the Arab tribe of Hashem, who had risen to influence through his rank, coupled with a great sanctity of demeanour. The early days of Abd-el-Kader are lost in obscurity, but by 1828 he had not only acquired the reputation of a scholar, but that of hadji, from his having twice made a pilgrimage to Mecca, the birthplace of the Prophet. In England, however, he is best known by the persevering courage with which he opposed the aggressions of the French upon his country. In 1831 he was chosen emir, and he preached a holy war, and called upon the faithful to rise and expel the infidels. In 1832, he found himself at the head of 10,000 warriors, with whom he attacked Oran, or Warrun, but who were several times repulsed with great slaughter. Notwithstanding his discomfiture, however, he might be said to be a gainer, for he had not only increased his reputation for skill and bravery, but had taught his Arabs to face artillery—an act from which they had hitherto recoiled. In 1834, he entered into a treaty with the French, in which he was recognised as emir of Mascara, with the sovereignty of Oran, and a monopoly of commerce with the interior granted him. This treaty added to the importance of the emir in the eyes of the natives, who naturally looked upon their chief as a personage of high consequence, from his having compelled the enemy to recognise him as a sovereign. His success, however, excited the jealousy and envy of some of his brothers in arms, who rose against his authority, but whom he was soon enabled to subdue. For a period of fifteen years he contrived to defend his country, and fight against the encroachments of France, but in 1847 he was compelled to surrender himself a prisoner to General Lamoricière, on condition of being sent to Alexandria or St. Jean-d'Acre. The French government, however, refused to ratify the terms of the treaty, and Abd-el-Kader was consigned a prisoner to the works of Fort Lamalogue, at Toulon. After suffering imprisonment for four years, in 1852 Louis Napoleon restored him to freedom, on condition that he would not return to Algiers, or conspire against the French. The brave, but fallen Arab consented. He afterwards lived at Broussa, in Asia Minor, Constantinople, and Damascus. When, in 1860, the Druses of Lebanon massacred the Maronites, he greatly exerted himself to protect the latter. He visited Paris to see the Exposition, and again in 1867, at which time he made a short visit to England.

Born in the neighbourhood of Mascara, province of Oran, 1807; died 1883.

ABDERA, ab-dé'-ra, a Greek town on the south coast of Thrace. Founded B.C. 656, and grew to be a place of considerable importance. The exact site is now unknown. Birthplace of Democritus, Protagoras, and Anaxarchus.

ABDERUS, ab-dé'-rus, arm-bearer to Hercules, and torn to pieces by the horses of Diomedes, which the hero intrusted to his care when going to war with the Bistones.

ABDIAS, ab'-dé-as, of Babylon, a pretender to be one of the seventy-two disciples sent out by Jesus Christ, and to have been appointed by Simon and Jude the first bishop of Babylon. He is the author of a legend entitled "Historia Certaminis Apostolici," printed at Basil, 1571.

ABDIE, ăb-dé, a parish in the county of Fife, Scotland, in which the battle of Blackearnside was fought in the time of Wallace, between the Scots and English. Pop. 1,500.

ABDOLMUMEM, ab-dol'-mu-mem, or ABDALMON, though the son of a potter, became a general, and at last a monarch, by the style of Emir al Mumenin (head of the true believers). He took Morocco, and destroyed the whole of the Almoravide family.

Died 1156.

ABDUL-AZIZ, sultan of Turkey, succeeded his brother Abdul-Mejid, June 25, 1861. He at once set about effecting reforms, and confirmed the liberal edicts of his brother. He gave great attention to the formation of an effective army and navy, but the general official corruption throughout the empire greatly hindered his efforts. In 1863, he visited Egypt. This was considered a great departure from royal precedent; but in 1867 he visited Paris and London, receiving at each place a magnificent reception. In 1869, the Prince and Princess of Wales visited Constantinople, and the Sultan gave a grand ball, another innovation. In consequence of the troubles caused by the Russian war, he was deposed in May, 1876, and committed suicide a few days afterwards.

Born, 1830; died, 1876.

ABDUL-MEJID, ab-dul-med'-jid, sultan of Turkey, succeeded his father, Mahmoud II., on the 1st July, 1839. Like most of the sons of sultans, he was brought up in the harem, and although his father had desired that he should receive an English education, that sovereign was compelled to resign his wishes, and yield to the power of a Mahometan priesthood, who revolted against such an innovation upon the established usages of their country. When he ascended the throne, Turkey was in a very precarious condition. The minds of its people were unsettled by the reforms of his father, whose resolute will was sufficient to keep in check the spirit of open rebellion, but whose demise now seemed to have opened a road for a return to the old system of things. The revolt of Mehemet Ali, of Egypt, was checked by the interference of the principal European powers, and the ancient dynasty was saved. The dangers from assassination which beset the first few years of the sultan's reign were happily averted, and Abdul-Mejid gradually rose in popular estimation, until he came to be regarded, not only with respect, but with affection by his people. Revolts in different parts of his dominions were suppressed, and the strong desire he always evinced to improve the condition of his subjects, has been testified to by English statesmen, eminent themselves in the annals of social reform. He decreed that the professors of all religion should be deemed equal in the eye of the law. It had long been considered a design of the emperors of Russia to appropriate as much as possible of Turkey on the north side of the Bosphorus, and the time seemed to have arrived when an attempt should be made to effect the long-coveted object. Accordingly, in 1853, the emperor Nicholas availed himself of a slight dispute which had arisen about the guardianship of the "Holy Places," to advance his claim to the protectorship of the Greek Christians in Turkey. This was refused by the sultan, and the Russian war was the result. The firmness with which he preserved his position throughout this trying period procured for him universal sympathy, and the consequence was, that France and England united with Turkey in repelling the pretensions of Russia. The war was prosecuted with vigour until 1855, when the allies were joined by a contingent from Sardinia. In the same year Sebastopol fell, and peace was concluded shortly afterwards. In 1850, he refused to surrender Kossuth and other Hungarian refugees, after the revolution of 1848; and throughout the Russian war his conduct was marked by many traits which could not fail to give additional lustre to his character in the eyes of his subjects, whilst in those of his allies, they raised his reputation both as a man and a sovereign.

Born 1823; died 1861.

A'BECKET. (See BECKET.)

A'BECKETT, GILBERT ABBOTT, author. Educated at Westminster School, and studied for the bar; magistrate of a London Police Court, 1849, Contributor to Punch, author of Comic Histories of England and Rome.

Born in London, 1811; died 1856.

ABEDNEGO, ai-bed'-ne-go, signifying the "servant of light," the Chaldee name conferred by the king of Babylon's officer upon Azariah, one of the three companions of Daniel.

ABEGG, JULES FREDERIC HENRY, a-begg', an eminent German jurist, and author of several valuable works on penal law.

Born at Erlangen, 1796.

ABEILLE, GASPARD, a'-bail, a native of Reiz in Provence, who went to Paris when very young and became secretary to the Marshal de Luxembourg. Known as a writer of odes, epistles, and some dramatic pieces.

Born in Provence, 1648; died at Paris in 1718.

ABEILLE, SCIPIO, brother of the above, surgeon-major in the army, and author of "The Complete Army Surgeon," and a "History of the Bones."

Died in 1697.

ABEL, ai'-bel, signifying "mourning," the second son of our first parents. He was murdered by his brother Cain, from envy, because Abel's offering was accepted and Cain's rejected.

ABEL DE PUJOL, ALEXANDRE DENIS, French painter. Was employed to paint ceilings at the Louvre, altar pieces, and other large works.

Born at Valenciennes, 1785; died at Paris, 1861.

ABEL, FREDERICK, an eminent modern chemist. Author of papers on explosive materials, and inventor of the Abel fuze.

Born 1828.

ABEL, FREDERIC GOTTFRIED, a German physician and poet, but bred a divine. Not obtaining the preferment he expected, he turned his attention to physic, in which he took his doctor's degree at Konigsberg, and practised at Halberstadt with great reputation. He published a German translation of Juvenal in 1788.

Born at Halberstadt, 1714; died 1794.

ABEL, king of Denmark, the son of Valdimir II. He assassinated his brother Eric, in 1250, and took possession of his throne. He was put to death by the Frisians, who revolted against him on account of the heavy taxes imposed upon them.

Died 1252.

ABEL, KARL FRIEDRICH, an eminent musician, pupil of Sebastian Bach. He was a member of the royal band at Dresden, but, removing to England, was appointed chamber-musician to Queen Charlotte. He was a tasteful and melodious composer. His death was hastened by intemperance.

Born in Germany, 1725; died 1787.

ABEL, Dr. CLARKE, medical officer and historian of Lord Amherst's embassy to China. He was an accomplished naturalist, a close observer of nature, and a profound thinker, besides being characterized by a highly philanthropic mind.

Born 1780; died 1826.

ABEL, NIELS HENDRICH, mathematician, a native of Findöe, Norway, studied at the University of Christiania, and was one of the first contributors to the famous "Crelle's Journal," a publication devoted to mathematics. As a mathematician, he ranks deservedly high, and the Swedish government undertook the publication of his works. He died from consumption at the early age of 27.

Born 1802; died 1829.

ABEL, THOMAS, divine. Educated at Oxford; rector of Bradwell, Essex, 1530. His reputation for learning and musical accomplishments introduced him to Queen Catherine, to whom he became domestic chaplain. He defended her against the charge brought by Henry VIII., and his book "Invicta Veritas" was written on her behalf. Having opposed the King's claim to supremacy in the Church, he was tried and condemned for misprision of treason, and executed as a traitor at Smithfield.

ABELA, GIOVANNE FRANCESCO, ab'-e-la, commander of the order of Malta, and author of a work entitled "Malta Illustrata," 1647, a description of that island and its antiquities.

Died 1655.

ABELARD, PETER, ab-e'-lard, or ab'-ai-lard. A celebrated logician, mathematician, and divine, who has become memorable in biographical annals, from the romantic loves which existed between him and a young damsel named Heloise. This girl was the niece of a wealthy canon, named Fulbert, who desired that Abelard should instruct her in philosophy; but instead of leading her through the intricate paths of learning, he taught her to love, and he himself became so intoxicated with this passion, that his lectures, which had attracted admiring crowds, lost their charm, and Fulbert, perceiving the cause, turned him from his house. Heloise followed him, and he conveyed her to his sister's, in Brittany, where she gave birth to a son, whom she called Astrolabius. Abelard now proposed to Fulbert to marry Heloise, and although he accepted the offer, the lady herself rejected it. She afterwards, indeed, consented to a private marriage, but never would own it, and did not scruple sometimes to swear that it was not true. This increased greatly the rage of Fulbert; and Abelard sent her, in consequence, to the monastery of Argenteuil, where she put on the religious habit, but did not take the veil. Fulbert now caused Abelard to be cruelly mutilated by ruffians, when he became a monk in the abbey of St. Denis, which he soon left, and retired to Champaigne, where he, once more, became a successful lecturer. His fame procured him numerous enemies, especially the monks of St. Denis, whose dissolute habits he had reproved, who charged him with heterodoxy on the subject of the Trinity, and he was censured at the council of Soissons, in 1121. Subsequently he erected an oratory in the diocese of Troyes, called the Paraclete, "the comforter," but was soon driven from it, and next became abbot of Ruis, in the diocese of Vannes, and gave Heloise and some other nuns the Paraclete. After a life of many vicissitudes, Abelard died. Heloise lived many years after him. His body being sent to her after his death, she deposited it in the Paraclete. Pope, in his epistles, and other poets, have immortalised the names of these unfortunate lovers. An elegant Gothic monument to their memory, built of the ruins of the abbey of the Paraclete, is one of the most interesting objects in the cemetery of Pere-la-Chaise, Paris. The principal works of Abelard are composed in Latin, and consist of, "An Address to the Paraclete on the Study of the Scriptures," "Sermons and Festivals," &c. He was the most learned disputant and boldest thinker of the 12th century.

Born at Palais, near Nantz, 1079; died in the priory of St. Marcellus, 1142.

ABELL, JOHN, ā'-bell, an English musician, celebrated as a singer and as a player on the lute. Although he amassed considerable sums, his improvidence frequently reduced him to painful necessities. Travelling on one occasion on the continent, he arrived at Warsaw, when he was sent for by the king of Poland to come to court. Abell, however, refused to comply, when peremptory orders were given to compel his attendance. On his arrival he was seated in a chair in a spacious hall, and drawn up by machinery to a great height, when the king and his train appeared in a gallery opposite to him. Several wild bears were then turned into the hall, and the king told him to take his choice, either to sing or be let down among the bears. Abell preferred the former alternative, and used to say that he never sang so well in his life. The year of his death is unknown, but in 1701 he published a collection of songs in several languages.

ABELLA, ă-bel'-a, anciently a town of Campania, near the river Clanius; now Avello, in Naples.

ABELLI, LOUIS, ab'-el-le, a French prelate, who wrote "Medulla Theologica." He obtained the bishopric of Rhodes in 1664, but resigned it three years afterwards, and retired to St. Lazare.

Born at Vexin, 1603; died at St. Lazare, 1691.

ABEN ESRA, ai-ben, a Jewish scholar, who passed a considerable portion of his life in travelling in various countries, and who is best known to us by his commentary on the Old Testament, which he would seem to have written in the Hebrew language, between 1140 and 1167. He also wrote on astronomy, philosophy, mathematics, medicine, philology, and astrology. He was known as the Wise, the Good, and Admirable Doctor.

Born at Toledo, 1119; died at Rhodes, 1174.

ABENAS, ab'-e-na, a town of Languedoc, in France, at the foot of the Cevennes. Lat. 44° 37′ N. Lon. 4° 20′ E.

ABENDANA, ab-en-da'-na, a Spanish Jew, and prefect of a synagogue in London. He wrote a Hebrew commentary on several passages of Scripture, which appeared at Amsterdam in the same year that he died.

ABENGNEFIL, ăb'-en-ne'-fil, an Arabian physician of the 12th century. Author of a book, the translation of which, entitled "De Virtutibus Medicinarum et Ciborum," was printed at Venice in 1581, folio.

ABEN-MELEC, ăb'-en-me'-lek, a Jewish rabbi. Author of a Hebrew commentary on the Bible, entitled "The Perfection of Beauty," Amsterdam, 1661, folio.

ABENOW, ăb'-e-now, a mountain in Suabia, in Germany, 23 miles from Friburg, famous for the source of the Danube, and for giving name to a long chain of mountains.

ABENRADE, ăb'-en-rad, or APENRADE, the principal town of a district of the same name in the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark. Lat. 54° 52′ N. Lon. 10° 7′ E.

ABENSBERG, ăb'-ens-berg, a town of Bavaria, on the river Abense. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 1,200. Here the Austrians were defeated by Napoleon I., in April, 1809.

ABENSE, ăb'-ens, a river in Bavaria.

ABEOKUTAH, ăb'-eokutah, a large town in Africa, about 50 miles inland from Lagos, in the Bight of Benin, on the river Ogun. The population numbers about 150,000. It is the chief town of a small state of the same name. Lat. 7° 8′ N. Lon. 3° 20′ E.

ABER, ăb'-er, an old British word, which signifies the fall of a smaller into a larger water; also the mouth of a river, whence some places derive a characteristic in their names; as, Aber-conway, Aber-gavenny, &c.

ABERAYRON, or ABERAERON, ăb'-er-air'-on, a market and seaport town of Wales, at the mouth of the Ayron, 13 miles from Aberystwith. Ship-building is carried on, and the town is much frequented as a watering-place. Anciently there stood here the castle of Cadwgan, of which some traces still remain. Exp. Lead ore, oats, and butter. Imp. Coal and limestone. Pop. about 900.

ABERAVON, ăb'-er-ai'-von, a town of Glamorganshire, Wales, at the mouth of the river Avon, in Swansea Bay. It imports ore from Cornwall, and exports coal, copper, and tin. Pop. parish and borough, 6,100.

ABERBROTHOCK. (See ARBROATH.)

ABERCONWAY. (See CONWAY.)

ABERCORN, ăb'-er-korn, a parish of Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, Scotland, 5 miles N.E. of Linlithgow. Pop. 980.

ABERCORN, a small town of Georgia, N. America, about 13 miles N.W. of Savannah.

ABERCROMBIE, JOHN, M.D., ăb-er-krom-be, an eminent Scottish physician, son of a minister of Aberdeen. Author of many medical treatises, and of works on "The Intellectual Powers," and "Philosophy of the Moral Feelings;" Lord Rector of Marischal College, 1835.

Born at Aberdeen, 1781; died at Edinburgh, 1844.

ABERCROMBIE, Sir Ralph, a British general, descended from an ancient family in Scotland. Intended for the bar, he studied at Edinburgh and Leipsic, but preferred a military life. The first commission of Sir Ralph was a cornetcy in the Dragoon Guards. In 1793 he was employed under the Duke of York in the enterprise against Holland, where it was confessed, even by the enemy, that his abilities were of the most brilliant order. In 1795, made knight of the Bath, and commander-in-chief of a very successful expedition to the West Indies; afterwards commander-in-chief in Ireland and Scotland. It being resolved to send an army to dispossess the French of Egypt, Sir Ralph was appointed to the command of the expedition. He landed at the head of his troops, March 8th, 1801, and defeated the French at Aboukir. On the 21st of the same month was fought, near Alexandria, a memorable battle, in which the English were again the victors, but in which their general was wounded. This took place early in the action, but he concealed the circumstance from his troops until some time after the battle was over. It was then found to be too late for surgical skill to be of any avail to him. He was immediately conveyed to the ship of the admiral, Lord Keith, where he lingered till the 28th, when he expired. His body was conveyed to Malta, and buried under the ramparts of St. Elmo, near the town of Valetta. A monument to his memory is to be seen in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Born at Menstrie, Clackmannanshire, 1734; died 1801.

Born at Forfar, 1656; died 1726.

ABERDARE, ăb'-er-dair, a market town and parish in Glamorganshire, on the Cynon, 4 miles from Merthyr. It has coal and iron mines. There are several fine churches and chapels, three banks, and other public buildings, and a People's Park. A large quantity of coal is sent to Cardiff for export. Aberdare forms a portion of the Parliamentary borough of Merthyr Tydvil. Station on the Taff Vale Extension of the Great Western Railway. Pop. 33,796.

ABERDEEN, ăb'-er-deen, the capital of Aberdeenshire, the chief city and seaport of the north of Scotland, is formed of the Old and New towns. The former is about a mile N. of the latter. The city is situate on the Dee, where it falls into the North Sea. It has a university, to which belong two colleges, King's, in the Old Town, and Marischal, in the New. The New Town is regularly built of granite, with wide and spacious streets, remarkable for their beauty and cleanliness. The principal street, Union Street, is a mile long and very wide, crossing the Dee Burn by a granite bridge of a single arch 132 feet in span. The Dee is crossed by three bridges: the old bridge of Dee, built in the 16th century, but since partially rebuilt; an iron suspension bridge, and the Caledonian Railway bridge. The Don, to the north of the city, is crossed by a granite bridge of five arches, each 75 feet span, completed in 1832. The Music Hall (opened by the Prince Consort in 1859), the Trade Hall, the Corn Exchange, the Grammar School, the New Town and County Hall (with a tower 190 feet high), the episcopal church of St. Mary, the Roman Catholic church and convent, and the other public buildings, are very fine. There are more than 60 places of public worship. The market-place was burned down in 1882. There are statues of the Queen and Prince Consort and the Duke of Gordon. The town is supplied with water by a fine system of works opened by the Queen in 1866. The Victoria dock, of 25 acres, was opened by the Queen in 1848. A granite pier of 2,000 feet in length, and a breakwater, render the harbour one of the safest in this part of Scotland. Girdleness Lighthouse, with two lights, stands at its entrance. Station on the Caledonian, Great North of Scotland, and North British railways.

Manufactures.—Woollen, cotton, and linen goods, carpets, rope, machinery, combs, soap, and sailcloth, with large iron-foundries, machine works, paper mills, distilleries, and breweries. Ship-building is extensively carried on,—Aberdeen clippers being famous for speed. There are large docks. It does, also, a large trade in exporting granite, cattle, and salmon. Its exports are estimated at from 1,500,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.* annually.

Population.—Parliamentary borough, 105,003. Lat. 57° 8′-9″ N. Lon. 2° 5′ 7″ W.

History.—Founded in the 3rd century, established as a royal burgh, 1179; burnt by English, 1336. University founded, 1494; Marischal College founded by Earl Marischal Keith, 1593; rebuilt, 1837; episcopal see early in 12th century till revolution of 1689; reinstituted, 1721; universities and colleges united, 1868.

ABERDEENSHIRE, a maritime county of Scotland, containing the districts of Mar, Garioch, Strathbogie, Formartin, and Buchan. It occupies the central portion of an extensive promontory running out into the North Sea, between the friths of Tay and Moray. Area, 1,970 square miles, being the fifth in size of the Scotch counties. Desc. Generally hilly and mountainous in the south-west, where are some of the highest peaks of the Grampians. There is much excellent pasture in the high parts; and the level tract, Strathbogie, contains many well-cultivated fields. Its principal rivers are the Dee, the Don, the Ythan, the Ugie, and the Doveron, with their respective tributaries. Some parts of the country are almost covered with wood, the natural consisting of alder, poplar, birch, and mountain-ash; and the planted, chiefly of Scotch firs and larch. The fir timber of the forest of Mar, for quality and size, stands highest in the British isles. The Queen's Highland residence, Balmoral, is in this county. The fisheries are very productive. Pop. 267,999.

ABERDEEN, Earl of, George Hamilton Gordon, succeeded to the title on the death of his grandfather in 1802, and in 1814 was created Viscount Gordon, in the right of which he sat in the House of Lords. On account of his former classic researches into antiquarian remains, he was pronounced in Lord Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," "the travell'd Thane, Athenian Aberdeen." In 1813 he was sent on a special mission to Vienna, and was the means of bringing over Austria to the alliance against France. Subsequently he was recognized as a staunch adherent of the Tory party, and accepted, under the first administration of the Duke of Wellington, in 1828, the office of Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which he retained till the ministry resigned, in 1830. Whilst in office he assisted in establishing the independence of Greece. He modified his extreme Tory opinions, and supported the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act and the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. Under the brief administration of Sir Robert Peel (1834-5), he was Colonial Secretary, and on the restoration to power of that statesman, in 1841, he once more became Foreign Secretary, which office he held until the ministry fell, in 1846. On the death of Sir Robert, whose Free Trade policy he supported, the Earl of Aberdeen was considered to be the virtual representative of what was known as the Peel party, and on the fall of the Derby ministry, in 1852, he was empowered to form a new administration. This he effected, and it is well known with what steadiness of purpose he endeavoured to prevent the country from entering upon the conflict with Russia. All these efforts, however, were unavailing, and war was declared. Under the remainder of his administration the public believed that the war was not conducted with that degree of vigour necessary to insure favourable results. Failing to receive sufficient support to enable him to carry out his measures, he early resigned in 1855. As an author, he is known by a work entitled, "An Inquiry into the Principles of Beauty in Grecian Architecture," embodying the results of his antiquarian researches in Greece.

Born at Edinburgh, 1784; died 1860.

The mountain Cairngorm rises in its parish. Pop. of parish, 1,928.

ABERNETHY, a town of Perthshire on the Tay, said to be formerly the residence of the kings of the Picts. A station on the North British railway. Pop. of parish, 2,000.

ABERNETHY, JOHN, F.R.S., a surgeon of distinguished practice and reputation. In 1787 he was appointed assistant-surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and, shortly afterwards, lecturer on surgery and anatomy. On the decease of Sir Charles Blick, his former instructor, Abernethy was elected master surgeon, when St. Bartholomew's Hospital began to increase in reputation, and soon acquired a degree of celebrity far beyond anything it had hitherto attained. In 1814, he was appointed Professor of Anatomy and Surgery to the College of Surgeons. He was the first to enunciate and establish the great principle "that local diseases are symptoms of a disordered constitution, not primary and independent maladies, and that they are to be cured by remedies calculated to make a salutary impression on the general frame, not by topical dressing, nor any mere manipulations of surgery." To this he added a second, namely, "that this disordered state of the constitution either originates from, or is rigorously allied to, derangements of the stomach and bowels, and that it can only be reached by remedies which first exercise a curative influence upon these organs." He was remarkable for a rough and irritable manner when speaking to his patients, and many amusing stories are told of him; but in private life the character of this eminent man was as spotless as was his public life.

Born in London, 1764; died at Enfield, 1831.

ABERYSTWITH, ăb'-er-ist'-with, a town and seaport of Cardiganshire, seated on the river Rheidol, near its confluence with the Istwith, and where they both fall into the sea. This is an excellent harbour, and the shipping trade is considerable. Its principal trade is in lead, fish, oak-bark, flannel, corn, and butter. It is a fashionable watering-place, and has a magnificent hotel. Station on the Great Western Railway. Pop. 6,664.

for his exposition of their law, but persecuted for denying predestination. Born at Coufa, A.D. 699; died in prison, at Bagdad.—A caliph, who reigned 385 years after the death of this learned man, erected a mausoleum to his memory, and founded a college for his followers.

ABOU-JOSEPH, ă-boo-jo-sef, a Mussulman doctor, who was the first that had the title of Kadhi al kodhat, or judge of the judges. He lived in the caliphate of Haroun-al-Raschid.

ABOUKIR, ă'-boo-kēr', the ancient Canopus, a small town of Egypt, with a castle, situate about 13 miles N.E. of Alexandria, where Sir Ralph Abercrombie disembarked his troops for the invasion of Egypt, on March 8th, 1801.—Also a small island near the town, and a bay, formed on its west side. In it was fought the famous battle of the Nile, by Lord Nelson, on August 1st, 1798. The French fleet formed a curve as near as possible to the small island; but Nelson, with half his force, broke through their line, and with the other half attacked them in front; so that on both sides the enemy was assailed. The French admiral, Brueys, was killed, and at about ten o'clock, his ship, L'Orient, 120 guns, blew up. Of 1,000 men, only 70 or 80 were saved. By the morning the fleet was entirely defeated, only two ships of the line and two frigates escaping to Malta and Corfu. Before this terrific conflict commenced, no fewer than thirteen ships of the line, fourteen frigates, and 400 transports, extending over six leagues of sea, were assembled, of the enemy, which mighty armada Nelson entirely annihilated in a few hours. On the shore, Napoleon, on July 25th, 1799, defeated the Turks with great slaughter. The town was taken by the English under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, 1801.

Falling into disgrace on the death of that monarch, he fled to Castille, where he was protected by Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1492 he was obliged to quit Spain, in consequence of an edict against the Jews. After some vicissitudes he went to Venice in 1503, and held the office of Minister of State until his death. He is author of a commentary on the Scriptures.
Born at Lisbon, 1437; died at Venice, 1508.

ABRAHAM, aï'-brā-ham', the patriarch, was at first called Abram, which was altered by divine appointment. His father, Terah, in his old age, went to reside at Haran, in Canaan, where Abram received a promise that he should be the father of a great nation; on which he, with his wife Sarah, and his nephew Lot, left Haran, and dwelt at Sichem. A famine drove them thence into Egypt, and on their return, a dispute having arisen between the servants of Abram and those of Lot, the two kinsmen were induced to part. Lot being taken prisoner by the prince of Elam, Abram armed his servants, and retook his nephew, with a great spoil. Having no prospect of a child by Sarah, he took Hagar, an Egyptian, by whom he had Ishmael; but at the age of ninety-nine, he received a promise that Sarah should have a son, and, in consequence, his name was changed to Abraham, which signifies "the father of a great multitude." At this time circumcision was instituted. Going afterwards to Gerar, Sarah was delivered of a son, named Isaac. When Isaac was grown to maturity, Abraham was commanded, as a trial of his faith, to offer him up as a sacrifice; but as he was about to obey the mandate, an angel stayed his hand, and provided a ram for a burnt-offering. After the death of Sarah, Abraham married Keturah, by whom he had six sons. The history of Abraham is contained in the book of Genesis.
Born at Ur, in Chaldea, A.M. 2004; died about A.M. 2179.

Born 842, or 846, at Yasem, near Damascus.

ABYDENUS, ăb-i-dē'-nus, a Greek historian, author of a history of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, some portions only of which are preserved. The date at which he wrote is uncertain.

ABYDOS, a town in Asia Minor, at the narrowest part of the Dardanelles, nearly opposite Sestas, in European Turkey. In its neighbourhood Xerxes, when he invaded Greece, crossed with his immense army the Hellespont, on a bridge of boats. Memorable also from being the scene of the loves of Hero and Leander, and from Byron having adopted its name in his "Bride of Abydos."

ABYDOS, an ancient city of Upper Egypt, some remains of which still exist, including the Memnon ruin and temple of Osiris, where in 1818 a remarkable tablet, containing a list of the early kings of Egypt, was found. It is supposed that Osiris was found here. The modern name of the place is Arabat-el-Matfoon. It is supposed to have been the ancient This, and to have been second only to Thebes. Lat. 26° 10′ N. Lon. 32° 3′ E.

ABYO, ăb'-e-o, one of the Philippine Islands, between Mindinao and Luzon. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 122° 15′ E.

ABYSSINIA, ăb'-is-sin'-ya, or HABESH, as it is named by the Arabians, an extensive country of Africa, first made known to Europe by the Portuguese missionaries. It is bounded on the N. by Nubia, E. by the Red Sea and Dancala, W. by Gorham, and S. by Gingia and Alaba. The country, which has an area of 200,000 square miles, may be described as a series of elevated tablelands divided by two mountain tracts of great extent, into a southern and western region, and a north-eastern. These table-lands have an elevation of from 7,000 to 10,000 feet, and in some part the mountain ranges, mostly of volcanic origin, rise to 15,000 feet above the sea level. The great plateaux are usually described by geographers as the Table-lands of Tigre (on the north-east), of Amhara, and of Shoa.

Rivers.—The Bahr-el-Azrek, or Blue Nile, and the Hawash are the principal.

Climate.—The rainy season continues from April to September, which is followed by a cloudless sky and a vertical sun. Cold nights again as suddenly succeed these scorching days; yet the earth keeps remarkably cool, partly owing to the six months' rain, when no sun appears, and partly to the perpetual equality of nights and days.

Animals.—There is no country in the world productive of a greater variety of quadrupeds; but there are no tigers. The hyenas, however, are very numerous, and dreadful in their ravages. Elephants and buffaloes are very numerous, and the double-horned rhinoceros is found. Besides these, giraffes, zebras, quaggas, and wild asses are plentiful. Boars, in some of the woods, are common, and the smaller animals, such as porcupines, ferrets, otters, polecats, rabbits, and squirrels abound. There are several species of the eagle and the vulture; and of insects the bee is so plentiful that their honey produce supersedes the necessity of importing sugar. Locusts frequently devastate the fields, and hippopotami abound in some of the larger rivers. To supply all these animals with food, in a wild state, the fertility of Abyssinia must be immense. The domestic animals consist of cattle, sheep, goats, asses, mules, and horses. The Sanga ox is found in Auteilo, with horns sometimes extending to the length of 4 feet.

Produce.—Corn of different kinds, dates, tamarinds, and coffee, which is indigenous, and on long journeys is frequently used as an article of food.

Political Divisions.—The kingdom of Tigré, in the north; Amhara, or Gondar, occupying the central region; and Shoa, farther south, beyond which are the Gallas, a savage, energetic race, with no regular form of government. The chief towns of Tigré are Antalo and Adowa; of Amhara, Gondar; and of Shoa, Ankabar.

Commerce.—Imp. Cotton, raw silk, metals, and leather. Exp. Slaves, gold, and ivory.

Religion.—A mixture of Christianity, Paganism, and Judaism. Population, 3,500,000.

Lat. between 8° 30′ and 15° 40′ N. Lon. between 35° and 42° E.

ACACIUS, ă-kaī'-se-us, a bishop of Amida, on the Tigris. Died in the 5th century. This bishop sold the plate of his church, and with the receipts ransomed 7,000 Persian slaves, and sent them to their king.

ACACIUS, surnamed MONOPHTHALMUS, from having lost an eye, was the disciple and successor of Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea. He was deposed by the council of Sardica, for heresy; on which he and some others assembled at Philippolis, and anathematized Athanasius and the rest of their adversaries. Acacius was concerned in banishing Pope Liberius, and settling Felix in the see of Rome. Was the founder of a sect called Acaciani, and wrote the "Life of Eusebius," and other works.

Died about 365.

ACACIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, who was excommunicated by Pope Felix III., and, in his turn, commanded the name of that pontiff to be struck out of the list of bishops who were to be mentioned in the public prayers.
Died 489.

ACACIUS, bishop of Berœa in Syria, who was the means of deposing St. Chrysostom, and also Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, respecting whom he wrote a vigorous letter when 110 years of age.
Born 322; died 432.

ACADEMUS, ă-ka-dē'-mus, or EGADEMUS, an Athenian, whose house was employed as a philosophical school in the time of Theseus. He had the honour of giving his name to a sect of philosophers, or rather three sects, called Academics. The old academy had Plato for its chief, the second Arcesilaus, and the last Carneades. No one was suffered to laugh in the academy at Athens, under the penalty of expulsion.

ACADIA, ă-kaĭ'-de-a (see NOVA SCOTIA), of which this is the original Indian name.—Here Longfellow has laid the scene of his beautiful poem "Evangeline."

ACADIA, a county in the district of Montreal, Canada. Manf. Linen, flannel, and cloth. Pop. 11,500.

ACAMBOU, ă-kăm-boo, a kingdom on the coast of Guinea, where the king is absolute.

ACANNY, ă-kăn'-ne, an inland country and town of Guinea, affording the best gold in great plenty.

ACANTHA, ă-kăn'-tha, a nymph loved by Apollo, and changed into the flower acanthus.

ACANTHUS, ai-kan'-thus, a city of Macedonia, near Mount Athos, colonised by Andrians. It is supposed to be the modern Erissus. Near it Xerxes cut a canal, about a mile and a half in length, and twenty-five yards in breadth, through which he conveyed his fleet into the Sinus Singiticus, without doubling the dangerous promontory of Athos.

ACANTHUS, a town of Egypt, near Memphis, the present Bisalta, or, according to D'Anville, Dashur, whither the waters of the Nile are conducted by a canal, and not far from which are the ruins of the temple of Osiris, and some pyramids.

ACAPONETA, ă-kă-po-ne'-ta, a town of Mexico.

ACAPULCO, ă-ka-pul'-ko, a city and the most important port of Mexico. The harbour is very commodious, and defended by a strong castle; but the town is mean and unhealthy. On December 4th, 1852, an earthquake destroyed all its principal buildings, besides a great portion of the houses of the inhabitants.—Exp. Silver, indigo, cochineal, wool, and skins. Pop. about 5,000, chiefly coloured. Lat. 16° 50′ N. Lon. 99° 48′ W.

ACARNANIA, ă-kar-naĭ'-ne-a, a division of ancient Greece, now forming, with Ætolia, a department of the kingdom of Greece. Area, 1,571 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and woody, intersected with fertile valleys, several of which contain beautiful lakes. Pro. Flocks and herds; has some copper, and abundance of sulphur and coal. Pop. with Ætolia, 138,444.

ACARNAS and AMPHOTERUS, ai-kar-nas, am-fot'-e-rus, sons of Alcmæon and Callirhoe. Alcmæon being murdered by the brothers of Alphesibœa, his former wife, Callirhoe, asked from Jupiter that her children, who were still in the cradle, might grow up to punish their father's murderers. Her prayer was granted.

ACARNAS, or ACARNAN, a stony mountain of Attica.

ACASTA, ai-kăs'-ta, one of the Oceanides.

ACASTUS, ai-kăs'-tus, son of Pelias, king of Thessaly, married Astydamia or Hippolyte, who fell in love with Peleus, son of Æacus, when in banishment at her husband's court. Peleus, rejecting the addresses of Hippolyte, was accused before Acastus of attempts upon her virtue, and soon after, at a chase, exposed to wild beasts. Vulcan, by order of Jupiter, delivered Peleus, who returned to Thessaly, and put to death Acastus and his wife.

ACCA, ăk'-ka, bishop of Hexham, in Northumberland. This personage was a liberal patron of the arts, an improver of the music of the church, and an author of a work entitled, "Sufferings of Saints."
Died 710.

ACCA LAURENTIA, ăk'-ka-law-ren'-she-a, the wife of Faustulus the shepherd, and the nurse of Remus and Romulus. Some say she was a courtesan, and have called her Lupa. The Romans made her a goddess, and devoted a holiday to her service.

ACCARISI, JAMES, ăk'-ka-ré'-se, a professor of rhetoric at Mantua, who subsequently became bishop of Vesta.
Born at Bologna; died at Vesta, 1654.

ACCIAIOLI, RENATUS, ăk-ke-a-e-o-le, a Florentine, who conquered Athens, Corinth, and part of Bœotia. Lived in the beginning of the 15th century. He bequeathed Athens to the Venetians; Corinth to Theodosius Paleologus, who married his eldest daughter; and Bœotia, with Thebes, to his natural son Anthony, who also got Athens; but this was retaken in 1455 by Mahomet II.

ACCIAJUOLI, ANGELO, ăk-ke-a-ju-o-le, a native of Florence, of which he became archbishop, and by his merit obtained a cardinalship.
Died 1407.

ACCIAJUOLI, DONATO, a noble and learned Florentine, distinguished as a statesman and scholar. He wrote a commentary on the "Ethics" of Aristotle, and translated some of the "Lives" of Plutarch, to which he added those of Hannibal and Scipio. He also wrote a life of Charlemagne.
Born at Florence, 1428; died at Milan, 1478.

ACCIAJUOLI, NICOLO, Italian statesman, grand seneschal and virtual ruler of the kingdom of Naples. Patron of Petrarch, Boccaccio, and other writers.
Born at Florence, 1310; died at Naples, 1366.

ACCIAJUOLI, ZENOBIO, a churchman of the order of St. Dominic, and librarian to Pope Leo X. He translated some of the fathers into Latin, and left several pieces of his own, some of which were published.
Born 1461; died 1519.

ACCIUS, LUCIUS, ăk'-ke-us, a Latin tragic poet, none of whose works are extant. Flourished about 170 B.C.—There was also, in the same age, an orator of the name of Accius, against whom Cicero defended Cluentius. He was a native of Pisaurum.

ACCOLTI, BENEDETTO, ăc-col'-te, Italian lawyer and historian; chancellor of the republic of Florence. He wrote a history of the Crusade under Godfrey of Bouillon, printed at Venice, in 1532, which was consulted by Tasso in the composition of his "Jerusalem Delivered." He likewise wrote a little book of the famous men of his time.

Born at Arezzo, 1415; died at Florence, 1466.

ACCOLTI, FRANCESCO, brother to Benedetto, was called the prince of lawyers.

Born 1418; died vastly rich, about 1470.

ACCOLTI, BENEDETTO, a cardinal, related to the above, called the Cicero of his age, from the eleganee of his Latin verses.

Born at Florence, 1497; died 1549.

ACCOLTI, BERNADO, son of the historian Benedetto Accolti, famous for his skill in improvising verses.

Born 1465; died 1535.

ACCOLTI, PIETRO, another son of the historian. A cardinal, and held other preferments in the Church. Supposed to have drawn up the famous Papal bull against Luther, and to have written a treatise in reply to him.

Born at Florence, 1497; died 1549.

ACCORAMBONI, VITTORIA, an Italian lady, famous for her great beauty and tragical history. She was married first to Francesco Peretti, who was assassinated, and afterwards to the Duke of Bracciano, who died bequeathing her the whole of his large fortune, on account of which she was murdered by Ludovico Orsini, a relative. Her history forms the basis of Webster's tragedy, The White Devil, and a romance by Tieck.

ACCORSO, BUONO, ăk-hor'-so, a famous Italian scholar of the 15th century. The first to print the text of a Greek author.

ACCORSO, FRANCESCO, professor of law at Bologna. Reduced the Code, Digests, and Institutes into one system, printed at Lyons, in 6 vols. folio, 1627.

Born at Florence, 1182; died at Bologna 1260.

ACCORSO, MARIANGELO, a learned Neapolitan, who was very industrious in collecting ancient MSS. Published remarks on Ausonius, Solinus, and Ovid, in 1524, entitled "Diatribæ;" also an edition of Ammianus, Marcellinus, at Augsburg, in 1533, and some other valuable works.

Born at Aquila, about 1490; date of death unknown.

ACCRA, ak'-kra, a kingdom, of about 500 miles area, and also one of the English ports, Gold Coast, Western Africa. Lat. 5° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 12′ W.

ACCRINGTON, ăk'-kring-ton, a manufacturing town of Lancashire, 19 miles N. of Manchester. It is considered the centre of the cotton-printing business. The rapidity of the growth of the town has been very remarkable. Of the public buildings, the Peel Institute is the most prominent. Christ Church is a fine Gothic edifice. There are cotton mills, dyeing, bleaching, and chemical works, and coal-mines in the neighbourhood. Station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire line. Pop. 31,435.

ACCUM, FREDERICK, an eminent chemist. Came to London, 1793; published a "Treatise on Gas-light," which had the effect of introducing that mode of lighting towns into this country, 1815.

Born in Westphalia, 1769; died at Berlin, 1838.

ACCUMPIXTLI, ăk'-um-pix'-tle, the first king of the ancient Mexicans, a legislator, and the founder of the capital of his kingdom.

Died 1420.

ACELDAMA, ă-kel'-da-ma, the potters' field, purchased with the thirty pieces of silver which Judas took to betray our Saviour. It is still shown to travellers.

ACERBI, GUISEPPE, an Italian traveller and student of natural science. Wrote accounts of his travels in Northern Europe and Egypt, in which country he was Austrian Consul-general.

Born near Mantua, 1773; died 1846

ACERENZA, a-che-ren'-dza, or SIRENZA, a city of Naples, capital of Basilicata. The see of an archbishop, and seated on the Brandano, at the foot of the Apennines. Pop. 2,000.

ACERNUS, the Latinized name by which Sebastian Fabian Klonowicz, a Polish poet, is generally known. He wrote Latin and Polish poems which were highly esteemed, and he has been described as the Sarnatian Ovid. Some of his works were destroyed by the Jesuits. He was a Jew, and for some time burgomaster of Lublin, but died in the public hospital.

Born at Sukmierzyce, 1551; died at Lublin, 1608.

ACERRA, a-cher'-ra, an episcopal town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, seated on the Agno, 7 miles N.E. of Naples. Pop. about 12,000.

ACESIUS, a-ce'-se-us, bishop of Constantinople in the time of Constantine, who, on account of his rigid doctrine, said to him, "Make a ladder for yourself, Acesius, and go up to heaven alone." Flourished in the 3rd century.

ACESTES, or ÆGESTUS, ai-ses'-tees, son of Crinisus and Egesta, and king of the country near Drepanum, in Sicily. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, entertained Æneas during his voyage, and helped him to bury his father on Mount Eryx. In commemeration of this, Æneas built a city there and called it Acesta.

ACH, JOHN, ak, VAN, or ACHEN, was born at Cologne, in 1566, and became eminent in historical and portrait painting.

Died 1621.

ACH, ah, a town of Suabia, in the landgravate of Nellenburg, on the river Ach, 14 miles N.E. of Schaffhausen.

ACHABYTOS, ăk-ă-bi'-tos, a lofty mountain in Rhodes, on the summit of which stood a temple to Jupiter.

ACHÆA, ă-kee'-a, a surname of Pallas, whose temple in Daunia was defended by dogs, who fawned upon the Greeks, but fiercely attacked all other persons.—A name applied to Ceres, and derived from achos, a word expressive of her grief for the loss of her daughter Proserpine.

ACHÆI, ă-kee'-i, the descendants of Achæus, the son of Xuthus, and grandson of Helen. Achæus having committed manslaughter, was compelled to take refuge in Laconia, where he died, and where his posterity remained under the name of Achæi, until they were expelled by the Heraclidæ. Upon this, they passed into the northern parts of Peloponnesus, and, under the command of Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, took possession of the country of the Ionians, and called it Achaia. The successors of Tisamenus ruled until the time of Gyges's tyranny, when Achaia was parcelled into twelve small republics, or so many cities with their respective districts, each of which comprised seven or eight cantons. Four of these—Patræ, Dymæ, Tritæa, and Pharæ—established a confederacy, 284 years B.C., which received the addition of other important places, and continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achæan League, and was most illustrious whilst supported by the splendid virtues and abilities of Aratus and Philopœmen. They directed their arms for three years against the Ætolians, and rose to be powerful by the accession of neighbouring states, and freed their country from foreign slavery. At last, however, they were attacked by the Romans, and, after one year's hostilities, the Achæan League was totally destroyed, B.C. 146. From this period the Peloponnesus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province, bearing the name of Achaia.—The name of Achæi is generally applied to all the Greeks indiscriminately, by the poets.

ACHÆORUM STATIO, ă-kee-or'-um stai-she-o, a place on the coast of the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polyxena was sacrificed to the shades of Achilles, and where Hecuba killed Polymnestor, who had murdered her son Polydorus.

ACHAIA, a-kaï'-ya, a province of the Peloponnesus, running along the southern shore of the Corinthian gulf, from the river Larissus to Cape Araxus. Area, 650 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, inclosing valleys of great fertility. Agriculture. Defective. Sheep and goats are numerous. —From Achaia comes the name of the celebrated Achæan League, which first held its meetings at Helice, and then at Ægium, 373 B.C. (See ACHÆI).

ACHALEN, ăk'-ai-len, a sovereign of the northern Britons, who, on losing his territory, fled into Wales. Reigned in the VIth century.—He and his brother, Arthanad, are famous for a journey performed on one horse, up the hill of Maelwig, in Cardiganshire, to revenge the death of their father.

ACHARD, FRANZ KARL, a-kar, an experimental philosopher and chemist of supposed French extraction. He was among the first who proposed to extract sugar from beet-root. An author of various works in German, on experimental physics, agriculture, and chemistry.

Born at Berlin, 1753; died 1821.

ACHARDS, ELEAZAR, ă-kar, bishop of Avignon. When the plague raged there, he continued, at the hazard of his life, to perform the offices of charity and religion, and Clement XII. sent him to China to settle the disputes which prevailed among the missionaries.

Born at Avignon, 1679; died at Cochin, 1741.

Born at Gefle, 1757; died in East Gothland, 1819.

ACHARNÆ, ăk-ar'-nee, a very large country town of Attica, where the tyrants encamped when they marched against Thrasybulus, and where the Lacedæmonians, under their king Archidamus, pitched their tents when they made an irruption into Attica, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Aristophanes, in the comedy which takes its title from this town, represents the inhabitants as charcoal-makers; and other comic writers stigmatize them as rough and boorish. Acharnæ contained a great many temples. Its remains are topographically placed at about an hour from Kasha, and near Menidi.

ACHATES, ă-kai-tees, a friend of Æneas, whose fidelity was so exemplary that fidus Achates (the faithful Achates) became a proverb.

ACHEEN, at-cheen, a kingdom in the N.W. part of Sumatra, powerful enough, in former times, to expel the Portuguese from the island, and important enough for its sovereigns to receive embassies from some of the greatest potentates of Europe.

Description.—Comparatively healthy, being freer from woods and swamps than the other parts of the island.

Produce.—Chiefly fine fruits, rice, cotton, betel-nuts, birds' nests, gold-dust, and sulphur.

Commerce.—Imp. Salt, soap, opium, wine, arms, gunpowder, and manufactured goods. Exp. Mace, cloves, nutmegs, pepper, sugar, coffee, and rice.

Population, about 320,000. Religion, Mahometan.—The Achinese are taller, stouter, and darker complexioned than the other Sumatrans. They are more active and industrious than their neighbours, and have more sagacity and penetration.

ACHEEN, the capital of the above kingdom, seated near the mouth of a river, on the N.W. point of the island, or Acheen Head, in a wide valley formed by two lofty ranges of hills. The houses are built of bamboos and rough timbers, and are raised some feet from the ground, this part of the country being overflowed in the rainy season. A Dutch force obtained possession of the town in 1874. Lat. 5° 22′ N. Lon. 95° 34′ E.

ACHELOIDES, ă'-ke-lo'-e-dez, a patronymic given to the Sirens as daughters of Achelous.

ACHELOUS, ă'-ke-lo-us, the son of Oceanus and Terra, or Tethys, god of the river of the same name in Epirus, the largest river in Greece.—As one of the numerous suitors of Dejanira, daughter of Æneus, Achelous entered the lists against Hercules, and being inferior, changed himself into a serpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achelous being defeated, retired into his bed of waters. The broken horn was given to the goddess of Plenty.

Born at Cologne, 1552; died at Prague, 1615.

Born at Cassel, 1815.

ACHENWALL, GOTTFRIED, Professor of the University of Göttingen; termed "the founder of the science of statistics," an eminent writer on statistics and political economy.

Born at Elbing, Prussia, 1719; died at Göttingen, 1772.

ACHERN, a-kern, a town of Baden, Germany, on the Acher. Pop. 1,800.

ACHERON, ă'-ke-ron, a river of Thesprotia, in Epirus. Homer calls it one of the rivers of hell, and the fable has been adopted by all succeeding poets, who make the god of the stream to be the son of Ceres without a father, and say that he concealed himself in hell for fear of the Titans, and was changed into a bitter stream, over which the souls of the dead are at first conveyed. The word Acheron is often used for hell itself.

ACHERUSIA, ă-ke-ru'-se-a, a lake of Campania, near Capua. Diodorus mentions, that in Egypt, the bodies of the dead were conveyed over a lake called Acherusia, and received sentence according to the actions of their life. The boat which carried them was called Baris, and the ferryman Charon. Hence arose the fable of Charon and the Styx, &c. The name was given to several other lakes and swamps, believed to afford access to the lower world.

ACHERY, JEAN LUC D', French antiquary. A Benedictine monk, and librarian of the abbey of St. Germain des Prés. Author of several learned works on ecclesiastical history and the lives of the saints.

Born at St. Quentin, 1609; died 1685.

ACHILL, ă'-kill, or Eagle Isle, an island off the west coast of Ireland. It is very mountainous, the extreme western point, Achill Head, rising to 2,222 feet above the sea. Area, 51,521 acres. Pop. 4,000.

Died B.C. 47.

ACHILLES, ă-kil'-leez, the principal figure of the "Iliad" of Homer. He was, according to the poet, the son of Peleus, King of Phthia, and Thetis, a sea goddess, and the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, Thetis plunged him in the Styx, and made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel, by which she held him. His education was entrusted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him master of music. He accompanied the Greek expedition to Troy. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Thetis, made him a strong armour, which was proof against all weapons. He was deprived by Agamemnon of his favourite mistress, Briseis, who had fallen to his lot at the division of the booty of Lyrnessus. For this affront, he refused to appear in the field till the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action and to revenge. He slew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpse by the heels to his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. After thus appeasing the shades of his friend, he permitted old Priam to carry away Hector's body. So far Homer; but later poets tell us that, in the tenth year of the war, Achilles was charmed with Polyxena; and as he solicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is said that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, and gave him the wound of which he died. His body was buried at Sigæum, and divine honours were paid to him, and temples raised to his memory. —Some ages after the Trojan war, Alexander the Great, going to the conquest of Persia, offered sacrifices on the tomb of Achilles, and envied the hero who had found a Homer to transmit his fame to posterity.

ACHILLES TATIUS, a Greek writer, who probably lived in the fifth century. An erotic romance, "The Loves of Clitophar and Leucippe," has been several times translated.

ACHILLINI, ALESSANDRO, a-kil-lé'-ne, an eminent philosopher and physician of Bologna. He is said to have been the first dissecter of human bodies. His works were published in folio, at Venice, in 1568.

Born 1463, died 1512.

ACHILLINI, JOHN PHILOTHEUS, brother of the above.—Was author of a poem, entitled "Viridario," containing the eulogy of many learned men of his time.

Born 1538.

ACHILLINI, CLAUDE, a relative of the preceding. A man of universal learning and genius, and professor of jurisprudence, for several years, in different universities. Cardinal Richelieu is said to have rewarded him for a poem with a gold chain valued at 1,000 crowns.—Inscriptions to his honour were placed upon the schools in which he taught.

Born at Bologna, 1574; died 1640.

ACHMET I., ak'-met, or AHMED, 14th Sultan of the Turkish, or Ottoman empire, who succeeded his father, Mahomet III., in 1603. He was then only fifteen, and began his reign by endeavouring to suppress a rebellion, which lasted two years. He next engaged in a war with the Germans, in which he was assisted by the famous Bethlem Gabor. Peace was concluded in 1606; but he continued to be disturbed by insurrections, and the security of his throne was threatened by a pretender to his rightful inheritance. He indulged in sensual pleasures and in field sports; but, though proud and ambitious, was less sanguinary than his predecessors.

Born 1500, died 1617.

ACHMET II., successor to his uncle Solyman, in 1691.

Born 1643, died 1695.

ACHMET III., son of Mahomet IV, on the deposition of his brother, Mustapha II., in 1703, ascended the imperial throne. He sheltered Charles XII. of Sweden, after the battle of Pultowa, and declared war against the Russians, but, soon after, concluded an advantageous peace. A successful war with Persia followed. He likewise made war on the Venetians, and recovered from them the Morea; but in an attack on Hungary, his army was defeated by Prince Eugene, in 1716, at the battle of Peterwardein.—Achmet was dethroned in 1730.

Born 1673; died in prison, 1759.

ACHMETSCHEM, ack-met-shem, a town of Crim Tartary, capital of the Russian province of Taurida, and government of Catharinenslaf. Lat. 45° 0′ N. Lon. 33° 20′ E.

ACHMIN, or ACKHIN, ăk'-min, a town on the right bank of the Nile, in Middle Egypt. Manf. Coarse cotton cloth. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 26° 38′ N. Lon. 31° 55′ E.—This is the Panopolis of the ancient Greeks, and the Chemmis of the Egyptians, and the ruins of the former are still visible.

Born at Medina del Campo, 1539; died at Salamanca, 1600.

ACOSTA, URIEL D', an extraordinary character, who, at the age of twenty-five, was made treasurer of a church in Oporto, but, having embraced Judaism, resolved to quit Portugal, with his mother and brothers, whom he had converted to the same faith. They proceeded to Amsterdam, and were received into a synagogue. Not long after, becoming dissatisfied with the Jewish rites, and expressing his sentiments with freedom, he was excommunicated. He then wrote a book, in which he denied the immortality of the soul; for which he was thrown into prison, whence he was bailed; but all the copies of his books were seized, and a fine levied upon the author. After lying under excommunication fifteen years, he was, on making submission, re-admitted into the synagogue, but was again expelled for not conforming to the laws of Moses. In this state he remained seven years, abandoned by his friends, and reduced to the utmost destitution. At the end of that time he made another submission, and underwent an extraordinary penance in the synagogue; where, after making his recantation, he was publicly scourged, and had to lay himself down on the threshold, and allow all the people to walk over him. It has been stated, but on uncertain authority, that he shot himself.

ADAMS, THOMAS, A.M., a fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford, who was ejected in 1662 for non-conformity. He then became chaplain to Sir Samuel Jones, of Shropshire, and afterwards to Lady Clare, in Northamptonshire. He wrote "Protestant Union, or Principles of Religion," a very useful work.

Died in 1670.

ADAMS, THOMAS, Puritan divine. At one time chaplain to Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief Justice of England, considered to be the first preacher of his time. His style abounds in brilliant fancies, bearing wit and even humour. Southey designated him "the prose Shakspeare of Puritan theologians." Although a Puritan in theology, he was not a Nonconformist.

Died previous to 1660.

ADAMS, SIR THOMAS, ăd'-ams, Lord Mayor of London, and brought up as a draper in that city. In 1609 he was chosen an alderman, and in 1645 served the office of lord mayor. He was so notorious for his loyalty, that the republicans searched his house in hopes of finding King Charles I., and, though disappointed, they confined him in the Tower. He sent Charles II. 10,000*l.* during his exile, and when the restoration was resolved on, he was appointed by the City to wait on that sovereign, who knighted him at the Hague, and in 1661 created him a baronet. He founded a school at Wem, and an Arabic professorship at Cambridge, and was at the expense of printing the Gospels in Persian, and sending them to the East.

Born at Wem, Shropshire, 1586; died 1667.

ADAMS, the name of five different counties and two townships in the United States of America. 1. In Pennsylvania. 2. In Ohio. 3. In Indiana. 4. In Mississippi. 5. In Illinois. The townships are in Massachusetts and New York; and many villages and smaller townships of the same name are scattered over the States.

ADAM'S BRIDGE, a line of shoals crossing the Gulf of Manaar, between Ceylon and Hindostan.

ADAM'S PEAK, a lofty mountain in the south of the island of Ceylon. Height, 7,420 feet. On the summit of the cone is a hollow in a mass of granite, which according to Mahometan tradition, is the footprint of Adam, who stood there upon one foot for a thousand years. The Buddhists call it the footprint of Buddha. On it a temple has been erected.

ADAMSON, PATRICK, ăd'-am-sun, a Scotch prelate, who, passing through several vicissitudes in various countries in which he travelled, returned to his own in 1573, and became minister of Paisley. In 1575 he sat as commissioner for settling the government of the church, and soon after was raised to the see of St. Andrew's, on which he was violently persecuted by the Presbyterians. In 1583 he was sent ambassador to Queen Elizabeth; but on his return to Scotland, in 1584, he found the Presbyterian party very violent, and at a synod, in 1588, they deprived him of his monastery. The king (with whom he had previously been a great favourite) also alienated the revenues of his see, and thereby reduced him and his family to a wretched condition.—Adamson wrote a Latin poem on the birth of James VI., for which he was arrested at Paris, and confined six months. Whilst under concealment, at an inn in Bourges, for seven months, he employed himself in translating the book of Job into Latin verse, and in writing a tragedy of Herod in the same tongue. He also translated the Lamentations of Jeremiah and the Apocalypse into Latin verse. His works have been collected, and published in 4to.

Born at Perth, 1543; died at St. Andrew's, 1592.

ADAMSTOWN, a village and parish of Ireland, 18 miles from Wexford. Area, 8,134 acres. Pop. about 2,000.

ADAMUR, a-da-mooer, a town of Spain, in the province of Andalusia, 21 miles from Cordova. Pop. nearly 3,000.

ADANA, a-da'-na, a pashalic, and a town of Natolia, seated on the Sihoon, 25 miles N.E. of Tarsus. Trade, Wine, fruit, corn, cotton, and wool. Lat. 37° 1′ N. Lon. 35° 18′ E. Pop. 20,000.—Here is a bridge, said to have been erected by Justinian.

ADANSON, MICHAEL, ăd'-un-sun, a French naturalist, of Scotch extraction, who studied natural history under the celebrated Reaumur and Bernard de Jussieu. In his 21st year he set out for a voyage to Senegal, where he spent five years in making collections illustrative of his favourite pursuits. In 1753 he returned to Paris, greatly reduced in circumstances; but it is to be presumed that his vastly increased fund of knowledge helped to restore his fortunes. He continued to pursue his studies until the breaking out of the French revolution, which involved him in ruin. We find him, after this, so poor that, on being invited to become a member on the establishment of the Institute of France, he was compelled to refuse, because he could not make his appearance, for the "want of shoes." About the close of his life he enjoyed a small pension from the French government. Adanson wrote a work entitled "The Natural History of Senegal," and another under the name of "The Families of Plants," in which he advocated a system of classifi-sation different from that of Linnæus. For many years previous to his death, he entertained the plan of producing an "Encyclopædia of Natural History," to be embellished with 40,000 figures; but it fell to the ground. Adanson was a great friend to civil liberty, and an ardent philanthropist, being among the first to advocate slave emancipation.

Born at Aix, in Provence, 1727; died at Paris, 1806.

ADARSA, or ADASA, a-dar'-sa, a city of Ephraim, not far from Gophna, where Nicanor was defeated by Judas Maccabeus.

ADELAAR, CORT SIVARTSEN, naval commander. At an early age served in the Dutch navy, under Van Tromp; then entered the Venetian service and highly distinguished himself by a brilliant victory over the Turks, in the Dardanelles, on the 13th of May, 1650. Afterwards entered the Danish service and took command of the fleet sent against Sweden, but died suddenly before the departure of the expedition.

Born at Brevig, Norway, 1622; died at Copenhagen, 1675.

ADDA, ăd'-da, a river of Northern Italy, which rises in the Rhœtian Alps, runs through the Lake of Como, by Lecco and Lodi, and falls into the Po, near Cremona.

ADDEPHAGIA, ăd-de-fai'-je-a, a goddess of the Sicilians.

ADDINGTON, HENRY. (See SIDMOUTH, Lord.)

ADDISON, LANCELOT, ăd'-de-sun, a divine, who was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He was chosen one of the terræ filii at the Act in 1658, but being satirical on the men in power, in his oration; he was obliged to ask pardon on his knees. He soon after quitted Oxford, and lived retired till the Restoration, when he became chaplain to the garrison at Dunkirk; and in 1663, to that at Tangier. He returned to England in 1670, and was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty. Shortly after he obtained the living of Milston, in Wiltshire, and a prebend in the cathedral at Salisbury. In 1683 he was promoted to the deanery of Lichfield. He is the author of "An Account of the Present State of the Jews," and a "Description of West Barbary," which show him to have been a man of learning and observation.

Born at Crosby Ravensworth, Westmoreland, 1632; died 1703.

ADDISON, JOSEPH, son of the above, was, after receiving the rudiments of his education, sent to the Charter-house, where he contracted an intimacy with Sir Richard Steele. In 1687 he was admitted at Queen's College, Oxford, but afterwards was entered at Magdalen. In 1693 he took his degree of M.A., and became eminent for his Latin poetry. At the age of 21 he addressed a poem to Dryden, in English, and not long after published a translation of part of Virgil's fourth Georgic. About this time he wrote the arguments prefixed to the several books of Dryden's Virgil, and composed the "Essay on the Georgics." In 1695 he addressed a poem to King William, which recommended him to Lord Somers. In 1699 he obtained a pension of 300*l.* a year, to enable him to travel. He made the tour of France and Italy, improving his mind to the best advantage, as appears from his "Letter to Lord Halifax," which is considered the most elegant of his poetical works, and his "Travels in Italy," which he dedicated, at his return, to Lord Somers. He returned in 1702, and found his old friends out of place. In 1704 he was introduced to Lord Godolphin as a fit person to celebrate the victory of Blenheim, and produced "The Campaign," for which he was rewarded with the place of Commissioner of Appeals. Next year he went to Hanover with Lord Halifax, and soon after was appointed under-secretary of state. The rage for Italian operas which then prevailed, induced him to write his "Rosamond," which did not succeed. When the Marquis of Wharton went to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, Addison accompanied him as secretary, and was made keeper of the records there, with a salary of 300*l.* a year. While he was in Ireland, Steele commenced the "Tatler," to which Addison liberally contributed. This was followed in 1711 by the "Spectator," which he also enriched by his contributions, distinguished by one of the letters of the word CLIO. In 1713 his tragedy of "Cato" was brought upon the stage, amidst the plaudits of both Whigs and Tories. At this time the "Guardian" appeared, to which Addison contributed those papers which are marked by a hand. An attempt was afterwards made to revive the "Spectator," but after the publication of eighty numbers, the work was relinquished. Addison's quota amounts to about a fourth part of this second attempt. In 1715 he began the "Freeholder," and continued it till the middle of the next year, in defence of the government. In 1716 he married the Countess Dowager of Warwick, to whose son he had been tutor; but the marriage did not prove happy. In 1717 he became secretary of state, which office he soon resigned, on a pension of 1,500*l.* a year. In his retirement he planned a tragedy on the death of Socrates, but did not execute it. What was perhaps more in accordance with his sentiments, he commenced "A Defence of the Christian Religion," part of which appeared after his death, and makes us regret that he did not live to perfect it. He also conceived the plan of an English dictionary, to be carried out in the manner subsequently adopted by Dr. Johnson. He left only one daughter, who died unmarried, in 1797. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Dr. Johnson says, "Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison." His style, however, is deficient in force.

Born at Milston, Wilts, 1672; died at Holland House, 1719.

ADELAIDE, MADAME, ăd'-e-laid, an aunt of Louis XVI. of France. On the 19th of February, 1791, she, with her sister Victoire, fled from the horrors of the French revolution, and sought an asylum in Rome, Naples, and several other places, without success. At length they arrived at Corfu, where they obtained protection until the Russian general Outschaord, took them to Trieste, where they fixed their residence. Victoire died in 1799, and her sister followed her to the grave nine months afterwards.

Born 1732: died 1810.

ADELAIDE, AMELIA LOUISE TERESA CAROLINE, wife of William IV., and queen of England. She was sister to the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, and was married July 11, 1818. She was a lady possessed of many exalted virtues, and was a liberal benefactress to the poor.

Born 1792; died 1849.

ADELAIDE, the capital of the colony of South Australia, and an episcopal city, is situated on the river Torrens, discharging into the Gulf St. Vincent, on the south coast of Australia. Lat. 34° 56′ S. Lon. 128° 30′ E. The portion of the town on the left bank of the river, South Adelaide, is the seat of the government, and contains the principal commercial establishments. The streets, of which King William-street is the principal, are wide and regularly planned, and there are many important public buildings, including a large post and telegraph office, the government house, town hall, the Houses of Legislature, an exchange, banks, and asylums for lunatics, orphans, and destitute poor. The boundaries of South Adelaide are four terraces, facing the points of the compass, and known as the North, South, East, and West terraces. In North Adelaide (connected with the other portion of the town by two iron and two wooden bridges), are the bishop's residence, a large club-house, insurance offices, and the jail. There are several episcopal churches, a fine Roman Catholic cathedral, dedicated to St. Francis Xavier, and numerous places of worship in connection with other denominations. There is also a botanical garden. A public pleasure ground, called Parkland, surrounds the city. A railway connects the town with Port Adelaide, situated on a creek, about seven miles distant, and possessing a good harbour. Another line of railway, 120 miles long, connects Adelaide with the extensive copper mines of the colony. A line of telegraph crosses the entire continent of Australia, a distance of 4,000 miles, connecting Adelaide with Port Darwin, on the northern coast. The population of the town was returned, at the census of 1881, as 38,479, and is rapidly increasing. The town, named after the queen dowager, was first settled in 1836, made a bishopric 1847. Municipal government was adopted in 1840, earlier than in many other towns in the Australian colonies.

ADELAIDE, a county of the colony of South Australia, including the capital. The population in 1881 was 122,966.

ADELAIDE ARCHIPELAGO. (See ARCHIPELAGO.)

ADELARD, ăd'-e-lar, or ATHELARD, a monk of Bath, who travelled into Egypt and Arabia, and translated the "Elements of Euclid" out of Arabic into Latin, before any Greek copies of that celebrated work had been discovered. He also translated and wrote several other treatises on mathematical and medical subjects, which are to be seen in MS. in the libraries of Corpus Christi and Trinity colleges, Oxford.—Flourished in the 12th century.

ADELBOLD, ăd'-el-bold, a bishop of Utrecht, who wrote the life of Henry II., emperor of Germany, which is still extant.

Died 1027.

ADELER, CURTIUS, ăd'-e-ler, also named Servisen, a Norwegian, who, after serving in the Dutch navy, entered the Venetian service, in which he was raised to the rank of admiral, and, subsequently, was made a knight of St. Mark, and obtained a pension for his meritorious conduct. On leaving the Venetian service, he went to Amsterdam, where he married a lady of rank. We next find him admiral-in-chief of the Danish fleet, and created a noble.

Born 1622; died at Copenhagen, 1675.

ADELGREIFF, JOHN ALBRECHT, ăd'-el-greef, a German, supposed to be a magician, whose reputed blasphemous fanaticism and sedition caused him to be put to death at Konigsburg, 1636.

ADELPHUS, aï'-del'-phus, a disciple of Plato, and the composer of a singular theory, compounded of the doctrines of Plato, the Gnostics, and others; greatly followed, though he was opposed by Plotinus.—Flourished in the third century.

ADELSBERG, ăd'-els-berg, a small market-town in the duchy of Carniola, Austria, 26 miles from Trieste. Near it are the largest stalactite caverns in Europe.

ADELUNG, FRIEDRICH VON, ăd'-e-lung, philologist. Studied at Leipsic, then visited Italy, and collated some ancient German MSS. in the Vatican library. In 1803 appointed instructor to the young brothers of the Czar of Russia, and afterwards became director of the Oriental Institute and president of the Academy of Sciences. Author of works on the Sanscrit and Russian languages.

Born at Stetten, 1768; died at St. Petersburg, 1843.

ADELUNG, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, uncle of the preceding, linguist and grammarian, educated at the university of Halle. He became professor in the Evangelical Gymnasium at Erfurt, which appointment he resigned in 1761, on account of a religious dispute with the Catholic town magistrates. He then went to Leipsic, where he supported himself by literature till 1787, when he was appointed to the office of principal librarian at Dresden. Compiled the Lord's Prayer in nearly 500 different languages. He is best known by his "Grammatical and Critical Dictionary."

Born at Spantekow, in Pomerania, 1732; died at Dresden, 1806.

ADEMAR, ăd'-e-mar, a monk, who wrote chronicles of France, which were published by Labbe. He flourished in the 11th century.

ADEN, aï'-den, or a'-den, a seaport, the capital of the state of Aden, situate on a rocky peninsula in the south-west extremity of Arabia, projecting into the sea. It has an area of nearly twenty square miles, and is of volcanic origin, consisting chiefly of a range of hills, some nearly 1,800 feet high. It was formerly strongly fortified, and the most opulent city of Arabia, being the chief mart for all Asiatic produce and manufacture; but had altogether declined, when it was, in 1839, taken possession of by the British, who have converted it from ruin and misery into a flourishing place of trade, encompassed by fruitful orchards and blooming gardens. Its harbours are the best on the Arabian coast. Between the mountain-masses which command their entrance, there is a space of four miles, and vessels may take up any position in a depth of water of from 5 to 10 fathoms. On account of this, Aden has become one of the principal stations of the Anglo-Indian mail steamers, and every year it is becoming a place of greater importance. More than 2,000 vessels of various sizes enter the port annually. Pop. 34,711. Lat. 12° 45′ N. Lon. 46° 10′ E.

ADENBURG, a'-den-burg, a town of Westphalia, in the duchy of Berg, 12 miles from Cologne.

ADIGE, a'-deedge, a river which rises to the south of the Lake of Glace, enters the Tyrol, and runs by Trent and Verona into the Gulf of Venice, where it empties itself, about 5 miles south of Chioggia. It is the ancient Athesis, and is called by the Germans Etsch, throughout its entire length, which is about 250 miles. Nearly 200 flour and rice mills are driven by this river, which, with its valley, has been rendered for ever memorable by the wars of Bonaparte. It affords means of important commercial communications between Germany, the Tyrol and Italy.

ADIMANTUS, ăd-e-man'-tus, one of the sect of the Manichees, who denied the authority of the Old Testament, in a book which was answered by St. Augustine.—Flourished at the end of the 3rd century.

ADIMARI, ALEXANDER, a Florentine poet, who acquired a high reputation.

ADLERFELDT, GUSTAVUS, ad'-ler-felt, a gentleman of the bedchamber of Charles XII., whose history he wrote with great fidelity.—A French translation of his history was published in 1740.
Born at Stockholm, 1671. Fell at the battle of Pultowa, 1709.

ADLINGFLEET, ăd-ling-fleet, a parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles south of Howden. Area, 4,580 acres. Pop. 500.

ADLINGTON, ăd-ling-ton, a township near Macclesfield, in Cheshire, in which the inhabitants are chiefly employed in silk manufactures. Pop. 1,500.—There is another township near Wigan, in Lancashire. Pop. 1,100.

ADLZREITTER, JOHN, adl-zreit-ter, a German, chancellor of Bavaria, who wrote the annals of Bavaria in Latin, folio.—Flourished in the 17th century.—His "Annals" were printed in Leipsic in 1710.

ADMAH, ăd'-ma, the most easterly of the five cities of the plain, consumed by fire from heaven, and the site of which was afterwards submerged by the waters of the Dead Sea.

ADMETUS, ăd-me'-tus, the most remarkable of this name was a king of Pheræ, in Thessaly. Apollo, when banished from heaven, is said to have tended his flocks for nine years, and to have obtained from the Parcæ that Admetus should never die, if another person laid down his life for him. This was cheerfully done by his wife, Alcestis.—Admetus was one of the Argonauts, and was at the hunt of the Caledonian boar. Pelias promised his daughter in marriage only to him who could bring him a chariot drawn by a lion and a wild boar. Admetus did this by the aid of Apollo, and obtained Alcestis in marriage.

ADMIRALTY ISLAND, ăd-me-ral-te, on the North-west American coast, about 90 miles long and 25 wide. It is covered with pine forests. Lat. 58° N. Lon. 134° W.

ADMIRALTY ISLANDS, a cluster of islands in the Pacific Ocean, to the N.W. of New Ireland. They were visited in 1767 by Captain Carteret, but, were, in 1616, discovered by the Dutch. Some of them are of considerable extent, and the centre one is supposed to be about 45 miles long. None appear to be inhabited but those that are covered with cocoa-trees; and as they are little raised above the level of the sea, it is believed that water must be scarce. The inhabitants are tall, of a dark colour, with woolly hair, and go naked. Lat. between 2° and 3° S. Lon. between 146° 18′ and 147° 46′ E.

ADO, a-do, archbishop of Vienne, in Dauphiny. He wrote a "Universal Chronicle," printed at Paris, 1522, and at Rome in 1745, folio; and a "Martyrology," published in 1613.
Died 875, aged 75.

ADOLPHATI, a-dol-fä'-te, an Italian musician, who composed a piece in which there were two kinds of time—one of two notes, and the other of three—in the same air. He was, besides, both the author and composer of several operas.

ADOLPHUS, JOHN, ă-dol-fus, leading counsel in the Thistlewood conspiracy of 1820, in which he greatly distinguished himself, although he was retained for the conspirators but a few hours before the trial of the prisoners. As an author, Adolphus is known by a "History of England from the Accession of George III." He was also the author of the "Political State of the British Empire," "Biographical Memoirs," and was for some years editor of the "Annual Register."
Born 1768; died 1845.

ADOLPHUS, Count of Nassau, elected emperor of Germany in 1292. His rapacity and tyrannical conduct caused a confederation to be formed against him, at the head of which was Albert, duke of Austria.
Born 1252; fell in battle, 1298.

ADOLPHUS, G., a warlike duke of Holstein and son of Frederick, king of Denmark.—His name frequently occurs in the military transactions of Germany.
Born 1526; died 1586.

ADOLPHUS FREDERICK, II., of Holstein Gottorp, king of Sweden, succeeded his father in 1751. He reformed the laws, and encouraged learning and the arts of peace.—This sovereign instituted, at Tornea, in Lapland, an academy of inscriptions and belles-lettres.
Born 1710; died 1771.

ADONI, a-do-ne, a town of India, situate in the Deccan, under the presidency of Madras, in Golconda, on one of the branches of the Tungebadda, 175 miles S.W. of Hyderabad. In 1787 it was reduced to ruins by Tippoo Saib. Pop. 22,441.

ADONI BEZEK, ăd-o'-ni-bē'-zek, king of Bezek, in Canaan. He was a cruel prince, on account of which his thumbs and great toes were cut off by the tribes of Judah and Simeon, after they had defeated him in a great battle.
Died at Jerusalem, B.C. 1443.

ADONIJAH, ăd'-o-ni'-ja, the fourth son of King David, by Haggiah. He aimed at his father's crown, but Solomon was proclaimed king of Israel when Adonijah fled to the tabernacle for protection. B.C. 1015.

ADONIS, ă-do'-nis, son of Theias, King of Assyria, by his daughter Myrrha, was the favourite of Venus. He was fond of hunting, and was often cautioned by his mistress not to hunt wild beasts, for fear of being killed in the exercise. This advice he slighted, and at last received a mortal bite from a wild boar which he had wounded, and Venus, after shedding many tears at his death, changed him into a flower called anemone. (Shakspeare's poem, "Venus and Adonis," is known to all readers of the poet.) Proserpine is said to have restored him to life, on condition that he should spend six months with her, and the rest of the year with Venus. This has been explained to imply the alternate return of summer and winter.—Adonis is supposed to be identical with the Thammuz mentioned by the prophet Ezekiel. A small river rising in Mount Lebanon, and falling into the sea at Byblus, was named Adonis, because of the red colour of the water at the time of flood.

ADONY, a-do-ne, a Hungarian town on the banks of the Danube, 28 miles south of Pesth. Pop. about 3,000.

ADORF, ad-orf, the most southern town of Saxony, in Voigtland, seated on the Elsther, 15 miles N.N.W. of Egra. Manf. Chiefly cotton goods. Pop. 3,000.

ADORNE, FRANCIS, ad-orn, a Jesuit of Genoa, who wrote a treatise on ecclesiastical discipline.

ADOUR, ad'-oor, a river of France, which rises six miles to the east of Barèges, in the department of the Upper Pyrenees, and running by Tarbes and Dax, falls into the Bay of Biscay, three miles beyond Bayonne, where it joins the Nive. Its course, through many fertile valleys, is about 180 miles.

ADOWA, ad'-o-a, one of the principal towns in the kingdom of Tigré, Abyssinia, with houses built in a conical form, and arranged into streets. It is the great mart between the interior and the coast, and reaps the advantage of a transit trade between the Red Sea ports and Gondaro. Cotton cloth is manufactured, and ivory and gold exported. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 14° 12′ N. Lon. 39° 3′ E.

ADRA, a'-dra, a seaport of Spain, in the province of Almeria, 60 miles S.E. of Grenada. Its lead-mines are the chief support of the inhabitants. Pop. 7,500.

ADRAMMELECH, ăd-ram'-e-lek, "magnificence of the king," a son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, slain by his sons, B.C. 713.—One of the gods adored by the inhabitants of Sepharnaim.

ADRAMPATAM, ad-ram'-pa-tam, an Indian town in the British district of Tanjore, presidency of Madras, 34 miles W. of Point Calimere.

ADRAMYTI, a-dra-mē'-te, a town of Natolia, on the E. coast of a gulf of its name, 83 miles N. of Smyrna. Gall-nuts, olives, and wool form its principal exports.

ADRARA, a-drä'-ra, a village of Lombardy, celebrated for the wars of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, 74 miles from Bargamo.

ADRASTA, ăd-răs-ta, one of the Oceanides, who nursed Jupiter.

ADRASTIA, ăd-răs'-te-a, called by some Nemesis, and is the avenger of wrong. The Egyptians placed her above the moon, whence she looked down upon the actions of men.

ADRASTUS, ăd-răs'-tus. There are several of this name in ancient history, the most remarkable of whom was king of Argos. Polynices being banished from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, daughter of Adrastus. The king assisted his son-in-law, and marched against Thebes with an army led by himself and six of his most famous generals. (This expedition is the basis of the famous poetical story of "The Seven Worthies against Thebes.") All perished in the war except Adrastus, who, with a few men who were saved from slaughter, fled to Athens, and implored the aid of Theseus against the Thebans, who opposed the burying of the Argives fallen in battle. Theseus went to his assistance, and was victorious.—Adrastus, after a long reign, died through grief, occasioned by the death of his son Ægialeus. A temple was raised to his memory at Sicyon.

ADRETS, Baron des, FRANCIS DE BEAUMONT, ăd'-rai, a violent Huguenot, who signalized himself by many daring exploits, as well as cruelties. He subsequently became a Catholic, but died as he had lived, in general detestation.—At some places he obliged his prisoners to throw themselves from the battlements, upon the pikes of his soldiers. Reproaching one for retreating twice from the fatal leap, "Sir," replied the man, "I defy you, with all your bravery, to take it in three." This keen rejoinder saved his life.

Born 1513; died 1587.

ADRIA, JOHN JAMES, ad'-re-a, a Sicilian writer, who became physician-general to Charles V. of Spain.

Died 1560.

ADRIA, a town of Italy, in the province of Rovigo, the see of a bishop, who resides at Rovigo. This town gives name to the Adriatic Sea, and was formerly of great note, and a much frequented harbour, but by the continual deposit of alluvium, it is now ten miles from the sea. It is crossed by the Castaguaro, a branch of the Adige, and stands 30 miles S.S.W. of Venice. One of the oldest cities in Europe. Pop. 157,19. Lat. 45° 3' N. Lon. 11° E.

ADRIAM, MARIE, a-dre-am, a female who, at the age of 16, defended her native town of Lyons with the utmost valour throughout the whole time of its being besieged, in 1793, by the French army of the Convention. At the close of the siege she was arrested and executed, with many others, who had so bravely distinguished themselves for a period of two months, in defence of the beleaguered city.

ADRIAN, a town of the United States, capital of Lenawee county, Michigan. There are several good churches and other public buildings, and it is the centre of a great grain-producing district. Pop. 7,849.

ADRIAN, or HADRIAN, PUBLIUS ÆLIUS, ai'-dre-an, one of the greatest of the Roman emperors. He exhibited remarkable talent, and entered early into the army, and became tribune of a legion, when he married Sabina, the heiress of Trajan, whom he accompanied in his expeditions, and became successively prætor, governor of Pannonia, and consul. On the death of Trajan, in 117, he assumed the government, made peace with the Persians, and remitted the debts of the Roman people. No monarch informed himself more by travelling than Adrian. He performed a long journey on foot, visiting all the provinces of the empire. In 120 he visited Gaul, whence he passed over to Britain, where he erected a wall extending from the Solway Frith to the mouth of the Tyne. The object of this was to secure the Roman province from the incursions of the Caledonians. On leaving Britain he went into Africa and Asia, and in 125 was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens. This, as a matter of course, according to Greek superstition, secured him an abode in the Elysian fields after his death. In his reign the Christians underwent a dreadful persecution. He built a temple to Jupiter, on Mount Calvary, and placed a statue of Adonis in the manger of Bethlehem; he also had images of swine engraved on the gates of Jerusalem, all of which acts indicate a contempt for Christianity. The Jewish war, the result of his tyrannous conduct, lasted two years and a half, and is said to have caused the death of 580,000 persons.—On his deathbed he composed some Latin verses, addressed to his soul, which Pope imitated in his famous "Ode of the Dying Christian." He had great virtues, which were, however, blended with as great vices.

Born at Rome A.D. 76; died at Baiæ, 138.

ADRIAN, abbot, a learned divine of the seventh century. An African by birth, he became abbot of a monastery near Naples, and afterwards of St. Peter's, near Canterbury, where he remained for nearly forty years. He taught the arts and sciences, and the Greek and Latin languages, as well as theology.

Died 709.

ADRIAN, an author, who wrote an introduction to the Scriptures, in Greek, printed at Augsburg in 1602, 4to. and in Latin, 1650, folio. Lived in the fifth century.

ADRIAN, a Carthusian monk, known by a treatise, entitled "De Remediis Utriusque Fortunæ," printed at Cologne in 1471, folio.

ADRIAN I., one of a Roman patrician family, elected to the pontificate in 772. Aided by Charlemagne, he destroyed the kingdom of the Longobards. He rebuilt the walls and acqueducts of Rome. He sanctioned the worship of images, which had been allowed in a council held at Nice, in 786, but which was opposed by Charlemagne and the Gallic Church.

Died 795.

ADRIAN II., an ecclesiastic, who succeeded to the papal chair in 867. He excommunicated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, an act which resulted in the separation of the Latin and Greek churches.

Born at Rome 791; died 872.

ADRIAN III., a Roman, raised to the pontificate in 884, but died the next year, on his journey to a diet at Worms.

ADRIAN IV., the only Englishman who was ever raised to the dignity of the papal chair. His name was Nicholas Breakespere; and for some time he filled a mean situation in the monastery of St. Albans. Being refused the habit in that house, he went to France, and became a clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus, in Provence, of which he was afterwards chosen abbot. Eugenius III. created him a cardinal in 1146, and in 1148 sent him legate to Denmark and Norway, which nations he converted to the Christian faith. In 1154 he obtained the tiara, and Henry II., king of England, sent the abbot of St. Albans, with three bishops, to congratulate him. Adrian, disregarding the slight formerly put upon him by the brethren of St. Albans, granted considerable privileges to that monastery, and a bull to Henry for the conquest of Ireland. In 1155 he excommunicated the king of Sicily; but the next year he submitted, and was absolved. It was during this pontificate that the disputes between the Pope and the Emperor Frederic of Germany (Barbarossa) began, the result of which was the long strife between the Guelphs and Ghibellines, which lasted nearly three centuries.—Adrian, by his active conduct, left the papal territory in a better state than he found it, and bequeathed to posterity some letters and homilies still extant.

Born at Langley, near St. Albans; died at Anagni, supposed of poison, 1159.

ADRIAN V., OTTOBONI FIESCI, ascended the papal throne in 1276. He was dispatched as legate to England in 1254, and again in 1265, to settle the disputes between Henry III. and his barons. He only lived thirty-eight days after his election.

Born at Genoa; died 1276.

ADRIAN VI. was educated on charity at Louvain, where he afterwards became professor. The bishopric of Tortoso was conferred upon him by Ferdinand, king of Spain; and his successor Charles, during his minority, chose him to be co-regent with Cardinal Ximenes. When that prince became emperor, by the title of Charles V., he placed unlimited confidence in Adrian, who, on the death of Leo X., in 1522, was elected pope. He was unpopular on account of his efforts to reform the Church, as the best means of counteracting the work of Luther and the other Reformers.

Born at Utrecht, 1459; died 1523.

ADRIAN, CARDINAL, an Italian, who was sent by the pope on a mission to this country, where Henry VII. first made him his agent at Rome, then gave him the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards that of Bath and Wells. He farmed out his bishopric, preferring to live at Rome, where he built a superb palace, which he left to the king of England and his successors. Alexander VI. created him cardinal, in 1503; soon after which, it is stated, but on insufficient authority, he narrowly escaped being poisoned with others of his order, at a feast given by the pope and his son Cæsar Borgia. Engaging in a plot against pope Leo X., into which he was led by the prediction of a fortune-teller, that Leo should die a violent death, and be succeeded by one Adrian, he was fined 25,000 ducats, and prohibited from leaving Rome. However, in 1518, he fled from that city and was excommunicated. Polydore Virgil says he ended his days at Riva, in the diocese of Trent; and gives him a high character for erudition.

Born at Corneto, in Tuscany, 1450.

ADRIAN'S WALL, a large Roman work, in the North of England, from the Solway to the Tyne, near Newcastle, a distance of about 74 miles. It was erected to defend the Roman settlements from the Caledonians. There are now considerable remains of it.

ADRIANI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a-dre-a'-ne, a Florentine who wrote the history of his own times in Italian. Professor of rhetoric at the university.

Born at Florence, 1511; died at Florence, 1579.

ADRIANI, MARCEL VIRGIL, a chancellor of the republic of Florence, and an expert scholar in the Greek and Latin languages. He translated Dioscorides from the former into the latter.

Born 1464; died 1521.

ADRIANI, MARCEL, secretary to the Florentine republic, and son of the above chancellor. He wrote a "History of his Own Times," which has considerable merit.

Born at Florence, 1513; died 1579.

ADRIANO, a-dre-a'-no, a mountain of Spain in Biscay, over which is a very difficult road to Alba and Old Castile. It is one of the highest of the Pyrenees, and is only inhabited by a few shepherds.

ADRIANO, a Carmelite friar of Spain, and a painter of some excellence, who destroyed his works almost as soon as he had finished them.

Died 1630.

ADRIANOPLE, ăd-re-an-o'-pel, the second city of European Turkey, standing on the Tundja, at a distance of 135 miles from Constantinople. It is now about five miles in circumference, surrounded by old walls, and defended by a citadel. Its streets are narrow and irregular, but adorned with fountains and mosques, of which there are about 40. It was taken by the Turks from the Greek emperors in 1362, and made the seat of their empire, which it continued for a great many years. Manf. Silk, woollen, and cotton stuffs. Rose-water and other perfumes are made, and there are both dyeing and tanning establishments. Exp. Wool, opium, leather, wax, &c. Pop. 100,000, of whom about 50,000 are Greeks. Lat. 41° 44′ N. Lon. 26° 35′ E.—The bazaar and the mosque of Selim are here the objects of greatest attraction. The former is a brick building of about 300 paces in length, and offers for sale all the rich commodities of the East; the latter, said to be the finest mosque in the world, is built like a theatre, from the ruins of Famagusta, in Cyprus. Its principal balcony has an ascent of 377 steps. There are about 40 other mosques, two palaces, and more than 24 public schools. In the adjacent plain, Constantine the Great defeated Licinius in 323, and in 378 the Goths overpowered Valens. In 1360 the sultan Moorad I. took the city, when it became the capital of the empire, and the favourite residence of the sultans till the 18th century. On the 20th August, 1829, it was taken by the Russian general Diebitsch, which led to the treaty of peace concluded at Adrianople on the 14th September. The stipulations of this treaty restored to the Porte those parts of Bulgaria and Roumelia which the Russians had conquered, besides Moldavia and Wallachia; it also fixed the Pruth and the right bank of the Danube, from the mouth of the former river, to be the boundary-line between Turkey in Europe and Russia. The limits of the Asiatic territories of the two states were also exactly defined. Sums of indemnification for the expenses of the war were assigned to Russia, and the liberty of trading to all parts of the Turkish dominions conceded, besides the trading navigation of the Danube, the Mediterranean, and the Black Sea. The free passage of the Dardanelles was likewise guaranteed. The political independence of Greece was to be recognized by the Porte, as well as that of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Servia, acknowledged.

ADRIANUS, ăd-ri-a'-nus, a famous Greek rhetorician. He held the chair of philosophy at Athens, and his unfinished speeches were described by his teacher, Herodes Atticus, as "the fragments of a Colossus." He went to Rome and became secretary to the Emperor Commodus.

Born at Tyre; died at Rome, 192.

ADRIATIC SEA, or Gulf of Venice, ai-dre-ăt'-ik, that portion of the Mediterranean Sea which lies between the coasts of Italy, Illyria, and Albania. Its length from Cape Leuca to Trieste is 450 miles, and its mean breadth is 100 miles. The Po and the Adige are the only rivers of importance it receives, and its greatest depth is not more than 22 fathoms, whilst a great part of it is not 12 fathoms. Its navigation is generally safe in summer, but in winter the violence of the winds from the south-east causes much destruction to shipping. On the Venetian side, the shores are low, but on the Dalmatian, the waves, in stormy weather, lash the rocks which girdle the coast to a great height. The principal trading ports on the Italian side are BRINDISI, ANCONA, SINIGAGLIA and VENICE; on the east side, FIUME, PIRANO, POLA and TRIESTE, the chief seaport of Austria. It runs from the south-east, at Lat. 40° 8′, to north-west, at Lat. 45° 45′.—The Adriatic takes its name from the city of Adria; its waters are salter than those of the ocean.

ADRICHOMIA, CORNELIA, ăd-re-ko'-me-a, a Dutch nun of a noble family, who wrote a poetical version of the Psalms in the sixteenth century.

ADRICHOMIUS, CHRISTIAN, ăd-re-ko'-me-us, a Dutch author, who wrote a description of the Holy Land, and a chronicle of the Old and New Testaments, published in 1593.

Born at Delft, 1533; died at Cologne, 1585.

ADRO, a'-dro, a town of Austrian Italy, 10 miles from Brescia. Pop. 2,300.

ADRY, J. F., a'-dre, a professor of rhetoric in France, and a voluminous author.—Among his works we may notice his "Life of the Duchess of Schomberg;" a "Biography of Malebranche," and a "History of Vittoria Accarambono."
Born 1749; died 1818.

ADSON, HEMERICUS, abbot of Luxeuil, who was the author of a book on the Miracles of St. Wandalbert, and of another concerning Antichrist.
Died, 992.

ADUARTE, DIEGO, a Spanish friar, missionary, and historian. Visited the Phillipines, China, Cochin China, and other eastern countries, and suffered imprisonment and torture. Bishop of New Segovia, and author of a history of his travels and labour.
Died, 1630.

ADULE, ăd-ool, the modern Zulla, zool-la, situate in Annesley Bay, on the west coast of the Red Sea. It was the landing-place of the Abyssinian expedition, 1867-8. Lat. 15° 15′ N.

ADULLAM, a fortified city in the Shefalah, or lower lands of Judea. In the neighbourhood was the Cave of Adullam where David took refuge from the persecution of Saul. The site is not positively identified, but Lieutenant Condor, in charge of the official survey of Palestine, believes that he can identify it with a place now known as Ayd-el-Mieh, where are vestiges of an ancient city and a number of caves. It occupies a commanding position on a hill overlooking the Wady Sur, part of the presumed valley of Elah.

ADUMPOOR, ad'-um-poor, an Indian town in the British district of Azimgurh. Lat. 16° N. Lon. 80° 20′ E.

ADVENTURE BAY, ăd-vent-yur, near the southern extremity of Tasmania. Lat. 43° S. Lon. 147° E.

ADVENTURE BAY, on the east coast of Brune Island, off the south coast of Tasmania, in the Pacific Ocean, so called from the ship in which Captain Furneaux, its discoverer, in 1773, sailed. Captain Cook found the people to be mild and cheerful, with little of that wild appearance which savages in general have. They were, however, almost totally devoid of activity or genius, and were nearly on a level with the wretched natives of Terra del Fuego. Lat. 43° 21′ S. Lon. 147° 29′ W.

ÆA, e-a, a huntress, changed by the gods into an island of the same name, to rescue her from the pursuit of her lover, the river Phasis. On the island was a town called Æa, which was the capital of Colchis.

ÆACUS, é-ă-kus, son of Jupiter, by Ægina, and king of the Island of Œnopia. A pestilence having destroyed all his subjects, he entreated Jupiter to repeople his kingdom; and, according to his desire, all the ants which were in an old oak were changed into men, and called by Æacus myrmidons, from murmex, an ant. Æacus married Endies, by whom he had Telamon and Peleus. He was a man of such integrity that the ancients have made him one of the judges of hell, with Minos and Rhadamanthus.

ÆATUS, é-ă-tus, son of Philip and brother of Polyclea, was descended from Hercules. An racle having announced, that whoever of the two first touched the land after crossing the Achelous should obtain the kingdom, Polyclea pretended to be lame, and prevailed upon her brother to carry her across on his shoulders. When they came near the opposite side, Polyclea leaped ashore from her brother's back, exclaiming that the kingdom was her own. Æatus joined her in her exclamation, and afterwards married her, and reigned conjointly with her. Their son, Thessalus, gave his name to Thessaly.

ÆCHMACORAS, eke-măk'-o-ras, a son of Hercules, by Phyllone, daughter of Alcimedon. When the father heard that his daughter had had a child, he exposed her and the infant in the woods to wild beasts, where Hercules, conducted by the noise of a magpie, which imitated the cries of a child, found and delivered them.

ÆDESIUS, e-dé'-se-us, a Platonic philosopher, who succeeded Iamblichus as teacher of philosophy at Cappadocia. He pretended to hold communion with the deities. Flourished in the 4th century.

ÆDESSA, or EDESSA, e-des'-sa, a town of Macedonia, near Pella. Caranus, king of Macedonia, took it by following goats that sought shelter from the rain, and called it from that circumstance (aigas, capras) Ægeas. It was the burying-place of the Macedonian kings; and an oracle had said, that as long as the kings were buried there, so long would their kingdom exist. Alexander was buried in a different place; and on that account some authors have said that the kingdom became extinct.

ÆDON, wife of Zethus, King of Thebes. Intending to kill the eldest son of her sister-in-law, Niobe, she killed her own son by mistake. To relieve her grief Zeus changed her into a nightingale.

ÆETA, or ÆETES, e-é'-ta, king of Colchis, son of Sol and Perseis, daughter of Oceanus, was father of Medea, Absyrtus, and Chalciope, by Idya, one of the Oceanides. He killed Phryxus, son of Athamas, who had fled to his court on a golden ram. He was induced to perpetrate this crime in order to obtain the fleece of the golden ram. The Argonauts came against Colchis, and recovered the golden fleece by means of Medea, though it was guarded by bulls that breathed fire, and by a venomous dragon. This expedition has been celebrated by all the ancient poets.

ÆGADES, é-ga-dees, or ÆGATES, three small rocky islands to the west of Sicily, near Marsella: their names are Levanzo, Favignana, and Maretima.

ÆGÆ, é-jee', a town near Eubœa, from which the Ægæan Sea is said to take its name.

ÆGÆON, e-jé'-on, the son of Cœlus, or of Pontus and Terra, the same as Briareus. It was supposed that he was a notorious pirate, chiefly residing at Ægæ, whence his name; and that the fable about his hundred hands arises from his having one hundred men to manage his oars in his piratical excursions.

ÆGÆUS, e-jé'-us, a surname of Neptune, from Ægæ, in Eubœa.—A river of Corcyra.—A plain in Phocis.

ÆGALEOS, e-gă'-le-os, or ÆGALEUM, a mountain of Attica, from which Xerxes beheld the battle of Salamis. It was situated to the left of the road from Athens to Eleusis. Its present name is Saramango.

ÆGEAN SEA, e-jé'-an, or ARCHIPELAGO, a part of the Mediterranean which divides Greece from Asia Minor. It is full of islands, some of which are called Cyclades, others Sporades, &c. Some refer the origin of its name to Ægeus, but others, with more probability, derive it from the town of Ægæ, in the neighbourhood of Eubœa. The Ægean Sea was accounted particularly stormy and dangerous to mariners.

ÆGEATES, JOHN, e-jé-a-tes, a Nestorian monk, who wrote an ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the council of Chalcedon. Flourished in the 5th century.

ÆGEUS, e-jé-us, king of Athens, son of Pandion, being desirous of having children, went to consult the oracle, and in his return, stopped at the court of Pittheus, king of Trœzene, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her if she had a son to send him to Athens, as soon as he could lift a stone under which he had concealed his sword. By this sword he was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wish to make any public discovery of a son, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theseus, whom she accordingly sent to Athens with his father's sword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jason. When Theseus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poison him; but he escaped, and upon showing Ægus the sword he wore, discovered himself to be his son. The Ægean Sea is supposed by some to be called after him. Theseus had agreed with Ægeus, when he should return from Crete, that he should hoist white sails, as a signal of his having subdued the Minotaur; forgetting to do so, his disconsolate father, at the sight of the black sails, threw himself into this sea. Ægeus reigned forty-eight years, and after his death the Athenians decreed divine honours to him as the adopted son of Neptune.

ÆGIALE, e-jí-a-le, one of Phaeton's sisters, who were themselves changed into poplars, and their tears into amber. They are called Heliades.

ÆGIALEUS, e-ji-á-le-us, son of Adrastus, by Amphitea, was one of the Epigoni, or sons of the seven generals who were killed in the first Theban war. They went against the Thebans, who had refused to give burial to their fathers, and were victorious. They all returned home safe except Ægialeus, who was killed. This expedition is called the War of the Epigoni.

ÆGIDIUS, Roman general, chosen King of the Franks, 459; defeated the Visigoths at Arles, 462. Murdered, 464.

ÆGIDIUS, PETRUS ALBIENSIS, e-jíd'-e-us, an Asiatic and African traveller, who wrote a description of Thrace, Constantinople, and other works.
Died 1555.

ÆGIDIUS ATHENIENSIS, a Greek ecclesiastic and physician, who wrote several books, the chief of which are, "De Pulsibus et de Venenis." Flourished in the 8th century.

ÆGIDIUS DE COLUMNA, a general of the Augustines, who taught divinity at Paris with great reputation, but whose works have long since sunk into oblivion. One of his books, however, as an early specimen of typography, is still sought for.

ÆGILIA, e-jíl'-e-a, a small island in Eubœa, where the Persian fleet, under Datis and Artaphernes, was moored before the battle of Marathon. It is now called Stourie.—Another in the channel which separates Cythera from Crete.

ÆGINA, e-jí'-na, daughter of Asopus, had Æacus by Jupiter changed into a flame of fire. She afterwards married Actor, son of Myrmidon, by whom she had some children, who conspired against their father. Some say that she was changed by Jupiter into the island which bears her name.

ÆGINA, or EGINA, an island in that part of the Ægean Sea which formed the Saronic gulf now the Gulf of Eginu. It was also called Œnone Œnopia, and Myrmidonia. On the conical hill called Mount Oras, are still to be seen some remains of the superb temple of Jupiter Panhellenius. The island has an area of about 40 square miles. It is mountainous. The modern town of Egina stands on the site of the ancient town, on the north-west of the island. Almonds of the finest quality are grown. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 37° 48′ N. Lon. 23° 27′ E.

ÆGINETA, PAULUS, e-ji-né-ta, a native of the island Ægina, who first noticed the cathartic quality of rhubarb. His knowledge of surgery, as shown in his works which have been preserved, was very great. His works were published at Paris in 1532, folio. Lived in the 7th century.

ÆGINHARD. é-jin-hard, the secretary of Charlemagne, beloved by Emma, the daughter of that monarch, whom he carried through the snow from his chamber, to prevent her being traced by her footsteps. Being seen by her father, however, Charlemagne consented to their union. Æginhard was a German, and wrote the life of Charlemagne, also a book of annals from 741 to 809. The first edition is that at Paris, in 1576, 2 vols. folio.
Born about 771; died about 844.

ÆGIOCUS, e-jí'-o-kus, a surname of Jupiter, from his using the skin of the goat Amalthæa instead of a shield, in the war of the Titans.

ÆGIPAN, e-jí'-pan, a name of Pan, because he had the feet of a goat.

ÆGISTHUS, e-jis'-thus, king of Argos, was son of Thyestes by his daughter Pelopea. Being left guardian of Agamemnon's kingdoms, and of his wife Clytemnestra, he fell in love with her and lived with her. They were both put to death afterwards, by Orestes, after a reign of seven years from the murder of his father Agamemnon.

ÆGLE, é-gle, a nymph, daughter of Sol and Neæra.—One of the Hesperides.—One of the Graces.

ÆGLES, é-glees, a Samian wrestler, born dumb. Seeing some unfair measures practised in a contest, he broke the string which held his tongue, through the desire of speaking, and always afterwards spoke with ease.

ÆGLETES, e-gleé-tees, a surname of Apollo.

ÆGOCEROS, e-gos'-e-ros, or CAPRICORNUS, an animal into which Pan transformed himself when flying before Typhon, in the war with the giants. Jupiter made him a constellation.

ÆGOSPOTAMOS, e-gos-pot'-ă-mos, i.e. the goat's river, a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, with a river, where the Athenian fleet, consisting of 180 ships, was defeated by Lysander, on the 13th December, B. C. 405, in the last year of the Peloponnesian war.

ÆGYPANES, e-ji-pai'-nees, a people in the middle of Africa, whose bodies were said to be human above the waist, and like that of a goat below.

ÆGYPTUS, e-jip'-tus, son of Belus, and brother to Danaus, gave his fifty sons in marriage to the fifty daughters of his brother. Danaus, who had established himself at Argos, and was jealous of his brother, obliged all his daughters to murder their husbands the first night of their nuptials. This was executed, with the exception that Hypermnestra alone spared her husband, Lynceus. Even Ægyptus was killed by his niece Polyxena. Ægyptus was king, after his father, of a part of Africa, which from him has been called Egyptus.

ÆLFRIC, el'-frik, a distinguished Saxon prelate, supposed to have been the son of an earl of Kent. He entered the monastery of Abingdon as a Benedictine, and subsequently became one of the priests of the cathedral of Winchester. He was afterwards removed to Cerne Abbey, and next was created abbot of St. Albans. His great ability was employed in the diffusion of such knowledge as the age in which he lived enabled him to possess. His principal productions are, a Saxon translation of the greater number of the historical books of the Old Testament; a Latin and Saxon Glossary: a Saxon Grammar in Latin, and two volumes of Homilies, translated from the Latin fathers. It has been doubted, however, whether he is entitled to the credit of all the works attributed to him, as there were other Saxon writers of the name. He took an active part in resisting Danish invasions.

ÆLIA CAPITOLINA, é-lie-a, a name given to a city built by the Emperor Adrian in 134, near the spot where the ancient Jerusalem stood.

ÆLIANUS, CLAUDIUS, é-le-an, an Italian historian and rhetorician, who, though he never left his native country, became so perfect in the Greek language as to write it with the greatest purity. In the reign of Antoninus he taught rhetoric at Rome, and wrote a "Varia Historia," which consists of a curious collection of anecdotes. He also wrote a valuable "History of Animals." Probably lived about the middle of the 3rd century.

ÆLIANUS, MECCIUS, é-le-a'-nus, a physician, of whom Galen speaks with great praise. He was the first who found the use of treacle to be a preventative against the plague.

ÆLIUS, é-le-us. There were several Romans of this name, the most remarkable of whom is Q. Æl. Pætus, son of Sextus, or Publius. As he sat in the senate-house, a woodpecker perched on his head: upon which a soothsayer exclaimed, that if he preserved the bird, his house would flourish, and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary must happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the presence of the senate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were soon attended with success.

ÆLIUS, SEXTUS CATUS, censor with M. Cethegus. He separated the senators from the people in the public spectacles. During his consulship, the ambassadors of the Ætolians found him feasting off earthen dishes, and offered him silver vessels, which he refused, satisfied with the others, which for his virtues he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conquest of Macedonia.

ÆLLO, ael-el-o, one of the Harpies.

ÆLST, EVERT, VAN, eelst, a Dutch painter, famous for his dead-game and fruit pieces.

Born at Delft, 1602; died 1658.

AELST, WILLIAM, VAN, Dutch painter, nephew and pupil of the preceding, and an excellent painter of fruit and flowers. Visited Italy, where some of his finest works are preserved.

Born at Delft, 1620; died at Amsterdam, 1679.

AELTERRE, al'-tair, a village in Belgium, 12 miles from Ghent. Pop. with commune, 6,000.

ÆMILIAN PROVINCES, the name given by Napoleon to Parma, Modena, and the Romagna, now a portion of the kingdom of Italy.

ÆMILIANUS, C. JULIUS, e-mil'-e-aï'-nus, a Moor, who, from the lowest station, rose to be emperor of Rome. He reigned only four months, when he was killed, in his 46th year, by his own soldiers, who then offered the crown to Valerian.

Born 208; died, 253.

ÆMILIUS, PAULUS, e-mil'-e-us, a Roman general, who was of noble family, and passed through several civil offices with reputation, until he obtained a military command, in which he acquired great glory. At the age of 46 he held the office of consul; and at 60 accepted the command of the armies against Perseus, king of Macedon, whom he made prisoner, leading him and the king of Illyria, his ally, in triumph through Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he obtained a magnificent triumph, in which Perseus and his family, as captives, led the procession. He afterwards served the office of censor. He was the father of the renowned Scipio Africanus.

Born 230 B.C.; died 160 B.C.

ÆMILIUS, PAULUS, a canon in the cathedral of Paris, who was employed thirty years in writing the history of the kings of France, which he did not live to finish. It was, however, continued by Arnold Feron, and published in 1576.

Born at Verona; died at Paris, 1529.

ÆNEAS, e-ne'-as, a Trojan prince, son of Anchises and the goddess Venus, the hero of Virgil's great epic, the "Æneid." Legend and poetry tell us that the care of his infancy was entrusted to a nymph; but at the age of five he was recalled to Troy, and placed under the inspection of Alcathous, the friend and companion of his father. He afterwards improved himself in Thessaly, under Chiron, whose house was frequented by all the young princes and heroes of the age. Soon after his return home, he married Creusa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a son, called Ascanius. During the Trojan war he behaved with great valour in defence of his country, and encountered Diomedes and Achilles. Yet he is accused, with Antenor, of betraying his country to the Greeks, and of preserving his life and fortune by this treacherous measure. When Troy was in flames, he carried away, legend says, upon his shoulders his father Anchises and the statues of his household gods, leading in his hand his son Ascanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some say that he retired to Mount Ida, where he built a fleet of twenty ships, and set sail in quest of a settlement. Strabo, on the contrary, says that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his posterity after him. Even Homer, who lived four hundred years after the Trojan war, says that the gods destined Æneas and his posterity to reign over the Trojans. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, he was sailing from Sicily to Italy, when he landed in Epirus, and was driven on the coasts of Africa, and received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom, on his first interview, he gave one of the garments of the beautiful Helen. Dido being enamoured of him, wished to marry him; but he left Carthage by order of the gods. In his voyage he passed to Cumæ, where the Sybil conducted him to hell, that he might hear from his father the fate which awaited him and all his posterity. After a voyage of seven years, and the loss of thirteen ships, he arrived in the Tiber. Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hospitality, and promised him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to King Turnus by her mother

Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war against Æneas; and after many battles, it was terminated by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whose honour he built the town of Lavinium, and succeeded his father in law. His reign was but of short duration, various accounts being given of the cause of his death. His son by Lavinia, Æneas Sylvius, was the ancestor of the Kings of Albus Longa, and of Romulus and Remus, the legendary founders of Rome. By his first wife, Creusa, he had a son, Iulus, from whom the Romans derived the Julian family. Æneas has been praised for his piety and submission to the will of the gods. The story of the loves of Dido and Æneas is allowed to be a mere poetical ornament, introduced by a violent anachronism.

ÆNEAS, GAZEUS, a disciple of the doctrines of Plato, who, becoming a convert to Christianity, wrote a dialogue on the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body. Flourished in the 5th century.—His dialogue was printed in Greek and Latin, at Basil, 1560, and at Leipsic in 1655.

ÆNEAS or ÆNGUS, an Irish bishop, who composed the history of the Old Testament in verse, and compiled, in five books, a history of Irish saints. Died 820.

ÆNEAS, TACTICUS, a Greek author, who wrote on the art of war. His work was prefixed by Casaubon to his edition of Polybius, Paris, 1609, and reprinted at Leyden in 1633. Flourished about 335 B. C.

ÆNESIDEMUS, e-ne-si-dē'-mus, a Greek sceptical philosopher and teacher, of great reputation in the first century B.C.

AENG, ang, a village of British India, province of Bengal. Near it is the best pass into the Burmese dominions. Pop. 800. Lat. 19° 50′ N. Lon. 94° 9′ E.

ÆNOBARBUS, or HAHENOBARBUS, e-no-bar'-bus, the surname of Domitius. When Castor and Pollux acquainted him with a victory, he discredited the intelligence; upon which they touched his chin and beard, which instantly became of a brazen colour; whence the surname given to himself and his descendants.

ÆOLUS, ē'-o-lus, was the son of Hippotes. He reigned over Æolus, the island Lipari, to the north of Sicily; and because he was the inventor of sails, and seems to have acquired a considerable knowledge of metcorology, the poets have called him the god of the wind. According to Virgil, Æolus was indebted to Juno for his royal dignity.

ÆPINUS, JOHN, e-pī'-nus, a Franciscan friar, a fellow-labourer with Luther and Melancthon in the great cause of the Reformation. He became a convert to Lutheranism, and pastor of St. Peter's church, Hamburg.
Born 1499; died 1553.

ÆPINUS, FRANZ MARIA ULRICH THEODOR, a distinguished electrician, who was the first to see the affinity between magnetism and electricity in its full extent, and to perceive how these may illustrate each other. He is also the inventor of the condensor of electricity and of the electropus. He published several memoirs relating to philosophical subjects, and seems to have devoted a considerable portion of his time to mechanical pursuits. Professor of physics at the Imperial Academy of Sciences, St. Petersburg.
Born at Rostock, Lower Saxony, 1724; died at Dorpat, in Livonia, 1802.

ÆQUI, a people of Italy, inhabiting the valley of the Anio, who, after long hostilities, were subdued by the Romans, 302 B.C.

ÆRIUS, ai-ē'-re-us, an Asiatic presbyter, who from being a follower of Arius (the founder of Arianism), advocated the notion that there was no distinction between bishops and presbyters, rejected prayer for the dead, and refused to observe Easter and stated fasts, and procured many followers, who were named Aërians. Flourished in Sebastia, Pontus, in the 4th century.

ÆROE or ARROE, ā'-e-ro, a Danish island in the duchy of Schleswig, about 14 miles long and 5 broad. It lies 10 miles S. of Fuhnen, and is possessed of a good soil, which is carefully cultivated. Pop. 11,000.

ÆROESKIOBING, ā'-e-rō'-es-ke-ō-bang, the capital of the above island, where shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 2,000.

ÆRSCHOT, ar-shot, a town of Belgium, 23 miles from Brussels. Pop. 4,000.

ÆRSCHOT, DUKE OF, a noble of the Netherlands, celebrated in the struggle of the Dutch republic against Philip of Spain. He refused to join the league that was formed against Cardinal Granvelle (archbishop of Mechlin), the governor of the Netherlands. He was governor of Antwerp, and subsequently of Flanders; but the treachery of his disposition made him no favourite with the people, who took him prisoner and confined him at Ghent for a long period. Lived in the middle of the 16th century.

ÆRTRYKE, ar-treek, a village and commune of West Flanders, 8 miles from Bruges. Pop. 3,000.

ÆRTSZ, RYKAERB, Dutch historical painter. Son of a fisherman, but having lost a leg by accident, studied art. Became a member of the Academy of Antwerp.
Born at Ayck, 1482; died at Antwerp, 1577.

ÆRTSZEN, PIETER, Dutch historical painter. Well known for his altar-pieces. Nicknamed Long Peter, and described by Italian writers as Pietro Lungo. Three of his sons attained eminence as painters.
Born at Amsterdam, 1520; died there, 1573.

ÆRZEELE, ar-zeel, a village and commune in West Flanders, 15 miles from Courtrai. Pop. 3,300.

ÆRZEN, ar-zen, a town of Hanover, where there are powder manufactories, 5 miles from Hameln. Pop. 1,200.

ÆSCHINES, ē'-ski-nees, a disciple of Socrates and the son of a sausage-maker. He went to the court of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, and afterwards maintained himself by keeping a school at Athens. His dialogues so closely resemble those of Socrates, that Menedemus charges him with having stolen them from the philosopher. Only three of his dialogues are extant, of which Le Clerc published a Latin translation, with notes, in 1711.
Flourished B.C. 350.

ÆSCHINES, usually distinguished as "the Orator," was the contemporary and rival of Demosthenes. He was first a schoolmaster, then a clerk, then an actor, and finally a political orator. Having brought an unfounded accusation against Ctesiphon, he was compelled to quit Athens, and founded a school of eloquence in Rhodes. There are only three of his orations extant, which are exquisitely beautiful.
Born in Attica, B.C. 389; died at Samos, 315.

ÆSCHRION, ē-skre-on, a poet of Mitylene, intimate with Aristotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic expedition.—Another iambic poet of Samos.

ÆSCHYLUS, é-ski-lus, the father of the Athenian drama. The records of his life are imperfect, but it appears that he was descended from a noble family. He was in the sea-fight at Salamis, and received a wound on the plains of Marathon. His most solid fame, however, rests on his powers as a tragic poet. Of ninety tragedies produced by him, forty were rewarded with the public prize, but only seven have come down to us. He was the first to introduce two actors on the stage, and to clothe them with dresses suitable to their character. He likewise removed murder from the sight of the audience. He decorated the theatre with the best paintings of the time, and the ancient, like the modern stage, exhibited temples, sepulchres, armies, fleets, flying cars, and apparitions. His actors wore the cothurnus or boot which added to their natural height, and he gave them masks to augment the natural sounds of their voices. The priests accused him before the Areopagus of bringing upon the stage the mysteries of religion; but the wounds he had received at Marathon pleaded his cause and obtained his acquittal. It is fabled that an eagle mistaking his bald head for a stone, as he slept in a field, dropped upon it a tortoise, which instantly killed him. His imagination was strong but wild, vast in its conceptions, but greatly dealing in improbabilities, and aiming to make his language accord with the colossal persons of his drama, he is frequently obscure.

Born at Eleusis, Attica, 525 B.C.; died at Gela, Sicily, 457 B.C.

ÆSCULAPIUS, e-sku-lā'-pe-us, represented by some of the Greek poets as a son of Apollo, was taught the art of medicine by Chiron, and became physician to the Argonauts. He restored many to life, of which Pluto complained to Jupiter, who struck Æsculapius with thunder. Æsculapius received divine honours after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs, were sacrificed to him, and the cock and the serpent were sacred to him. Æsculapius is represented with a large beard, holding a staff round which a serpent is wreathed. He married Epione, by whom he had two sons, famous for their medicinal skill, and four daughters, of whom Hygeia, the goddess of health, was one. A priestly caste of physicians, the Asclepiadæ, claimed to be her descendants. Some have supposed that he lived a short time after the Trojan war.

ÆSOP, é-sop, the fable writer, is commonly held as the inventor of those short pieces of moral wisdom with which the readers of all ages, since his time, have been delighted. He is said to have been first bought as a slave by an Athenian, from whom he learned the Greek language, and then passed successively into the service of Xanthus and Idmon, both of Samos. The latter gave him his freedom, on which he was retained by Crœsus. The places and time of his birth and death are both uncertain. He was contemporary, however, with Solon and Pisistratus; therefore flourished in the 6th century B.C.—Many of the fables attributed to him are nearly identical with those attributed to Lokman and other Eastern authors.

ÆSOP, the author of a romantic history of Alexander the Great, in Greek, which has been translated into Latin and German. The age in which he lived is unknown.

ÆSOPUS, CLAUDIUS, e-só'-pus, a famous actor, who had the honour of instructing Cicero in oratory. He was a great epicure, and at an entertainment is said to have had a dish of singing birds which cost above 800*l*. His son was also noted for his luxuriousness; and Horace says that he swallowed a pearl of great value dissolved in vinegar.

Died worth 160,000*l*., 60 years B.C.

ÆTHERIUS, e-thé'-re-us, an architect of Constantinople, who is supposed to have built the wall which runs from the sea to Selimbria, to keep out the Bulgarians and Scythians. Lived in the 6th century.

ÆTION, é-she-on, a Greek painter, whose picture of the nuptials of Alexander and Roxana, shown at the Olympic games, obtained for him the daughter of Proxenidas, one of the judges, in marriage, although he was quite unknown.

ÆTIUS, a-é'-she-us, a famous general, sometimes spoken of as "the last of the Romans," in the reign of Valentinian III., emperor of the West. He was brought up in the emperor's guards, and after the battle of Pollentia, in 403, was delivered as a hostage to Alaric, and next to the Huns. On the death of Honorius, he took the side of the usurper John, for whose service he engaged an army of Huns. He was afterwards taken into favour by Valentinian, who gave him the title of count. Being jealous of the power of Boniface, governor of Africa, he secretly advised his recall, and at the same time counselled the governor not to obey the mandate. This produced a revolt, which caused an irruption of the Vandals into that province. The treachery of Aëtius being discovered, a war ensued between him and Boniface, in which the latter was slain. Aëtius now appealed to the Huns, of whom he raised a large army, and returning, so greatly alarmed Placidia, the mother of Valentinian, that she put herself into his power. He defended the declining empire with great bravery, and compelled Attila to retire beyond the Rhine. Stabbed, 454, by Valentinian.—This crime was committed under the conviction that Aëtius entertained a design upon the throne of the emperor.

ÆTIUS, a bishop of Antioch, who, before entering into orders, was a physician, and remarkable for a contentious and sceptical spirit. He contended for a dissimilarity between the Father and the Son, for which he was banished by Constantius, but recalled by Julian. His followers were named Ætians.

Died at Constantinople, 367.

ÆTIUS, a physician of Mesopotamia, who wrote a comprehensive treatise on medicine, comprising all the medical and surgical knowledge of his time, and other works, which are extant in Greek. Flourished in the 6th century.

ÆTNA. (See ETNA.)

ÆTOLIA, e-tó'-lia, a province of ancient Greece, bounded on the west by Acarnania, on the north by Thessaly, on the east by the country of the Locri and Ozolæ, and on the south by the Corinthian gulf. It received its name from Ætolus. The inhabitants were covetous and illiberal, and were little known in Greece, till after the ruin of Athens and Sparta, when they assumed a consequence in the country, and afterwards made themselves formidable as the allies of Rome, and then as its enemies, till they were conquered by Fulvius. It is very mountainous; but rye, barley, and olives are cultivated along the side of the Corinthian gulf. With Acarnania, it now forms a division in the kingdom of Greece. Its principal river is the Phidaris. In this province is also Mount Oxea, which reaches an elevation of 4,636 feet in its highest point. Missolonghi is its capital, and Lepanto is the next town in importance.

Lat. between 38° 7′ and 38° 50′ N. Lon. between 21° 10′ and 22° 5′ E.

AFER, DOMITIUS, af-fer, an ancient orator, who obtained the prætorship of Rome; but being disappointed of further promotion, he became an informer against Claudia Pulchra, cousin of Agrippa, and by his abilities succeeded in gaining the favour of Tiberius. He wrote an inscription, which he affixed to a statue of Caligula, and which embodied the remark that he had been a second time consul at the age of twenty-two. This was meant for an encomium, but the emperor took it as a sarcasm, and made a violent speech in the senate against the author. Afer, instead of replying, supplicated pardon, saying that he feared less the power of the emperor than his eloquence, which flattery so pleased Caligula, that he raised him to the consular dignity.

Born at Nismes; died at Rome, A.D. 60.

AFFLITTO, MATHEW, ăf-flē-to, a distinguished lawyer of Italy.

Born at Naples; died 1673.—He wrote several works on Neapolitan law.

AFFO, IRENEO, Italian critic and historian. A Franciscan monk, and professor of Philosophy, and librarian of the Ducal library at Parma. Author of many historical, biographical, and literary works of great value, and a volume of sonnets published under an assumed name.

Born at Basseto, 1741; died there, 1797.

AFFRE, DENIS AUGUSTE, affr, a French student at the seminary of St. Sulpice, who rose to be archbishop of Paris. Affre fell whilst endeavouring to prevent bloodshed between the soldiery and Parisian insurgents during the Revolution of 1848. Although previously warned by General Cavaignac of the danger to be apprehended from appearing amongst an excited mob, he replied, that "his life was of small consequence," and, preceded by a man in a workman's dress, with a green branch, as an emblem of peace, in his hand, he went forth to stay the fury of the combatants. Some of the crowd who beheld him thought they were betrayed, and he was soon shot down. When he fell, he was surrounded by many of the insurgents, who blamed the Garde Mobile for the act, and on whom they vowed to avenge him. He, however, exclaimed, "No, no, my friends, blood enough has been shed; let mine be the last on this occasion." He was the author, besides theological works, of a treatise on Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Born at St. Reney, 1793; died, 1848.

AFFRIQUE, ST., af-freek, a town of France, 29 miles from Rhodez, which trades in Roquefort cheese. Pop. with commune, 7,000.

AFFRY, COUNT D', LOUIS AUGUSTE PHILIPPE, af-fre, a statesman of Switzerland, who rose to the chief magistracy of his country, after Napoleon I. became protector of the Helvetic confederacy. He was a true patriot, and did all that he could to resist the power of the French; but finding his efforts unavailing, he embraced the views of Napoleon, and gave his assistance in forming a new government in accordance with the theories of that conqueror.

Born at Friburg, 1743; died 1810.

AFGHANISTAN, ăf-gan'-is-tăn, or ăf-ga-nis'-tan, a country of Asia, lying to the N.W. of Hindostan. On the east it is bounded by the Punjab; on the south by Beloochistan; on the north by independent Turkestan; and on the west by Persia.

Area, estimated at 212,000 square miles.

Description.—By far the greater part of this vast region is mountainous. It may be generally described as an extensive tableland, considerably elevated above the neighbouring countries. The eastern ridge, known as the Suliman mountains, having an elevation of 6,000 feet, descends abruptly towards the Indus, leaving only a narrow tract at the base, and forming an impenetrable barrier, except at three places—the Khyber Pass, disastrously memorable in history, through which the Cabul river flows into the Indus, the Gomul Pass, and the Bholan Pass into Scinde, farther south. The northern and western portion of Afghanistan is traversed by enormous mountain ranges. The Hindoo Coosh mountains (an extension of the great Kuenluen range of Central Asia, which forms the northern boundary of Tibet, and extends eastwards to the Chinese Empire) run nearly east and west, forming the northern boundary of Afghanistan, and attaining an elevation of from 15,000 to 20,000 feet, the summits being covered with perpetual snow. Near the north-eastern angle of the country, this great range meets an extension of the Himalayas at about equal elevation. Other mountains are the Pughman, divided into two parallel ridges, nearly 3,000 feet high, running from north to south, and enclosing a valley 10,000 feet above the sea level. The Koh-i-Bala mountains run due west, attaining an elevation in some places of more than 15,000 feet. An area of about 50,000 square miles in the north-west is occupied by the Hazarak and Eimack mountains (the Paropasimus of the old Greek geographers), some portions of which have an elevation of 10,000 feet. The Valley of Cabul, beginning at the base of the Pughman mountains, has a length of nearly 200 miles, terminating at the banks of the Indus, the southern limit of the valley being the Khyber mountains of moderate elevation. At the western end this valley is 10,000 feet above the sea level; but it gradually sinks to about 750 feet as it approaches the Indus. In the centre and south of the country are two vast districts, known as the Tableland of Ghuznee and Candahar, with an elevation varying from 7,000 to 10,000 feet, and the southern tableland, which sinks into the great desert of Beloochistan. In the west is the territory of Herat, extending to Persia. The inferior mountain-ranges diminish in proportion to their distance from the principal chains, and, bosomed amongst them, are to be found some of the most fertile and beautiful valleys in the world. In these, vegetation is of the same kind as that of India generally; consisting of cotton, rice, millet, maize, turmeric, and sugar-cane. In the higher lands, the various species of the fruits, herbs, and woods of Europe grow wild, and wheat, barley, beans, turnips, and several artificial grasses, are cultivated with success. The chief towns are CANDAHAR, CABUL, GHUZNEE, HERAT, and JELLALABAD.

Rivers.—The principal are the Cabul, Koorum, Helmund, Kashrood, Gomal, and Lora, all partaking, more or less of the character of mountain torrents,—now swelling and rushing rapidly, or becoming all but stagnant in some parts, in accordance with the changes of the seasons.

Climate.—According to its latitude, it should be decidedly hot, but, on account of the inequality and height of its surface, the climate varies, the cold being intense in winter.

Minerals.—The country is supposed to be rich in minerals, and at one time silver was worked extensively. Lead, zinc, sulphur, coal, iron, and copper are also known to exist in considerable quantities.

Inhabitants.—The Afghans, who form only about a third of the entire population, are a robust hardy race, of Circassian origin, generally addicted to predatory warfare. All the large towns are inhabited chiefly by Persians and Hindoos, as the Afghans never engage in trade. About one-third of the people of the region of the Hazareh and Eimack mountains are of Mongul race. In Cabul there are some Arab settlers. The Afreedis, a very warlike race, occupy the Khyber hills. The number of the entire population is estimated at nearly 10,000,000.

Manufactures and Commerce.—Woollen stuffs, carpets, silk, felt, sword-blades, fire-arms, and jewellery. Commerce is carried on by caravans: camels in the plains; asses and mules in the mountains. The chief exports are from Peshawer, iron, assafœtida, maddar, tobacco, furs, horses, ponies (to Punjab), and fruits.

Lat. between 28° and 36° N. Lon. between 62° and 73° E.

History.—The Afghans call themselves Pooshanneh, and trace their origin to the son of Saul, king of Israel; they are no doubt identical with the fierce and warlike inhabitants of the hilly country to the west of the Suliman mountains, mentioned by Herodotus. Their country formed a part of the old Persian empire, and subsequently was included in the Syrian and Bactrian kingdoms. The Moguls possessed it for about 150 years, and Timour and Babr afterwards included it in their wide-spread dominions. The Afghans first appeared an independent power, about the year 1720, when an army of Afghans invaded Persia, took Ispahan, and made the sultan, Husseyn, prisoner. They kept possession of Ispahan and the southern provinces for ten years, when they were defeated in several battles, and driven out of the country by Nadir Kuli, commonly known in Europe by the name of Kuli Khan, who brought the whole country of Afghanistan under his sovereignty in 1737, and retained it until his death in 1747. The following are the leading events in the subsequent history of Afghanistan:

Ahmed Shah, after the assassination of Nader, establishes an independent kingdom	1747
Runjeet Singh, the Sikh chief of Lahore, conquers a large portion of the country	1818
Dost Mohammed becomes ruler	1820
England supports his rival, Shah Sujai, and declares war. English troops enter Cabul and Dost Mohammed surrenders	1838
Terrible massacre of the English at the Khyber Pass, by order of Akbar Khan, son of Dost Mohammed	1842
Alliance with the Sikhs against the English	1846
English victory at Guzerat and flight of Dost Mohamed across the Indus	1849
Dost Mohammed dies, and appoints one of his younger sons, Shere Ali, his successor	1863
British troops enter the country and establish a new frontier to the west of the passes	1879
Yakoob Khan succeeds his father Shere Ali	1879
Revolt and murder of the British resident at Cabul	1879
Military operations by the Indian and British armies under Gen. Roberts	1879-80
Abdul Rahman recognised as Ameer. July 22,	1880
Ayoob Kahn is finally defeated and flees into Persia Oct.	1881
Negotiations for determining North West boundary, recommenced early in	1884
Misunderstandings as to boundary lead to warlike demonstrations by England and Russia early in	1885
State meeting between the Ameer and the Governor-General of India early in April	1885
Agreement between England and Russia soon after arrived at, and determination of boundary proceeded	1885-86

AFIOM KARA HISSAR, a'-fe-om ka'-ra his'-sar, a city of Asiatic Turkey, in the pashalic of Anatolia, takes its name from afiom, which signifies the opium poppy, and kara hissar, 'the black castle,' round which it is built, on the southern side of a fertile plain, in Asia Minor. Manf. Fire-arms, sabres, and tapestry; but the principal articles of trade are opium and madder, which are raised in the neighbourhood. Pop. about 60,000. Lat. 38° 44′ N. Lon. 30° 40′ E.

AFRAGOLA, a'-fra-go'-la, a Neapolitan town, where straw bonnets are largely made. It is six miles from Naples. Pop. 16,500.

AFRANIA, a-fra'-ne-a, the inventor of the bassoon. He flourished at Ferrara in the 16th century.

AFRANIUS, Lucius, a-fra'-ne-us, a Roman comic poet, who wrote some witty but licentious Latin comedies, of which only a few fragments remain.—Flourished about 100 years B.C.

AFRANIUS, Lucius, a Roman general and adherent of Pompey against Cæsar. Consul at Rome. Taken prisoner after the battle of Pharsalia, and put to death by Cæsar's soldiers.

Died, 46 B.C.

AFRANIUS, a senator of Rome, who was put to death by Nero for having written a satire against him.

AFRICA, one of the great divisions of the world, and, if we consider North and South America as distinct, the second in point of size, being in that respect inferior only to Asia, and about three times the size of Europe. Much less is known of the interior of this great continent than of any other portion of the world. Portions of Africa have been known from remote antiquity, and Egypt especially figures largely in the world's history, but of the vast country in the interior we have but a partial knowledge, and that gained by the labours and sufferings of intrepid explorers chiefly during the present century. That Central Africa has been so long an unknown land, while almost every other portion of the earth's surface has been explored, is no doubt due to the intense heat and unhealthy climate of the known coast regions and the absence of motives other than those arising from the spirit of scientific research or missionary zeal to encourage explorers to undertake mysterious and apparently dangerous and unprofitable adventures. The New World beyond the Atlantic presenting some of the same climatic conditions has been explored by armies led by daring and experienced adventurers, and animated by the hope of discovering illimitable riches. They found there wealthy and powerful empires which they conquered, founding new States, governed and chiefly peopled by Europeans. But Central Africa has been explored, so far as it has been explored, by individuals, whose courage and zeal led them to attempt the solution of geographical problems, or whose sporting propensities led them into unknown regions in pursuit of larger game than Europe afforded. European governments contented themselves with a few scattered settlements on the coast, at which merchants traded with native chiefs for gold, ivory, palm oil, and slaves, caring nothing for the sources or courses of the great rivers which were only known to them at their mouths as discharging into the sea through pestilential swamps of the districts whence came the articles they traded in, or of the people who dwelt there. Some native kingdoms, where the most bloodthirsty forms of savagery were practised, were known by the frequent wars waged between them and the white settlers, and a few native chiefs, or kings, who in grotesque state, bartered slaves captured in inland villages, for rum, tobacco, and gunpowder, represented to the European traders on the west coast the aboriginal population of this great division of the globe. On the east coast were settlements in which a similar trade was carried on, but more extensively; the agents of the traffic, principally in slaves, being men of Arab descent, who made armed raids into the interior, destroying native villages, and carrying off the population, with such gold dust and ivory as they could collect to supply the Portuguese merchants who had settlements at Zanzibar and other points of the coast. Arab traders, too, penetrated from Nubia towards the great central region for the purposes of a similar trade carried on with Egypt and the Red Sea ports. We shall mention in detail, farther on, the efforts which have been made by individual explorers to reach the interior of the great continent, and solve some of the great problems which are of the highest interest to geographers.

Physical Characteristics.—Africa is in shape more compact than Europe, Asia, and North America, and may be described generally as composed of two portions of nearly equal dimensions, but having very different geographical characteristics. The northern half is an irregular oval; the southern a triangle. The more prominent feature of the northern portion, sometimes described as Lower Africa, is a vast sandy desert enclosed on the north by lofty mountains, on the south by mountains and fertile districts, and separated on the east from the alluvial valley of the Nile by an elevated limestone ridge. The southern half of the continent, High Africa, is an elevated table land, with lofty ranges of mountains in the south and north-east, and a magnificent system of lakes, with which we are as yet but imperfectly acquainted. A fringe of low swampy coast is on the eastern and western sides of this immense plateau; but farther south are bold headlands, marking the termination of the lofty ranges in Cape Colony and Caffraria. Between the Great Desert of the north and the well watered and productive plateau of the south is a broad belt of alluvial land known generally as the Soudan, extending across the entire continent, from Senegambia on the west to the mountains of Abyssinia on the east. These mountains mark the south-eastern limit of the long narrow valley through which the famous Nile (the source of the main branch of which has been the geographical puzzle of three centuries, and is yet unsolved) finds its way to the Mediterranean. The table-lands of Abyssinia are the north-eastern limits of the great southern plateau, which slopes more gradually at the part where the Nile forms the rapids above Gondokoro. On the eastern side the Nile valley is separated from the Red Sea by a range of hills of moderate elevation. To the north of the Great Desert are the Atlas mountains, which divide it from the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, a tract partaking of many of the physical characteristics of Southern Europe, and known to geographers as the Tell. It is customary to accept large inlets of the sea as natural boundaries, and consequently, by common consent, the Mediterranean is considered the northern, and the Red Sea as the north-eastern boundary of Africa. If physical characteristics regulated boundaries, it would be more correct to include the countries north of the Atlas range in Europe, and Arabia (now included in Asia) as really a portion of Africa, to which in many respects it bears affinity. Africa is a peninsula, united to Asia by the Isthmus of Suez, about 74 miles in breadth. At the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, the Asian and African continents are only separated by about 15 miles of sea, and the Straits of Gibraltar, at one place not more than 18 miles wide, divide the African continent from the most southerly headland of Europe. Geologists entertain very little doubt that at some remote period the mountain ranges of Central and South Africa enclosed vast inland seas, of which the existing lakes and marshes, from Lake Tchad in the Soudan to Lake Ngami in the South, were presumably the deepest portions. Livingstone felt quite satisfied with the evidence of the former existence of a vast lake in the district surrounding Ngami. Great natural convulsions have produced upheavals, enormous cavities or rifts, and valleys through which the great rivers now find their way to the sea. The most wonderful of the results of these great convulsions, due most probably to volcanic agency, is the great rift at right angles to the original course of the Zambesi, into which that river falls abruptly, forming the most stupendous cataract in the world. At a later epoch, the vast tract in the north known as Sahara or the Great Desert, was doubtless a large inland sea, an inlet of the Atlantic, the coast of which the desert now approaches between the 30th parallel of North latitude and the Senegal river.

Dimensions.—The extreme northern point of Africa is Ras-el-Krun, on the Mediterranean; the most southern, Cape das Agulhas (Cape Needles) in Cape Colony, and the distance between these two points is about 5,000 miles. The extreme western point is Cape Verde, and the eastern Cape Guardafui, at the entrance of the Gulf of Aden, showing the greatest breadth of the continent to be about 4,500 miles. The coast line is remarkably unbroken, and can therefore be estimated with greater accuracy than that of Europe or North Africa, which are indented by great bays and gulfs, and innumerable irregularities. It is about 16,000 miles in length. Taking the delta of the Nile as the starting point, it stretches westwards to Tunis, when it turns abruptly north for nearly 250 miles to Ras-el-Krun, from which point it again runs west to Ceuta, opposite Gibraltar, from which it makes a bold sweep in a south-western direction to Cape Verde, and then bends towards the south-east, past Sierra Leone to Cape Palmas, beyond which it runs for more than a thousand miles to the Bight of Benin. Thence the line of coast runs, with little variation, nearly due south, to the Cape of Good Hope, and Cape Agulhas, then eastwards to Algoa Bay, turning northward for a long stretch of 4,000 miles, to Cape Guardafui. The Gulf of Aden, on the southern side of which the African coast line has a length of about 600 miles, leads to the Red Sea, the north-eastern boundary of Africa, which is a length from Bab-el-Mandeb to Suez of 1,400 miles. The area of Africa, including the adjacent islands, which geographically belong to it, is nearly 12,000,000 square miles.

Islands.—MADAGASCAR, except Australia and Borneo, the largest island in the world, is separated from the African continent by the Mozambique Channel, 250 miles wide at its narrowest part. It is fully described under its proper heading. Zanzibar and Pemba are small islands also off the eastern coast, and at a much greater distance, the SEYCHELLES, the AMIRANTE Islands, BOURBON and MAURITIUS, are considered as belonging to Africa. The CANARY and CAPE VERDE Islands, in the North Atlantic also belong to Africa, and the Bissagos, off the coast of Senegambia; Fernando Po, in the Bight of Biafra, and Prince's Island, St. Thomas, and Annabon, in the Gulf of Guinea, are small islands off the western coast.

Mountains.—The Atlas mountain system occupies the north-western portion of the African continent, and extends with minor elevations and terraces throughout Morocco, Algiers and Tunis, forming a natural division between the Mediterranean Sea and the Great Desert. The principal chain begins at Cape Ghir, rising nearly perpendicularly to a great height, on the shores of the Atlantic Ocean, in 30° 35′ N. lat., and extends nearly due eastward towards the city of Morocco, where it turns in a nearly northernly direction, and attains its greatest elevation, again turning to the east and declining in height as it approaches the Mediterranean. The chain then crosses the boundary between Morocco and Algiers, and runs near, and nearly parallel with, the sea coast. Some of the principal peaks of this range of the Greater Atlas, as this portion of the system is generally named, reach considerably above the snow line, and it has been estimated that they attain an elevation of from 14,000 to 15,000 feet, about the height of the loftiest summits of the European Alps. But the only peak which has been accurately measured is the Miltzin (about 27 miles to the south-east of the town of Morocco,) which has been found to rise to 11,400 feet above the sea level. It is free from snow only once in about twenty years. Mount Henteb, nearer the Algerian frontier, is believed to be of greater elevation. Nearer the Mediterranean is a smaller range, known as the Lesser Atlas, an offshoot of which extends westward, terminating in the bold headland of Ceuta (Jebel d'Azute, "mountain of monkeys") opposite Gibraltar, and in Cape Spartel. In no part is the range more than 2,500 feet high. South of the Greater Atlas, are various spurs and ranges of the mountain system of inferior elevation, stretching towards the Great Desert. Old geographers affirmed the existence of a vast mountain range, which they named the Mountains of the Moon, stretching across the continent, a few degrees to the north of the equator. More accurate knowledge, gained from the explorations which have recently taken place, disproves the existence of these mountains, as laid down in our maps until a very recent period, while making known magnificent ranges, almost rivalling the Asiatic known magnificent ranges, almost rivalling the Asiatic Himalayas or the Andes of South America. The Kong Mountains, running parallel with the coast of Guinea, are not a connected chain, but isolated hills, the loftiest of which is not more than 7,000 feet above the sea level; and to the north-east are mountains of which very little is accurately known. They mark the northern limit of the great plateau of High Africa, and Mounts Alantika and Mindif, to the south of Lake Tchad, are supposed to be respectively 10,000 and 6,000 feet high. The Cameroon Mountains, forming almost a parallelogram, and occupying an area of about 380 square miles, between 3° 57′ and 4° 20′ N. lat., and 9° and 9° 25′ E. long., may be described as forming the north-western angle of the great elevated table land of the southern portion of the continent, or High Africa. They have been highly recommended by Captain Burton as a sanatorium for Europeans engaged on the unhealthy coast. The principal summit, Pia Grande, is 13,129 feet above the sea level; and Mount Victoria and Mount Albert are nearly as high. The group is of volcanic origin. On Mount Victoria is an extinct double crater, 200 feet deep, and 1,000 feet in diameter: smoke jets with a strong odour of sulphur are thrown up on the sides of Mount Albert; and many extinct cones are scattered throughout the range. Several lesser ranges mark the western edge of the great table land, approaching to within 40 or 50 miles of the coast; and there are several lofty mountains in Damara Land, and Great and Little Namqua Land, Mount Omatoko, in Damara, reaching an altitude of 8,800 feet. Between the 20th and 22nd degree of S. latitude, there is a depression around Lake Ngami, but farther south the surface rises into a mountainous district. South of the Orange River and extending into Cape Colony, are the Nieuwveld (New Forest) and the Sneeuwberg (Snow Mountains), with a general elevation of from 4,000 to 7,000 feet. The summit of Mount Compassberg, the highest peak of the colony, is 10,200 feet above the sea level. Farther south, the great Karoo plains have an average elevation of nearly 4,000 feet, and towards the south-east there is an offshoot, attaining in the Winterberg a height of 7,800 feet. From the Cape Colony and Natal, there is an extensive plateau, averaging from 5,000 to 7,000 feet in elevation, towards the eastern side of the continent, occupying a considerable portion of the Orange River Free State and the Transvaal Republic. The Witteberg and the Drachenberg Mountains are included in this region, which, north of the Limpopo river, widens out to upwards of 400 miles, and is intersected by the great Zambesi river. To the east of the river Shiré and Lake Shirwa, is the Milanaje range, about 7,000 feet high, and to the west of the lake, Mount Zomba, 8,000 feet. Farther north are various plateaux and ranges, rising between the 4th and 1st parallels of S. latitude into the loftiest mountains of Africa, the Kilimandjaro range, the highest peak of which, giving name to the group, has an elevation of 18,715 feet above the sea, the summit being covered with perpetual snow, Mount Kenia, is 16,500 feet, and Mount Meru, an extinct volcano, 13,000 feet in height. On the western shore of Lake Albert Nyassa are the Blue Mountains, with an apparent altitude of 10,000 feet, probably uniting with the Balegga Mountains north-west of Lake Tanganyika. The mountains of Abyssinia, the loftiest peak Abba Jared, having an elevation of 15,000 feet, may be considered as a northern prolongation of the great eastern range.

Rivers.—Nearly all the largest and most important rivers rise in the great table-land of Central and Southern Africa, which we have so frequently mentioned. The principal branch of the NILE, (the Bahr-el-Abiad, or White Nile) and the CONGO, the great river of Central Africa, are now ascertained to rise in or near the group of great lakes lying to the south of the Equator. In the same region rises the ZAMBESI, which nearly crosses the continent, from the west to its four mouths in the Mozambique Channel, and is remarkable for the wonderful Victoria Fall; and its affluent, the Shiré, in which are the remarkable Murchison Cataracts. Farther south are the Limpopo, and other smaller streams rising on the slopes of the great eastern range of mountains we have described, and discharging into the Mozambique Channel and the Indian Ocean. Other rivers flowing into the Indian Ocean are the Rovuma, Rufiji, the Juba (the largest north of the Equator), Leeba, and the Leeambye, which unite their waters. Three small rivers, the Zondag, Zwartkop, and Kowie, discharge into Algoa Bay. The Orange or Garriep, or Great River, the largest river of Africa south of the tropic of Capricorn, rises in the highlands of the Transvaal Republic, and after a winding course, flows into the South Atlantic Ocean, near the 32nd parallel of S. latitude. The eastern branch of the Nile (the Bahr-el-Asrah, or Blue Nile,) rises among the mountains of Abyssinia, uniting with the White Nile at Khartoum in Nubia, from which point the river follows a winding course with many cataracts, till it reaches Egypt, through which it flows in a direct line to the Delta, by which it discharges into the Mediterranean. The Congo or Zaire, the largest river of Central Africa, falls into the Atlantic about 5 degrees south of the equator. The Gaboon enters the Atlantic near the equator. The mountainous district to the north of Guinea forms the watershed of several large and numerous smaller rivers discharging into the Atlantic. The most important are the Senegal, which runs in a curved direction through Senegambia, entering the Atlantic north of Cape Verde, and the Gambia, which discharges at a point further south. Each of these rivers has cataracts in the upper course. Rising on the eastern and northern slopes of the same region about 9° 25′ N. lat., and 9° 45′ W. lon., are the affluents of the NIGER, Joliba, or Quorra, next to the Nile and Congo, the most important of African rivers. The course is at first north-east, until Timbuctoo is reached, when the river bends to the east, and then descends in a south-easterly direction into the Gulf of Guinea, to the east of the Bight of Benin. The entire length of the course of this great river is about 2,500 miles, and it has been navigated for a distance of 400 miles from its mouth. Several smaller rivers, among them the Prah, also fall into the Gulf of Guinea. In the Atlas region are several rivers of minor importance—the Mejerdah, which falls into the Mediterranean, near Tunis, and the Molooyah, within the territory of Morocco, The Wad Sebov, the Com, and other small rivers discharge into the Atlantic, and several streams flowing south are lost in the sand of the Sahara.

Lakes.—The largest lake of Northern Africa is Tchad, or Tsad, in the Soudan, near the southern border of the Great Desert, lying in the centre of a marshy district, and subject to periodical variations of size according to the seasons. The Shari, which, in the rainy season, is three quarters of a mile wide, and other streams flow into it, but there is no visible outlet. The water is fresh and abounds with fish. The average circumference of this lake is about 400 miles, and it has an elevation of 850 feet above the sea level. A much smaller lake to the east, Lake Dembea, or Tzana, in Abyssinia, through which the Blue Nile flows, is 6,000 feet above the sea level, 65 miles long and 30 broad. A magnificent chain of large lakes, chiefly discovered by Speke, Baker, Burton, and Livingstone, extends from about the 5th degree of north latitude to the region watered by the Zambesi and its tributaries. These large lakes have as yet been very imperfectly surveyed, but approximate estimates of their dimensions have been made. Victoria Nyanza is about 250 miles long and of nearly equal breadth. Farther north is the Albert Nyanza, about 300 miles long, and where crossed by the equator at least 90 miles wide. It has been suggested, and with an appearance of probability, that the Victoria and Albert Nyanza are really portions of one immense lake. Farther south is Lake Tanganyika, a long and comparatively narrow lake, explored by Livingstone, Stanley, and Cameron, and supposed to communicate with the larger lakes mentioned. The surface of Tanganyika is 2,710 feet above the sea level, and Cameron estimates the entire length at about 400 miles, with a breadth varying from 25 to 50 miles. He thinks that the principal outlet of the lake is the river Lukuga on the western side, nearly under the 6th parallel of south latitude, and supposed to flow into the Lualaba. At some parts of the east coast of the lake the country rises to a height of 1,000 feet, and on the west coast there are mountains estimated to be about 2,500 feet high. Shortly before his death, Livingstone penetrated to the west, and discovered other large lakes, to one of which he gave the name of Lincoln. Some of these lakes will, in all probability prove to be the head waters of the Nile and of the Congo, and several expeditions are now engaged in endeavouring to ascertain the hydrographical features of this interesting region. North of the Zambesi, and about 350 miles inland from the Mozambique coast, and 1,200 above the sea level is Lake Nyassa, which is more than 200 miles in length, and at its widest part, 60 miles in breadth, and from the southern extremity flows the Shiré, an affluent of the Zambesi. To the east of the Shiré, is Lake Shirwa, 1,800 feet above the sea level, and about 70 miles long by 20 broad. Lake Ngami, which we have mentioned as the centre of the depressed region between the Zambesi and the Orange Rivers, is 2,500 feet above the sea level, 70 miles long and 20 broad.

The Great Desert.—The extensive region known as the Sahara, extends from the Atlas mountains in the north, and farther east to the Mediterranean, nearly to the Senegal, the northern bend of the Niger and Lake Tchad on the south, from the Atlantic on the west to the limestone ranges, which form the western edge of the boundary of the Nile valley, a length of about 2,000 miles, the average breadth from north to south being about half that distance. The surface forms a series of table-lands, sinking towards the north by a succession of terraces. Rain never falls over some portions of this extensive region, the result being sterility. Towards the north especially, are extensive tracts of sand which is raised into the air by the frequent and violent storms of wind, forming those terrible sand clouds so fatal to travellers; but a considerable portion of the desert consists of firm hard soil, composed of indurated sand, sandstone, granite, and quartz. Some hilly ridges in some parts intersect the arid plain, particularly in the eastern part, or the Libyan Desert, as it is generally named, and in many places, owing to the presence of underground springs, are fertile tracts, oases, "green islands in a sea of sand," and some of these are very extensive, having villages with thousands of inhabitants. A considerable mercantile traffic between Morocco, Tripoli and Timbuctoo, and other places in the Soudan is carried on by means of caravans, sometimes consisting of more than a thousand camels with their attendants, the easiest route being from Tripoli through Fezzan to the neighbourhood of Lake Tchad.

Climate.—More than three-fourths of Africa lie within the tropics. It is the hottest and driest of all the great divisions of the earth; it has only two seasons, a wet and a dry. In a large portion of the Sahara no rain whatever falls, and very little in either Arabia or Egypt. Guinea, Senegambia, and the Sahara, are considered to be the hottest countries of the globe. During the rainy season, however, the two former are drenched with water, when there rises from the earth in the low lying districts near the coast, a steam that would rival a vapour-bath; and hence the unhealthiness of these regions to Europeans. The eastern coast, being tempered by the trade-winds coming from the east, is not so hot as the western. In the higher lands in the interior, the climate is frequently salubrious and delightful, resembling that of the south of Europe. The Sahara is often swept by terrific hurricanes and the simoom. Guinea and the west countries generally are afflicted with the harmattan, a dry hot wind, which cracks the lips, but announces the termination of the rainy season. Tornadoes are frequent in Senegambia and Egypt, and the Barbary states are, on account of their climate, still subject to visitations of the plague.

Vegetation.—If we except Soudan, Upper and Lower Guinea, Senegambia, and the great mountain-ranges, the forests of Africa are not extensive. On the southern shores of the Mediterranean, and along a portion of those that are washed by the Atlantic, the vegetation which is characteristic of the south of Europe still prevails. The woods consist of cork-trees, and other kinds of oaks: sea-pines, cypresses, and myrtles spring up, and groves of olives and oranges bud, blossom, ripen, and wave before the eye of the delighted traveller. In the Atlas chain grows the famous sandarach-tree, which is so durable as to seem almost to last for ever. It supplies the timber of which most of the ceilings of mosques are constructed. Passing into the desert, we enter upon a region in which the resources of nature fail to supply the nourishment necessary to a generous vegetation. Here are to be seen vast tracks covered by the prickly kasheia, which gives great annoyance to travellers, and the agoul, which furnishes the camel with food on its long, perilous, and wearisome journeys across the desert. In tropical Africa we enter upon the grandest features of vegetation: here flourish the families of palms, whose leaves expand into so many verdant awnings, spread out by the beneficent hand of the Creator, to shade from the excessive heat the ebon native, whose existence has been cast in such a burning climate; and here the gigantic baobob makes a forest in itself. This tree attains a height of not more than sixty or seventy feet, but its branches are as large as the stems of common trees, and extend horizontally in all directions; whilst its trunk assumes the largest girth of all the known trees; one of its kind has measured in circumference 104 feet, and the ages of some of them have been estimated, by counting their concentric rings, to be not less than 5,000 years. Ebony, rosewood and African teak also abound in these forests. The cocoa, date, and oil palms flourish, and an extensive trade is carried on at the Gambia in the ground nut, from which oil is obtained. Huge cotton-trees encumber the earth; the chandelier-tree adorns the landscape, and flowers of the gayest description wreathe themselves around their stems, hang upon their branches, and entwine themselves with their leaves. As we approach the south, the vegetable world again appears in new forms; heaths and geraniums abound, and the hills and rocks are adorned with the cycadaceæ, a kind of plant which occupies a mediate place between ferns and palms. The plains are clothed with the rush-like restio, and, after the rains, the whole country blooms with the ixia, and other kindred species. The whiteboom, one of the protean tribe, supplies the inhabitants of Cape Town with fuel, and the American aloe has been introduced, and is reared in hedges, as the hawthorn is in this country. Stone-pines, and the oaks of Europe will recall to the newly-arrived colonist the land he may have recently left, and help earlier than might otherwise have been the case to familiarize his mind with the features of the country into which he has transported himself. Dourra, which is the chief corn, wheat, barley, maize, rice, pulse, banana, and the yam; the date, the olive, and the grape; oranges, sugar, coffee, cotton, tobacco, gum-arabic, indigo, and cotton are grown. These products are determined, in a great measure, by climate and situation. In the northern half of the continent, and in the fertile spots of the desert the date flourishes, the yam and banana in the western parts; wheat, the olive, and the grape, mostly in Egypt and the Barbary states; gum-arabic, being the hardened juice of the acacia, is found chiefly between the desert and Senegambia: the cassia, whose leaves supply senna, is found in the regions of the Nile; and the coffee-tree grows wild in Abyssinia.

Zoology.—Carnivora. The foremost are the lion, the panther, the leopard, the hyena, the civet cat, and the jackal. The first three are not only extremely numerous, but dangerous. They are to be found lurking in the neighbourhood of springs, lakes, and rivers, where they pounce upon their living prey that emerge from the deep recesses of the forest to bathe and quench their thirst. In many parts the inhabitants are compelled to quit the locality in which they may have pitched their habitation, to escape their ravages. Properly speaking, the whole genus of the hyena class are African; they live mostly upon offal and carrion, which, in the dead of night, they pick up in the towns and villages, the streets of which are abandoned to their possession, in that season, by the inhabitants. The true civet is found in the northern part of the continent: numbers of the natives cherish it for the sake of its perfume. Of ichneumons, Africa contains several distinct species, which keep up a continual war upon the multitudes of reptiles and serpents that infest the country. There are no bears known to exist in Africa. Rats and mice are abundant. Elephants are found in large herds in Central and Southern Africa, a herd sometimes numbering as many as 200: they are valuable for their tusks, which weigh from 140 to 180 lb., and which bring destruction upon them for the gratification of human cupidity. The African elephant, which is smaller than the Asiatic elephant, and is distinguished by very large ears, has long ceased to be the servant of man, although, in the time of the Ptolemies, he was doubtless employed in the Ethiopian wars. The rhinoceros, of which six species are known, is found in the same localities: his skin is in some places made into shields by the natives: and for harness and traces it is well adapted, by its thickness and durability. The hippopotamus inhabits the lakes and rivers to the south of the Sahara; and the zebra, the quagga, and the deer, are found in most of the known central and southern parts. Antelopes and gazelles abound in the same regions, and often fall a sacrifice to the ferocity of the feline tribes, which watch, from their trackless solitudes, these wandering herds as they browse upon the plains. Five-sixths of the known species of antelopes are natives of Africa. The giraffe is found from the banks of the Garriep to the southern confines of the Great Desert, and several species of the buffalo have their habitation in the interior. The wild buffalo of the Cape is distinguished by his formidable horns, which extend over the top of his head, imparting to his appearance a frontal at once magnificent and imposing. Hares and rabbits are plentiful. Of cetaceous mammals inhabiting the African coasts and seas, the lamantin is, perhaps, alone worthy of notice: it is mostly found at the mouths of the great rivers falling into the Indian and Atlantic oceans: it suggested to antiquity the fable of the mermaid. The Quadrumana of Africa are numerous, and among them the enormous and ferocious gorilla of Central Africa, and the chimpanzee take precedence. Baboons, monkeys, apes, and squirrels, enliven the forests by their gambols, in multitudes. The Cheiroptera, or winged mammals of Africa, are supposed to be as plentiful as they are in Asia or America; but as yet they have not been proved to be so. The most remarkable of these at present known to us is the rousette, which grows to the size of a small fowl, lives upon fruits, and is eaten by the inhabitants of Madagascar and the Mauritius. Birds. The most remarkable birds of Africa are the ostrich, the flamingo, the parrot, the guinea-fowl, and the ibis. The first is more peculiar to this continent, although, in the time of Aristotle, it was found in Syria and Mesopotamia, in Asia: it often appears in company with the quagga, or wild ass. Numerous species of the bustard, which is similar in its habits to the ostrich, inhabit the plains. The parrot tribes are remarkable for the beauty of their plumage and the discordance of their notes. Of gallinaceous fowls, the guinea-hen is the only genus which Africa possesses, and which are found in no other part of the globe: they assemble in vast flocks, and are generally found amongst the underwood that skirts the banks of lakes and rivers. Vultures and falcons are numerous; among which may be noticed the secretary, which preys exclusively upon serpents; of which it destroys vast numbers. Reptiles. The crocodile, serpents, particularly the python, and the chameleon, are the most prominent of these. The first is still abundant below the first cataract of the Nile, and is an inhabitant of all the large rivers in tropical Africa. Serpents of every description abound in the woods, and the python, thirty feet long lurks in the fens and morasses. The chameleon is so plentiful as to be seen on almost every shrub. Insects. These consist of innumerable species. The locust, from time immemorial, has belonged to Africa; and scorpions, dangerous as the serpents, everywhere abound. The zebubs of Bruce and the tsetses of Livingstone, a species of fly, which is said to render any region where it is present quite uninhabitable by Europeans, are the greatest pests of the low-lying and cultivated districts. Ants, spiders, and centipedes abound. Domestic animals. Of these, the camel and the horse are the most valuable as beasts of burthen. As we have no reports of the wild horse being found in Africa, the modern animal is supposed to have been introduced to that continent; but at what time it is impossible to determine. Those of the Bedouins of Egypt are probably of Arabian breed, and the original of those in Barbary were, with asses, introduced from Spain during the period of Moorish ascendancy in that country; they are mostly used in war. The camel is of Arabian origin, and is spread over all the central and northern parts of the continent: it is figuratively called the "ship of the Desert," from its being habitually employed in tracking those interminable seas of sand which lie between the more thickly-populated regions of Africa. Of horned cattle, there are many different varieties, and some of the ox tribes are used both as animals of draught and burthen. Of sheep, there are also many varieties; and goats are, in some parts, extremely numerous. The common cat is scarce, but dogs are plentiful, notwithstanding that, among the Mahometans, they are held as unclean; both in Barbary and Egypt, however, they are cherished for the purpose of cleansing the cities of their offal. From their great usefulness in this respect, Mussulmans frequently bequeath considerable legacies for their support; and, notwithstanding their numbers, the intense heat of the climate, and the scarcity of water, no instance of canine madness is known amongst them. The domestic poultry of Africa is almost all of foreign introduction.

Minerals.—Gold is found abundantly in the sands of the great rivers that flow out of the central regions, on the coast of Guinea (a portion of which is named the Gold Coast, on the Soudan, and in the regions near the Mozambique coast. Silver is less abundant, iron ore and copper are known to exist in many parts of the continent; and salt is found nearly all over the continent. Very little is yet known about coal deposits. Diamonds of large size, but not of the very finest quality, are numerous in South Africa.

Population.—It is impossible to state with any pretensions to accuracy, the number of the inhabitants of this vast continent; but the most probable estimates, based on official statistics relating to the European settlements and the more civilized countries, and the statements of the most careful explorers, justify us in supposing that about 180,000,000 of the human race are inhabitants of Africa. The native population is generally divided by ethnologists into six groups—the Negroes, occupying Western Africa, from the Senegal to the Gaboon, and the Soudan, or Nigritia. They are the most completely black of all the African races, have woolly hair, projecting jaws, short lips and flat noses. These peculiarities appear in a modified form in the Kaffirs, the general name applied to the races, including several varieties, occupying the country from a few degrees north of the equator to the Damara and Bechuana country and Zulu Land in the south. They are a fine race, and have been known to exhibit intelligence and courage. The Hottentots and Bushmen, the original inhabitants of Cape Colony are a much inferior race physically and intellectually, especially the Bushmen, who are stunted in stature and deficient in intelligence. The Berbers, of Arab extraction, form the population of the Atlas region and Mediterranean states, and from the popular name given to the whole of that region, Barbary is derived. With some modifications, owing to mixture with other races, the Berbers are found in the Sahara and as far south as the Soudan. The Nilotic races is a name given to the inhabitants of Nubia, Abyssinia and the Gallas tribes who occupy the southern districts of Abyssinia and the regions between the country and the northern shores of the great races. The last group of the inhabitants is that which is most historically interesting, the Copts, who represent the old Egyptian population of the Nile valley.

Religion.—The Berbers and Egyptians are Mahometans, and a profession of the same creed, but accompanied by considerable laxity of practice, is made by most of the inhabitants of the Soudan. A debased form of Christianity prevails in Abyssinia. Among the Negroes, and Kaffirs, the only approach to religious belief appears to be Fetichism, or belief in the power of charms, and human sacrifices to propitiate certain vague supernatural powers are not unfrequent.

Geographical Divisions.—A convenient, but not very scientific method of describing the various portions of the continent is commonly adopted—1st. NORTHERN AFRICA, which comprehends Egypt, and the states of Barbary, Barca, Tripoli, Tunis, Algeria, Fezzan, and Morocco. In this division is embraced the great Atlas mountain-system. 2nd. WESTERN AFRICA, which embraces a large extent of coast, including the whole of the country lying between Morocco and Congo. 3rd. SOUTHERN AFRICA, which takes in Cape Colony and all the country north of the Cape of Good Hope as far as the confines of Congo on the west, and those of Mozambique on the east. 4th. EASTERN AFRICA, extending northward from the southern boundaries of Mozambique, to Cape Guardafui, and thence along the shores of the Red Sea, to the frontiers of Egypt. Abyssina, though by some made a division of itself, may be embraced in this general arrangement. 5th. CENTRAL AFRICA. This region comprehends those countries through which the Niger takes its course, and embraces the kingdoms of Houssa, Timbuctoo, Mandara, &c., in the middle; on the north Begharmi, Bornou, and several others on the west.

Political Divisions.—Vice-royalties of Turkey. Egypt, Tunis, and Tripoli, which, however, are practically independent states. Native Kingdoms and States. The sultanate of Morocco, Abyssinia, Ashantee, Dahomey, the republic of Liberia; Sego, Massina, Tombo, Mosso, Sokoto, Bornu, Baghirmi, and Uadai in Central Africa. A native state (Darfur) in this region was annexed to Egypt in December, 1864. The people of the Kaffir race are divided into innumerable tribes, the chiefs of which frequently adopt the title of king. British Possessions. Cape Colony, Natal, settlements at Cape Coast on the Gulf of Guinea, Sierra Leone, and at Gambia, and the islands of Mauritius, St. Helena, and Ascension. French Possessions. Algeria, on the Senegal, and the islands of St. Louis, Gorée, and the Isle de Bourbon. Portuguese Possessions. Angola, Benguela, and the Mozambique, Porto Santo, St. Thomas, and the Azores, and Cape de Verde islands and Madeira. The Danes and Americans have small settlements and forts in Guinea, and the Canary Islands belong to Spain.

History and Progress of Discovery.—The name Africa was given by the Carthaginians to the territory adjacent to their city, on the shores of the Mediterranean, including the basin of the river Bagradas: and to this day the district bears the name of Frikeah, or Afrikeah. Greek and Roman geographers gave the name Libya to the then Roman portion of Africa, next to Egypt. The following are the dates of the most remarkable expeditions of discovery,

	B.C.
Traditionary circumnavigation of Africa by the Phœnicians	610–594
Hanno sailed from Carthage, said to have passed the Straits of Gibraltar, and reached a point to the south of Senegal, about	500

AGAMEDES and TROPHONIUS, ăg'-a-mé-dez and tro-fó'-ne-us, two architects who designed the entrance of the temple of Delphi, for which they demanded of the god whatever gift was most advantageous for a man to receive. Three days after they were found dead in their beds.

AGAMEMNON, ăg'-a-mem'-non, king of Mycenæ and Argos, was brother to Menelaus, and son of Pleisthenes, the son of Atreus. Homer calls them sons of Atreus, which is wrong, upon the authority of Hesiod and others. When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyestes seized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus. Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, and Menelaus became the husband of Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who assisted them to recover their father's kingdom, where Agamemnon established himself, at Mycenæ. Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law. When Helen was stolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander-in-chief of the Grecian forces levied against Troy, and he departed for the siege, leaving his kingdom and wife in the guardianship of Ægisthus, king of Argos. The fleet with the troops being detained at Aulis, Agamemnon there sacrified his daughter Iphigenia to appease Diana. Electra was another daughter. During the Trojan war, Agamemnon behaved with great valour, but his quarrel with Achilles, on account of the beautiful Briseis, whom he took from Achilles by force, was very prejudicial to the cause of the Greeks. Clytemnestra, with her adulterer Ægisthus, prepared to murder him on his return; and as he came from the bath, in order to embarrass him, and effect her purpose, she gave him a tunic, the sleeves of which were sewed together. Whilst trying to put it on, she brought him to the ground with the stroke of a hatchet, and Ægisthus seconded her blows. His death was revenged by his son Orestes.

AGAMENTICUS, ăg-a-men'-te-cus, a mountain of Maine, U.S., 8 miles from York Harbour. It affords pasture up to its summit, and is a seamark for the entrance of Piscataqua river. Lat. 43° 16′ N. Lon. 70° 39′ W.

AGANA, a-ga'-na, one of the Ladrone islands, where Magellan was killed, on a voyage in search of the Moluccas. Pop. 3,000.—A Spanish governor resides here.

AGASICLES, ă-găs'-i-cles, a king of Sparta, who used to say, "a king ought to govern his subjects as a father his family." Lived in the 6th century B.C.

AGASSIZ, Louis John Rudolph, a-găs'-se, a distinguished French naturalist, for many years professor of natural history near Boston. In 1847, he became, by invitation, professor of natural history in Harvard College, America. As a naturalist his reputation dates from 1828. Much of his attention has been devoted to fossil remains. He was the first to propose the division of fossil fishes in accordance with the formation of their scales. He was also amongst the first to confirm Mr. Shuttleworth's discovery of animalculæ being in the red snow of the Alps, and has shown that there are higher forms of animal existence there than were before suspected. As a geologist he directed attention to a large series of important phenomena, and has, in various publications, developed the views he has been led to entertain upon them. He wrote two books on the subject of glaciers. He was an upholder of the doctrine which teaches the successive creation of higher orders of organized beings on the surface of the earth, and believed that the human race has had, in its several distinct species, separate stocks of originality, both as to time and space. As an author, his contributions to natural history were extensive. On the death of the late Professor Edward Forbes, he was offered the chair of natural history in Edinburgh, but he declined it.
Born at Orbe, in Switzerland, 1807; died in America, 1873.

AGATA, a-gā'-ta, the name of several towns of Italy, the most remarkable of which is one in the district of Gaeta, Naples, with some magnificent remains, and the ancient Minturno. Pop. 7,000.—Another 4 miles to the south of Reggio, Naples, which has a cotton trade. Pop. 2,500.

AGATHARCIDES, ăg'-ath-ăr'-se-des, a native of Cnidos, who wrote in Greek various works on geography, and was the first to explain the periodical rise of the Nile. Wrote between B.C. 180 and 145.

AGATHARCUS, ăg'-ăth-ark'-us, a Samian painter, whom Æschylus employed to paint scenes for his stage, said to have been the inventor of perspective. Flourished about 480 B.C.

AGATHEMERUS, ăg-a-thē'-merus, the author of a "Compendium of Geography," in Greek, which was published by Hudson, at Oxford, in 1703. Lived in the 3rd century.

AGATHIAS, ă-gā'-the-as, a Greek historian and poet. His principal work was a history of his own time, and he was the author of a great number of poems and epigrams, some of which are preserved.
Born at Myrina, Asia Minor, about 536; died about 582.

AGATHO, a'-ga-tho, a Pope, who despatched legates to the council called at Constantinople to condemn the Eutychians, a sect who denied the human nature of Christ, and asserted that his body was only an aërial vehicle. In 679 he was elected to the papal chair.
Born at Palermo; died 682.

AGATHO, an Athenian tragic poet, a disciple of Socrates, and highly praised by Plato. He was publicly crowned.

AGATHOCLEA, ăg-ăth-o-clē'-a, a beautiful Egyptian courtezan, with whom one of the Ptolemies fell in love, and in order to marry her, destroyed his wife Eurydice. She was at last killed by the indignant people, who tore her limb from limb.

AGATHOCLES, ăg-ăth'-o-cles. There were many this name, the most remarkable of whom was a licentious and ambitious youth, the son of a potter, who, entering the Sicilian army, rose to the greatest honours, and made himself master of Syracuse. He reduced all Sicily under his power; but being defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, he carred the war into Africa, where, for four years, he extended his conquests over his enemy. He afterwards passed into Italy, and made himself master of Crotona.
Born B.C. 361; poisoned B.C. 290.

AGATHODAEMON, ăg'-a-tho-dai-ē'-mon, a map-maker of Alexandria, and the supposed constructor of the maps found in the oldest manuscripts of the Geography of Claudius Ptolemæus. It cannot be determined with accuracy when he flourished.

AGATHON, ăg'-a-thon, a tragic poet, who gained the prize at the Olympic games, B.C. 419. His works are lost.
Born B.C. 447.

AGATHON, Pope, succeeded to the tiara, 678; was canonized.
Died 682.

AGENOR, ă-jē'-nor, king of Phœnicia, was son of Neptune and Libya, and brother to Belus. He married Telephassa, called by some Agriope, by whom he had Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and Europa. As Carthage was built by his descendants, it is called Agenoris urbs.

AGENORIA, or AGENORA, ăj'-e-nor'-e-a, from agenor, 'fortis,' the goddess of industry and courage. Her temple was upon Mount Aventine.

AGENORIA, a name given to the goddess of silence, represented with one of her fingers pressing her lips.

AGER, NICHOLAS, ădj'-air, a professor of medicine at Strasburg; distinguished as a botanist and physician. Lived in the 17th century.

AGEROLA, aj'-e-ro'-la, a town of Naples, 10 miles S.W. of Palermo. Pop. 2,300.

AGESANDER, ăj'-e-săn'-der, a famous sculptor of Rhodes, who, in the time of Vespasian, made a representation of Laocöon's history, which now passes for the best relic of all ancient sculpture. The Laocöon was discovered at Rome in 1506, and afterwards deposited in the Vatican, where it still remains. Lived in the 1st century.

AGESILAUS, ăj-es'-e-lai'-us, king of Sparta, of the family of the Agidæ, son of Doryssus, and father of Archelaüs. During his reign, Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Reigned 927-880 B.C.

AGESILAUS, son of Archidamus, of the family of the Proclidæ, elected king of Sparta over his nephew Leotychides. He made war against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, with success; but in the midst of his conquests he was called home to oppose the Athenians and Bœotians, who were ravaging his country. The despatch which he made on this occasion was such, that in thirty days he passed over the same extent of country which occupied the army of Xerxes a whole year. He defeated his enemies at Chæronea, and ultimately obtained a treaty of peace favourable to Sparta. Though small of stature, and lame, he was brave, and possessed of a magnanimity which compensated for all the imperfections of nature. In his 80th year he went to assist Tachus, king of Egypt, whose servants could hardly be persuaded that the Lacedæmonian was a general, when they beheld him eating with his soldiers on the bare ground, and with no covering to his head.
Born 480 B.C.; died 361 B.C.

AGESIPOLIS, I., ăj'-e-sip'-o-lis, king of Lacedæmon and son of Pausanias, who obtained a great victory over the Mantineans. He reigned fourteen years, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, 380 B.C.

AGGA, or AGGONA, ăg-ga, a town and district on the coast of Guinea, in which is a very high hill called the Devil's Mount. The English have a fort here. Lat. 6° N. Lon. 0° 5′ E.

AGGRAMMES, ăg-grăm'-mes, a king of the Gangarides. His father was a hair-dresser, of whom the queen became enamoured, and whom she made governor to the king's children, to gratify a criminal passion. He killed them, to raise Aggrammes, his son by the queen, to the throne.

AGHABOE, ăg'-ha-bo, a village and parish of Ireland, in Queen's county. Pop. 2,723.

AGHADOE, ăg'-ha-do, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, and a bishop's see, united to Limerick. It is situate near the Lake of Killarney, 45 miles S.S.E. of Ardfert.

AGHRIM, or AUGHRIM, ak'-grim, a parish of Ireland, 28 miles E.N.E. of Galway, memorable for the decisive victory gained, in 1691, by the army of King William, over that of James II. The French general, Saint-Ruth, and 4,000 of his men, fell on the side of James; and only 800 of the English on that of William. Pop. 2,300.

AGHRIM, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wicklow, 13 miles S.W. of Wicklow.

AGIAS, aj'-i'-as, a famous Lacedæmonian soothsayer, who foretold to Lysander his future success at Ægospotamos, and the destruction of the Athenian fleet.

AGILULF, ăj'-e-loolf, duke of Turin, chosen king of the Lombards in 591. He renounced Arianism, and embraced the Catholic faith; but while engaged in a war with some of the Italian princes, he perpetrated great ravages in the Ecclesiastical States.

Born 591; died 619.

AGINCOURT, ăj'-in-kort (Fr. adj'-ăn-kooer), a village of France, in the department of the Pas de Calais. Near this place Henry V., king of England, obtained a signal victory over the French, on the 25th October, 1415. The English army on this occasion is variously stated at from 10,000 to 22,000 men; and the French as consisting of 60,000 by the lowest accounts, but according to some contemporary writers, it amounted to 100,000 or even 140,000. The French left dead, 92 barons, 1,500 knights, and 8,000 gentlemen of family, and several thousand private men, without including 14,000 prisoners; among whom were the duke of Orleans, and many others of great distinction; while the loss of the English, including the duke of York and the earl of Suffolk, who were killed, did not exceed 1,200 men. Lat. 50° 31′ N. Lon. 2° 10′ E.

AGIS, I., aï'-jis, king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Eurysthenes, and, after a reign of one year, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, 1058 B.C.

AGIS, II., king of Sparta. Took part in the long Peloponnesian war. Reigned 427-397 B.C.

AGIS, III., king of Sparta, and grandson of Agesilaus. He stirred up several of the Grecian states against Alexander, but fell fighting against the Macedonians. Reigned 338-330 B.C.

AGIS, IV., king of Sparta, was the son of Eudamidas. For endeavouring to reform the constitution of his country, and improve the manners of his people, they rose against him and put him to death. Reigned 244-240 B.C.

AGIS, a poet of Argos, who attended Alexander in his Asiatic expedition, and rendered himself agreeable by the meanest adulation. He raised his patron to immortality, and declared that Bacchus, Hercules, and the sons of Leda, would yield to his superior merits in the assembly of the gods.

AGLAIA, ăg-laï'-ya, the youngest of the three Graces, called sometimes Pasiphae.

AGLAONICE, ăg-lai-o-ni'-ce, daughter of Hegemon, was acquainted with astronomy and eclipses; whence she boasted of her power to draw the moon from heaven. Her arrogance, and the falsehood of her assertions, rendered her name proverbial for deceit and imposition.

AGLAOPE, ăg-laï'-o-pe, one of the Sirens.

AGLAOPHON, ăg-laï'-o-fon. There are two Grecian painters distinguished in antiquity by this name, natives of the island of Thasos. Flourished about 500 years B.C.

AGLASOUN, a'-gla-soon, a town 55 miles from Sataliah, in Anatolia, Asia Minor. It stands on a mountain, and is the ancient Lysinæ.

AGLAUROS, ăg-law'-ros, daughter of Erechtheus, the oldest king of Athens. Some make her daughter of Cecrops. She was changed into a stone by Mercury.

AGLAUS, ăg'-lai-us, the poorest man of Arcadia, pronounced by the oracle more happy than Gyges, the king of Lydia.

AGLIE, a'-gle, a town of Italy, in Piedmont, 10 miles S. of Ivrea. Pop. 54,00. It has a splendid palace and gardens.

AGLIONBY, JOHN, ăg'-le-on'-be, a divine, who was made chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, and in 1601 elected principal of Edmund Hall. He was concerned in the translation of the New Testament as at present used.

Born in Cumberland, 1567; died at Islip, of which he was rector, 1610.

AGLIONBY, EDWARD, a poet of the reign of Elizabeth, from whom he received a pension for writing her pedigree.

AGMET, or AGMAT, ag'-met, a town of Morocco, on a river of the same name, and on a declivity of one of the mountains of Atlas, 16 miles S. of Morocco.

AGNANO, an-ya'-no, a circular lake in the kingdom of Naples, 7 miles from Puzzoli, supposed to be the crater of an extinct volcano. It is about half a mile in diameter, surrounded by mountains, and on its margin is situate the famous Grotta del Cane, in which so many dogs have suffered, to show the deleterious effects of a poisonous vapour that rises to about a foot above the ground.

AGNELLUS, an-yaïl'-loos, an abbot of Ravenna, who wrote the lives of the bishops and archbishops of that city. Lived in the 9th century.

AGNES, ST., saint ăg'-nes, one of the Scilly islands. Area. 300 acres. Pop. 200. Lat. 49° 53′ 30″ N. Lon. 6° 20′ W.

AGNES, ST., a market-town and port on the north-west coast of Cornwall, 9 miles from Truro. There is a harbour, but only available for vessels of light burden. Pop. chiefly mining, 7,481. St

Agnes' Beacon, in the neighbourhood, rises to a height of 664 feet.

AGNESI, MARIA GAETANA, an-yé'-se, an illustrious Italian lady. In very early youth, she acquired the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, German, and Spanish languages. By her application to philosophical and mathematical learning, and her progress therein, she so distinguished herself, that Pope Benedict XIV. appointed her, in 1750, professor of mathematics in the university of Bologna. Subsequently to this act of the pontiff, she took the veil. Her "Analytical Institutions" were published at Milan, in 1743. They were translated into French by M. Cousin, and published at Paris in 1775, and have appeared in English in 2 vols., with her life prefixed, taken from Montucla.

Born at Milan, 1718; died 1799.

AGNESI, MARIA TERESA, a sister of the above, and the composer of three operas, "Sophonisba," "Ciro," and "Nitocri."

Born at Milan, 1724.

AGNO, an'-yo, a village of Switzerland, 3 miles W. of Lugano. Pop. 800.

AGNO, ăg'-no, one of the nymphs who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain on Mount Lycæus. When the priest of Jupiter prayed and afterwards stirred this fountain with a bough, there arose a thick vapour, which immediately descended in a beautiful shower.

AGNODICE, ăg-nod'-e-ce, an Athenian virgin, who, in order to study medicine, disguised her sex. She was taught by Heirophilus the art of midwifery, and when employed, always discovered her sex to her patients. This brought her into so much repute, that the men-midwives, whose practice she greatly injured, accused her before the Areopagus of corruption. She confessed her sex to the judges, and a law was immediately made to empower all freeborn women to practise midwifery.

AGNOLO, BACCIO D', ba-che-o dan'-yó-lo, a Florentine wood-engraver, which profession he abondoned for that of an architect. Whilst in Rome, pursuing his studies among the remains of antiquity, his workshop was visited by Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others, and on returning to Florence he rose into eminence, notwithstanding the ridicule and detraction which too often follow the footsteps of originality. Michael Angelo was his most powerful opponent. When he died, his son Giuliano directed the works he had left unfinished.

Born in Florence, 1460; died 1543.

AGNON, ăg'-non, son of Nicias, was present at the taking of Samos by Pericles. In the Peloponesian war, he went against Potidæa, but abandoned his expedition through disease. He built Amphipolis, whose inhabitants favoured Brasidas, whom they regarded as their founder, forgetful of Agnon.

AGNONE, an-yó'-ne, a town of South Italy, situate on a hill 20 miles N. of Campobasso, and which is said to produce the best copper wares in the kingdom. Pop. about 10,000.

AGNONIDES, ăg-non'-e-des, a demagogue of Athens, who accused Phocion of betraying the Pirœus to Nicanor. When the people recollected the services Phocion had rendered them, they raised him statues, and put his accuser to death.

AGOA DE PAO, a'-go-a-de-pa'-o, the mountain peak near the middle of the island of St. Michael, in the Azores, upwards of 3,000 feet high.

AGOBARD, ăg'-o-bar, an archbishop of Lyons, who was deprived of his dignity for deposing Louis the Meek, in the assembly of Compiègne, but was afterwards restored. He opposed image-worship, and wrote against the belief of witchcraft and the practice of duelling. His works were printed in 1666, in two vols. 8vo.

Born 779; died at Saintonge, 840.

AGON, a-gawng, a town of France, on the north coast of Normandy. Pop. 1,800.

AGON, a'-gon, an island of Sweden, in the Gulf of Bothnia, with a good harbour. Lat. 61° 20′ N. Lon. 18° 10′ E.

AGOONA, a-goo'-na, a district on the Gold Coast of Africa. Pop. abont 12,000.

AGOP, JOHN, a-gop, a grammarian and critic of Armenia, who flourished in the 17th century.

AGORACRITUS, ăg-o-ra'-kre-tus, a sculptor of Paros, and disciple of Phidias. Flourished 429 B.C.—He was such a favourite with his master, that it is said Phidias allowed him to affix his name to some works which he himself had executed.

AGORÆA, ăg'-o-ré'-a, a name of Minerva at Sparta.

AGORANIS, ăg'-o-ra'-nis, a river falling into the Ganges, now the Gogra.

AGORDO, a-gawr'-do, a town of northern Italy, situate in a fertile plain in which is the valley of Imperina, where are the richest copper-mines in Italy. Pop. 3,000.

AGOREUS, ăg-o-ré'-us, one of the names of Mercury, from his presiding over the markets.

AGOSTA, a'-gos-ta, a town of Sicily, in the province of Siracusa, with an excellent harbour. In 1693 it was mostly swallowed up by an earthquake, but has been rebuilt. It stands at a distance of about 18 miles to the north of Syracuse. Trade in wine, flax, olive oil, honey, salt and sardines. In the neighbourhood are the remarkable caves of Timpa. It was off this port that De Ruyter, the famous Dutch admiral, in command of the united Dutch and Spanish fleet, fought on the 22nd April, 1676, the engagement against the French in which he received his death-wound. Pop. about 13,000. Lat. 37° 13′ N. Lon. 15° 13′ E.

AGOSTINI, LEONARDO, an Italian antiquary, author of several valuable works on antique gems and medals. Employed by Pope Alexander VII., as pontifical examiner of antiquities in Rome and Latium.

Born at Siena, about the end of the 16th century; died about 1680.

AGOSTINO, PAOLO DA VALERANO, a'-gos-té'-no, a celebrated musical composer, and master of the pope's chapel at Rome. His choruses are highly spoken of.

Born 1593; died 1629.

AGOSTINO, DI MUSI, or AGASTONO, VENEZIANO, Italian engraver. His plates from Raffaelle and Giulo Romano, and portraits are now highly valued.

Born towards the close of the 15th century; died about 1536.

AGOT, a'-got, a small island in the English Channel. Lat. 48° 38′ N. Lon. 2° 4′ W.

AGOULT, GUILLAUME D', a'-goolt, a gentleman of Provence, who wrote ballads.

Died 1181.

AGRA, a'-gra, a division of British India under the jurisdiction of the lieutenant-governor of the North-West Provinces. It includes the districts of Agra, Maturi, Furruckabad, Minporee, Etawah, and Etah. The district of Agra has an area of 1850 square miles, bounded on the north by the province of Delhi, on the south by Malwa, on the east by Oude and Allahabad, and on the west by Rajpootana. Its length is about 250 and its breadth about 180 miles.

Area of the division.—9,899 miles.

Description.—To the north of the river Chumbul the country is, in general, flat and thinly wooded; but in the north-western direction trees become more abundant and the surface more undulated. The district between the Jumna and the Ganges, called the Doab, is the most fertile part of the province.

Rivers.—The principal are the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Chumbul.

Towns.—There are about forty considerable towns, besides villages, and a great many fortresses. The chief are Alwur, Bhurtpoor, Deeg, Mathura, Muttra, Etawah, Gwalior, Calpee, Gohud, and Narwar.

Inhabitants.—A mixed race of Mahometans and Hindoos.

Produce.—Sugar, cotton, and indigo. A good breed of horses is reared.

Minerals.—Marble, salt, and copper. Manufactures.—Coarse cotton cloths fine muslins, and some silks. Pop. at the census of 1852, 4,834,064. Lat. between 25° and 28° N.

AGRA, a district in the above division, has an area of 1,874 square miles. The surface of the country is level, intersected by water courses and ravines. The general elevation is about 650 feet above the sea. Pop. 1,100,000.

AGRA, a celebrated city of Hindostan, the capital of the district of the same name. It stands on the bank of the river Jumna (crossed by a railway bridge), the houses being built of stone, and very lofty, but the streets so narrow as hardly to admit the passage of a carriage. It contains many caravansaries, public baths, and mosques. The British government has expended a considerable amount upon public works; several court-houses, record-rooms, and revenue offices having been built, a new burial-ground laid out, and bridges and roads constructed. The ancient walls of the city enclose an area of about 11 square miles, of which about one-half is occupied. Some of the public buildings are among the most magnificent and beautiful edifices in the world, especially the Imperial Mosque, built by the Mogul Emperor Akbar (from whom the city was named Akbarhad), the Moti-Masjid, or Pearl Mosque, the Tumna Masjid, and the Taj Mahel, a mausoleum, built in the 17th century, by Shah Jehan, for his favourite queen. Twenty thousand men were employed for twenty-two years in erecting this mausoleum, which is acknowledged to be the most beautiful edifice of the kind in the world. It stands without the city. The Government House, the Government and four other Colleges, the Metcalfe Testimonial, and the English Church, are the most important modern buildings. The fort, memorable in the history of the great mutiny, is large and strongly built of red sandstone. Agra does a considerable trade in cotton and salt. The Hindoo inhabitants hold this city in great veneration, from its being the place of the sixth avatar, or incarnation of Vishnu, under the name of Parasu Rama.

Lat. 27° 10′ N. Lon. 78° 5′ E.

AGRA, ā'-gra, a place of Bœotia, where the Ilissus rises. Diana was called Agræa, because she hunted there.—A city of Suza—of Arcadia, and Arabia.

AGRAGAS, or ACRAGAS, ăg'-ra-găs, a river and mountain of Sicily, near Agrigentum.

AGRAM, a'-gram, a fortified and well-built city of the Austrian empire, and the capital of the crown-land of Croatia, situated at the foot of a richly wooded range of mountains about two miles from the Save. A small stream divides the town into three parts—the Royal town (established in 1266 by King Bela IV. of Hungary), the lower town, and the episcopal town. The native name of Agram is Zagrab. Manf. Principally silks and porcelain. It also has an active trade in tobacco, pigs, and wheat, and large markets are held in the town. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 45° 49′ N. Lon. 16° 4′ E.

AGRAMONT, a'-gra-mont, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 5 miles from Lerida.

AGRAULOS, ă-graw'-los, a daughter of Cecrops.—A surname of Minerva.

AGREDA, MARIE D', ag'-re-da, superior of the convent of the Immaculate Conception at Agreda, in Spain, who pretended to have received directions in a vision to write the life of the Virgin Mary, which she accordingly did, but the book was not published till after her death, when it was prohibited at Rome, and censured by the Sorbonne of Paris, though highly esteemed in Spain.

Born 1602; died 1665.

AGREDA, a town of Spain, in the province of Old Castile. It is on the river Queiles, which is crossed by a fine stone bridge.

AGRESTI, LIVIO, ag-res'-te, an historical painter, employed in the Vatican by Gregory XIII.

Died 1580.

AGRESTIS, JULIUS, ă-gres'-tis, a Roman captain, who, when Antonius revolted to Vespasian, and laid in ruins the city of Cremona, obtained leave of the emperor to survey the state of the enemy's forces. He returned with a faithful report, but not being believed, he put an end to his life, A.D. 64.

AGREVE, ST., a'-graive, a town of France, in the Vivarais. Pop. 2,400.

AGRIANES, ă-gre-a'-nes, a river of Thrace.—A people that dwelt in the neighbourhood of that river.

AGRICOLA, CNÆUS JULIUS, ă-grik'-o-la, a Roman commander, whose father, Julius Græcinus, was an orator, put to death by Caligula for refusing to plead against Silanus. Agricola was carefully brought up by his mother Julia Procilla, and sent to Massilia (Marseilles), the chief seat of learning in Gaul, to pursue his studies. After entering the army, he was sent to Britain, where he was at the time of the insurrection of Boadicea, in A.D. 61. On his return to Rome, he married Domitia Decidiana, a lady of rank. He was next made quæstor of Asia, and became tribune of the people, and prætor under Nero. In the commotions between Otho and Vitellius, his mother was murdered, and her estate in Liguria plundered by the fleet of Otho. Being informed on his journey thither, that Vespasian had assumed the government, he espoused his cause. The 20th legion having mutinied in Britain, he was despatched to reduce it to obedience, in which he succeeded. On his return to Rome, he was raised to the rank of patrician, and made governor of Aquitania, in Gaul. In 77 he was chosen consul with Domitian; and, in the same year, gave his daughter in marriage to Tacitus, the historian. Next year he was appointed governor of Britain, where he restored tranquillity and brought the natives to a love of the Roman language and manners. He extended his conquests into Scotland, and built a chain of forts from the Clyde to the Frith of Forth, to prevent the incursions of the inhabitants of the north. He defeated Galgacus at the foot of the Grampian hills, and then made peace with the Caledonians. At the termination of this campaign, a Roman fleet for the first time sailed round Britain, and discovered that it was an island. On the accession of Domitian, Agricola had a triumph decreed him, and was recalled. By command of the emperor, he entered Rome at night, and meeting with a cold reception, he retired from public life. The character of Agricola, as drawn by Tacitus, represents him as a great and good man. He bequeathed what property he possessed to his wife Domitia, his only daughter, wife of Tacitus, and the emperor Domitian, albeit, it is asserted, that he fell a sacrifice by poison to the jealousy of the latter.

Born at Forum Julii, now Frejus, in Provence, A.D. 37; died at Rome, A.D. 93.

Born at Regensberg, 1667; died there, 1719.

AGRICOLA, GEORGE, an eminent metallurgist and physician, who wrote a number of books on metals, &c.

Born at Glaucha, Saxony, 1494; died at Chemnitz, 1555.

AGRICOLA, JOHANN, German musician, pupil of Sebastian Bach, composed operas and choral music, and wrote on musical subjects.

Born at Dobitschen, 1720; died, 1774.

AGRICOLA, JOHANNES, a German divine, who studied theology at Wittenberg, where he embraced the sentiments of Luther, and acquired considerable reputation as a preacher; but entered into a dispute with Luther and Melanchthon on the use of the law under the gospel dispensation, originating the famous Antinomian controversy. With the bishop of Nuremberg and others, he made a vain attempt to reconcile the differences between the Protestants and Catholics. His real name was Schnitter, or Schneider. He wrote commentaries on St. Luke, and made a collection of German proverbs.

Born at Esleben, 1492; died at Berlin, 1566.

AGRICOLA, RUDOLPHUS, a learned writer, and man of extraordinary attainments (his real name was Rolef Huysman, or husbandman, Latinized into Agricola), a pupil of Thomas à Kempis, and was educated at Louvain, but settled at Ferrara, where he taught Latin with great reputation. Here he studied Greek, and attended the philosophical lectures of Theodore Gaza. In 1477 he returned to the Netherlands. In 1483 Agricola settled in the Palatinate, giving occasional lectures at Heidelberg and Worms. Agricola was the first who introduced the Greek language into Germany, and he was also an accomplished musician and painter. His works were printed at Louvain in 1516, and at Cologne in 1539, 4to.

Born at Baflo, near Groningen, 1443; died at Heidelberg, 1485.

Born in Nyland, Sweden, about beginning of 16th century; died at Kyroniem, 1557.

AGRIGENTUM, ă-gre-jen'-tum, an ancient town of Sicily, situate about 2½ miles from the sea, on Mount Acragas. It was founded by a Rhodian colony, and by the Greeks was called Acragas, and by the Romans Agrigentum. (See GIRGENTI.) Here stood the temple of Jupiter Olympus, which, with the exception of the temple of Ephesus, was the largest Greek building applied to religious purposes. Hardly a vestige of it remains. The Agrigentines were a luxurious-living people. Empedocles, himself a native, observed that "they built as if they were to live for ever, and feasted as if they were to die on the morrow." The city passed through many vicissitudes, sometimes enjoying the highest prosperity, and sometimes suffering under the greatest adversity. In 406 B.C. it was reduced by Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, and never completely recovered itself again.

AGRIPPA, ă-grip'-a, a Bithynian astronomer, who was held in high estimation for the accuracy of his observations. Flourished in the 1st century.

AGRIPPA, CAMILLE, a Milanese architect, who, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., removed a large obelisk to St. Peter's Square, of which he published an account at Rome, in 1583. Flourished in the 16th century.

AGRIPPA, HENRI CORNELIUS, a French physician and astrologer of considerable learning and talent. At at early age he was teacher of theology at Dôle, in Franche Comté, but was accused of heresy and obliged to quit the place. Being of a good family, he became secretary to Maximilian I., by whom he was knighted for his bravery in the Italian wars, and afterwards created a doctor in law and physic. He travelled through various parts of Europe, and visited England, but in 1518 settled at Mentz, where he became a counsellor of the city; but having, by the defence of a witch, drawn upon himself the enmity of the monks, he was compelled to quit that place, and seek a residence elsewhere. In 1520 we find him at Cologne, and in the year following, at Geneva. Francis I. now gave him the appointment of physician to his mother; but as he could not predict the issue of the campaign in Italy, he received his dismissal. From France he went to Antwerp, and was taken into the service of Margaret of Parma, governor of the Low Countries. In 1535 he was at Lyons, where he was imprisoned for defaming the king's mother, his former mistress. Agrippa seems to have been emphatically a man born to many changes. He was either twice or thrice married, and had several children. He wrote many works, but the one by which he is best remembered now is that entitled "Vanity of the Sciences," which is a satire on the various kinds of learning in vogue during his age; but his book on the "Occult Sciences" is of an entirely opposite character. All his works were collected and printed at Lyons in 1550. He also wrote, with a view of pleasing his first patroness, Margaret of Parma, a very ingenious and learned pamphlet to prove the superiority of woman over man, and makes good his argument by ample scriptural and physical references.

Born at Cologne, 1486; died at Grenoble, 1535.

AGRIPPA I., HEROD, grandson of Herod the Great and son of Aristobulus and Berenice, king of Judæa in the time of Augustus Cæsar. He was made by his grandfather governor of Tiberias, where he lived so extravagantly as to incur Herod's displeasure. He then went to Rome, and attached himself to Caius, the son of Germanicus, who, succeeding Tiberius, gave Agrippa several tetrarchies, to which Claudius added the whole kingdom of Judæa, with that of Chalcis. In order to please the Jews he now commenced to persecute the Christians, put St. James the Apostle to death, and persecuted Peter. Being afterwards at Cæsarea, he instituted games in honour of the emperor Claudius, at which the Tyrians waited on him to sue for peace. Agrippa made a pompous appearance on his throne, and when he spoke, his flatterers exclaimed his voice was that of a god, which impious adulation he was weak enough to receive with pleasure. On this he was immediately smitten with a loathsome and fatal disorder in his bowels.

Born 10 B.C.; died 44 A.D.

AGRIPPA II., HEROD, son of the preceding. This is the sovereign before whom St. Paul pleaded with so much eloquence that he exclaimed he had almost been persuaded to become a Christian. He spent great sums in adorning Jerusalem, and after that city was taken, retired to Rome, where he became prætor.

Born 27; died at Rome, 94.

AGRIPPA, MARCUS VIPSANIUS, the friend and son-in-law of Augustus; he accused Cassius to the senate, and distinguished himself greatly in the naval battle of Actium, by which Octavius obtained the empire. Previous to this, he had beaten the enemy at Mylæ and at Naulochus, on the coast of Sicily, and had completely broken the naval power of Sextus Pompeius. These victories procured him the reward of a naval crown, and he was, perhaps, the first who received that honour. He now rose to the highest dignities. In his third consulate he dedicated to Jupiter the Pantheon, which, to this day, is considered the most beautiful specimen of Roman architecture. It was erected to commemorate his victory near Actium, and is now called, from its form, Santa Maria della Rotonde, but it still bears the inscription, "M Agrippa, L. F. Costertum fecit." Agrippa was first married to Attica, daughter of Atticus, the friend of Cicero; and secondly to Julia, the daughter of the emperor, and the young widow of Marcellus. He had five children,—two by the first wife and three by the second, every one of whom, it has been observed, came to a premature end.

Born 63 B.C.; died, 12 B.C.

AGRIPPA, MENENIUS, a Roman consul, who is celebrated for having appeased a commotion among the Roman people by the fable of the belly and the limbs. (See Shakespeare's Coriolanus.) He was buried at the public expense, and his daughters were so poor that the people gave them dowries, out of respect for the memory of their father.

Died 492 B.C.

AGRIPPINA, ăg-rip-e-na, the elder, daughter of M. V. Agrippa and Julia. She married Cæsar Germanicus, whom she accompanied in his military expeditions, and when Piso poisoned him, she carried his bones into Italy, and accused his murderer, who stabbed himself. She charged Tiberius with having hired the murderer, and the Emperor, in revenge, banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she starved herself to death. Four famous busts of this lady are in possession of the Cabinet of Antiquities at Dresden.

Born 12 B.C.; died 33 A.D.

AGRIPPINA, the younger, was the daughter of the preceding. After losing two husbands, she was married to her uncle Claudius, the emperor, whom she poisoned to make way for her son Nero. That monster caused her to be assassinated, and exhibited to the senate a list of all the infamous crimes of which she had been guilty. Agrippina was endowed with great natural gifts, but her ambition was boundless, and her disposition intriguing and dissolute. It is said that her son viewed her dead body with all the raptures of admiration, saying, that he never could have believed his mother was so beautiful. She left memoirs which assisted Tacitus in the composition of his Annals. The town built by her at the place where she was born, on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne.

Died 60 A.D.

AGRISOPE, ăg-ris'-o-pe, the mother of Cadmus.

AGRIUS, ai'-gre-us, the son of Parthaon, king of Ætolia, who deprived his brother Œneus of the crown. He was afterwards dethroned by Diomedes, the grandson of Œneus, upon which he killed himself.—One of the Actæon's dogs.

AGTELEK, a famous series of stalactite caverns, near the village of the same name in Hungary. The largest cavern is 96 feet high, 90 feet wide, and nearly 900 feet long.

AGUADILLA, a-goo-a-de-la, a seaport town of the Antilles, in the island of Porto Rico, 65 miles W. of San Juan. Pop. about 3,000.

AGUADO, ALEXANDER MARIA, an eminent banker. A Jew by birth, he served in the French army in Spain, and rose to the rank of Colonel. In 1815 started as a banker in Paris, and became famous as a registrar of Spanish loans. Created Marquis de las Marismas del Guadalquiver. At his death he left an enormous fortune and a fine gallery of pictures.

Born in Seville, 1784; died, 1842.

AGUAS CALIENTES, a'-goo-as cal-e-ain-tais, a city of Mexico, in the kingdom of New Galicia. Noted for its warm springs, from which it takes its name. It is about 270 miles N.N.W. of Mexico. Pop. about 22,000.

AGUEDA, a'-goo'-ai-da, a river of Spain, in the province of Salamanca, falling into the Douro, and forming part of the frontier of Portugal on the N.E. of Beira.

AGUEIRA, a'-goo-air'-a, a small town of Portugal, in Beira, 21 miles E.N.E. of Lamego.

AGUESSEAU, HENRI FRANCOIS D', a-gwes'-so, a chancellor of France, whose father was intendent of Languedoc, and devoted himself to the education of his son. In 1691 he was admitted advocate-general of Paris; and in 1700 was named procureur-general, in which he appeared to the greatest advantage, regulating those jurisdictions which were under the control of parliament, and preserving a strict discipline in the tribunals. He improved the proceedings in criminal matters, and introduced several excellent regulations; but what he prided himself most upon was the administration of the hospitals. After the death of Louis XIV. the regent, duke of Orleans, appointed him chancellor; but in 1718 he was displaced, on account of his opposition to the financial system promulgated by John Law. In 1720 he had the seals restored to him, but two years afterwards he was again deprived of them. In 1727 he became once more chancellor, which office he held with the highest honour to himself and benefit to the nation till 1750, when infirmities obliged him to resign it. His works make nine volumes quarto, and are held in great estimation. D'Aguesseau never passed a day without reading some portion of Scripture, which he said was the balm of his life. A statue of him was erected by Napoleon the Great in front of the Palais Législatif, and by the side of one erected in honour of L'Hôpital. According to Voltaire, Aguesseau was the most learned magistrate that France ever had.

Born at Limoges, 1668; died at Paris, 1751.

AGUILAR DE LA FRONTERA, a'-goo-e-lar dai la fron-tair'-a, a considerable town in Spain, situate on the Cabra, 22 miles S.S.E. of Cordova. It is distinguished for the salubrity of its air. Trade. Corn, oil and wine. Pop. 12,000.

AGUILAS, a'-goo-e-lass, a Spanish town in the province of Murcia, on the Mediterranean. It is well built, and has a castle and fortress which it keeps garrisoned. It lies at a distance of 38 miles from Carthagena. Exp. Chiefly grain. Pop. 5,000.

AGUILLON, FRANCOIS D', a-gwil'-on, a Flemish mathematician, of the order of Jesus, who produced a book on optics and spheric projections.
Born at Brussels, 1566; died at Seville, 1617.

AGUIRRA, JOSEF SAENZ D', a'-goo-eer-ra, a Spanish Benedictine monk, who received a cardinalship from Innocent XI. He compiled a collection of the councils of Spain, in six vols. folio, and wrote some theological pieces and commentaries on the Ethics of Aristotle.
Born at Logrogno, 1630; died at Rome, 1699.

AGUJARI, a'-goo-e-a-re, an Italian vocalist of great celebrity, who, for two songs a night, was engaged at a salary of 100*l.* per night.
Died at Parma, 1783.

AGYLEUS, and AGYIEUS, ăj'-i-lé'-us, ăj'-i-é'-us, from aguia, a street; a surname of Apollo, because sacrifices were offered to him in the public streets of Athens.

AGYLLA, ă-jil'-a, a town of Etruria, founded by a colony of Pelasgians, and governed by Mexentius when Æneas went to Italy. It was afterwards called Cære, by the Lydians, who took possession of it. It is now Cerveteri.

AGYLLÆUS, ăj-il-lé'-us, a famous wrestler of Cleonæ, scarcely inferior in strength to Hercules, whose son he was said to be.

AGYRIUM, ă-jir'-e-um, a town of Sicily, where Diodorus the historian was born. The inhabitants were called Agyrinenses. It is now St. Filippo d' Argiro.

AGYRUS, ăj-i'-rus, a tyrant of Sicily, assisted by Dionysius against the Carthaginians.

AHAB, ai'-hab, king of Israel, and the son of Amri, whom he succeeded. He was married to Jezebel, whose wickedness instigated him to the commission of such acts of cruelty and idolatry, that he surpassed all his predecessors in impiety. He was slain by an arrow in a war with the Syrians, and his blood was licked by the dogs on the spot where he had caused Naboth to be murdered. Reigned 918-897 B.C.

AHADKOI, ă-hăd-koy, a village of Asiatic Turkey, in the province of Anatolia, 6 miles from Ellshak.—It contains some interesting remains, supposed to be those of the ancient Trajanopolis.

AHANTA, ă-hăn-ta, a district on the Gold Coast of Africa, extending from the Ancobra to the Chaddah. (See ASHANTEE.)

AHAR, a-har, a town of Persia, 60 miles from Tabriz. It numbers about 800 houses, and is partially encompassed by a dilapidated wall.

AHASCRAGH, ă-hăs-cra, a market town of Ireland, in Galway. Pop. under 600.

AHASUERUS, ă-has-u-eer'-us, the Persian king. a portion of whose history is recorded in the book of Esther. He is called by Josephus Arthasastha, or Artaxerxes. The word Achashverosh has been applied to him as well as other Persian monarchs, because it means a noble, or excellent prince. It is doubtful whether he is the Artaxerxes Longimanus of the Greek historians; if so his reign may be fixed to have commenced 465 B.C.—Ahasuerus is also a Scripture name for Cambyses the son of Cyrus (Ezra iv. 6) and for Astyages, King of the Medes (Dan. ix. 1).

AHAVA, a-ha'-va, a river of Assyria or Babylon, where Ezra assembled the captives who were returning to Judæa.—Ezra viii. 15.

AHAZ, ai'-haz, king of Judah, who, at the beginning of his reign, defeated Rezin, king of Syria, according to the promise of Isaiah. Notwithstanding this, he abandoned the worship of God, fell into idolatrous practices, and became so impious that his body was not permitted to be buried in the royal sepulchres.—Reigned 741-725 B.C.

AHAZIAH, ă-hă-zi'-ah, king of Israel. There are two kings of this name mentioned in Scripture: the first was the son of Ahab, and the other king of Judah. This last was slain by Jehu, 886 B.C.

Died 999.

AHMED BEN MAHAMMED, a'-med ben mo'-ham-ed, a Moorish poet of Spain, whose effusions partook of the oriental style. He wrote historical annals of Spain.
Died 970.

AHMED KHAN, a'-med kan, successor of Abaka Khan, and the first of the Moguls who professed Mahometanism, which gave great offence to his family. He was conspired against by his courtiers, who set up in his stead Argoun, his nephew. Put to death A.D. 1234.

AHMED SHAH EL ABDALY, a'-med sha el ăb'-dă-le, the founder of the kingdom of Cabul and Candahar. He was a great warrior, and broke the power of the Mahrattas, by defeating them in the battle of Paniput, on the 7th January, 1761. In the latter part of his life he was engaged in continual warfare with the Sikhs, but ended his days the sovereign of an empire which he had conquered, and which extended from Sirhind on the east to Herat on the west, and from the mouths of the Indus and the Arabian Sea on the south to the banks of the Oxus and Cashmere on the north.
Born 1724; died 1773.

AHMEDABAD, a'-mai-da-bad', a district of British India, in the Bombay presidency, at the head of the Gulf of Cambay. Area, 3,821 square miles. Pop. 856,324.

AHMEDABAD, the 'abode of Ahmed,' capital of the above district. The city stands on the Sabermutty, 120 miles N. of Surat. The magnificence of this city was considerable in former times, but an earthquake in 1822 nearly destroyed it. Sufficient of it remains, however, to bear testimony to its original grandeur, being six miles in circumference and defended by a massive wall, repaired in 1534. The town was built by Ahmed Shah, in 1412. The Jumaah Masjid, or Great Mosque, in the centre of the city, is a superb edifice, and the mosque of Sujaat Khan is very beautiful. There is also a fine modern Jain temple. The town is an important station on the Bombay, Baroda, and Central Indian Railway. Pop. about 127,621. Lat. 23° N. Lon. 72° 36' E.

AIKIN, JOHN, M.D., aï-kin, an eminent physician, but more distinguished as a popular author. He was the only son of the Rev. John Aikin, D.D., for many years a tutor of divinity at a dissenting academy at Warrington, Lancashire. After finishing his studies at the university of Edinburgh, he became a pupil of Dr. William Hunter, and first settled as a surgeon at Chester, afterwards at Warrington, and ultimately he succeeded in establishing himself in the metropolis. Here, with his sister, Mrs. Barbauld, he pursued literature with considerable success, producing several works, which aimed at making science popular amongst those classes who, without such works, would, in all probability, have never entered upon scientific studies of any kind. He compiled a Biographical Dictionary, and his "Evenings at Home" still commands a wide reputation, and is decidedly the most useful of all Dr. Aikin's works. To this, which extended to six volumes, Mrs. Barbauld contributed, but not to a greater extent than about half a volume. His "Natural History of the Year" is another work which has enjoyed considerable popularity.

Born at Warrington, 1747; died at Stoke Newington, 1822.

AIKIN, ARTHUR, eldest son of the above, inherited much of his father's literary talent, but chiefly applied himself to scientific pursuits. He was for several years editor of the "Annual Review," and in 1814 contributed to science a "Manual of Mineralogy." He also produced a "Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures," and another of "Chemistry and Mineralogy." Besides being the author of the above, Mr. Aikin was a large contributor to scientific journals, and was, for several years, the resident secretary to the Society of Arts.

Born 1784; died in London, 1854.

AIKIN, LUCY, a sister of the preceding, historian and biographer. Her best known works are "Memoirs of the Courts of Queen Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I.," and biographies of Addison and of her father. For the last forty years of her life she resided at Hampstead, devoted to literary pursuits.

Born at Warrington, 1781; died at Hampstead, 1864.

AIKMAN, WILLIAM, aik'-man, a Scotch painter, was the only son of William Aikman, Esq., of Cairney, Aberdeenshire, advocate, by Margaret, sister of Sir John Clerk, of Pennycuik, bart. He was intended for the profession of the law, but his passion for the fine arts was so great that he determined to cultivate it. After studying three years in Italy, he visited Turkey; thence he went to Rome, whence, after a short stay, he came back to England, and found a patron in the duke of Argyle. He excelled most in portrait-painting.

Born at Cairney, 1682; died in London, 1731.

AIN, ăng, a river of France, rising near Nozeroy, in the Jura mountains, falling into the Rhone 18 miles above Lyons.

AIN, a department of France, which is formed out of the ancient districts of Bresse, Bugey, Dombes, and Valromey. It is bounded on the N. by Jura and Saône-et-Loire, on the E. by Switzerland and Savoy, on the W. by the departments of the Saône-et-Loire and the Rhone, and on the S. by the department of Isère. It is divided into five arrondissements, 36 cantons, and 452 communes. The department, which takes its name from the river running through it, has a length of about 54 miles, running north and south, and an average width of about 52 miles.

Area.—2,241 square miles.

Description.—In the northern and eastern divisions the mountainous scenery of Switzerland prevails in a lesser degree, the slopes being crowned with firs, and the valleys clothed with rich verdure, and yielding corn of all kinds, with fruits, amongst which the grape holds a prominent place. In the southern parts of the western division, the country is a dead flat, marshy, and full of ponds and lakes. In this region the ponds are so numerous as to cover a space of 50,000 acres.

Climate.—Variable.

Produce.—Corn, fruit, potatoes, hay, some hemp and flax. The mulberry is cultivated as the food of the silkworm, some silk being produced here. Bees are generally kept, and in the east the rearing of sheep is extensively carried on. Goats are common, and mules and oxen are employed in the plough.

Forests.—These generally consist of the beech, the fir, and the oak.

Wild Animals.—Wolves, bears, foxes, wild cats,—and the boar is sometimes met with.

Birds.—In the neighbourhood of the lakes and ponds, ducks, geese, swans, cranes, storks, herons, and cormorants, are abundant.

Towns.—The principal are BOURG, BELLEY, NANTUA, GEX, and TREVOUX.

Manufactures.—Comparatively few, consisting of woollen cloths, hempen, cotton, and silk fabrics; paper, clocks, watches, leather, bricks, pottery, horn combs, and an inferior description of cutlery.

Pop. 363,000.

Born at Exeter, 1807.

AINSWORTH WILLIAM HARRISON, a writer of a large number of popular novels and romances, who first obtained notoriety by selecting for his heroes such characters as Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin, noted robbers and highwaymen. His later works chiefly deal with historical characters.

Born at Manchester, 1805. Died 1882.

AINTAB, or ANTAB, aint'-tab, or ăn'-tab, capital of a district of the same name, a town of Syria, about 3 miles in circumference, situate in a valley between two hills, and partly on them. The river Sejour runs by it. On the north side there is a castle garrisoned, and on the south an extensive cemetery, which has the appearance of being large suburbs. The town is inhabited by Mahometans, Armenians, and Greeks, and contains a church and several mosques. The chief trade is in coarse stamped calicoes, and various coloured woollens, also leather and raw hides; and skins are dyed red and yellow, into what is called Turkey leather. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 36° 58′ N. Lon 37° 13′ E.—This town was in 1400 taken by Tamerlane, and in 1839 by Hafiz Pasha, shortly before the battle of Nizib.

AIRAINES, air'-aine, a town and district of France, 16 miles from Amiens. Pop. 2,061.

AIRASEA, air-a'-se-a, a Sardinian town in Piedmont, 5 miles from Pinerolo. Pop. 2,000.

AIRAY, HENRY, air'-ai, an English divine, who, from a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, was in 1600, elected provost; and in 1606 served the office of vice-chancellor. He was a cultivated Puritan, and wrote a few theological pieces.

Born at Kentmere, Westmoreland, 1560; died 1616.

AIRAY, CHRISTOPHER, a divine related to the above, who had the living of Milford, in Hampshire. He wrote a few pieces in Latin and English.

Died 1678.

AIRD, THOMAS, aird, an original poet of considerable power and a contributor to periodical literature.

Born at Bowden, Roxburgshire, 1802; died 1876.

AIRDRIE, air'-dre, a town and Parliamentary borough (one of the Falkirk boroughs), of Scotland, in the county of Lanark, consisting chiefly of one street a mile long. It is a very rising and flourishing town, has manufactures of cotton, silk, and paper, and in its neighbourhood are large coal mines and iron-works. There are several churches, a fine Town Hall, and other public buildings. 11 miles to the E. of Glasgow. A station on the North British Railway. Pop. 13,488.

AIRDS, THE, airds, a district in Argyleshire, Scotland. It lies between lochs Creran and Linnhe, and is remarkable for the grandeur of its scenery.

AIRD'S-MOSS, airds-moss, a moorland tract between the rivers Ayr and Lugar, in Ayrshire, Scotland.—At its eastern extremity Cameron the Covenanter fell in 1680, and a monument is erected to his memory on the spot.

AIRE, air, a river of England, in Yorkshire, which falls into the Ouse near Howden.

AIRE, an episcopal town of France, in the department of the Landes, on the Adour, 65 miles S. of Bordeaux. It is built on the declivity of a mountain. Pop. 5,100. Lat. 43° N. Lon. 0° 16′ W.—This town was the capital of the Visigoths.

AIRE, or ARIEN, a strong town of France, department of the Pas de Calais, on the river Lys, 22 miles S. of Dunkirk, communicating with St. Omer by a canal from the river Aa. The streets are well paved and adorned with fountains. The town-hall and St. Paul's church are ancient and handsome edifices. The manufactures of the town are chiefly cotton and linen fabrics, hats, soap, basket-work and flooring tiles. The town was founded by Liodoric, first count of Flanders, about 630. Pop. 8,800.

AIROLA, air'-o-ia, an Italian town 23 miles N. of Naples. Pop. 4,600.

AIROLE, air'-ol, a town in the province of St. Remo, Piedmont. Pop. 1,500.

AIROLO, air'-o-lo, a Swiss village 26 miles from Bellinzona, on the south side of Mont St. Gothard. Pop. 900.—On the 13th September, 1799, a battle was fought between the French and the Russians, in which the latter were the victors, forcing the St. Gothard pass.

AIRON, air'-ong, a river of France, department of the Nièvre, which falls into the Loire.

AIRTH, airth, a small town of Scotland, in the county of Stirling, on the Forth, having an inconsiderable harbour, and about 8 miles from Stirling. Pop. 15,00.

AIRVAUX, air'-vo, a town of France, in the department of the Deux Sèvres, 23 miles N. of Parthenay, on the Thouet. Manf. Woollen stuffs. Pop. 2,000.

AIRY, GEORGE BIDDELL, air'-e, the present astronomer-royal. After being educated at several private schools, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a sizar, at the age of 18. He took his degree of B.A., and in his 22nd year became senior wrangler. In 1824 he was elected fellow of the college, and in 1826 was appointed to the Lucasian chair. Whilst holding this appointment, he delivered a course of admirable lectures in experimental philosophy. In 1828 he was elected Plumian professor of astronomy, for which he resigned his former appointment. He now earnestly devoted himself to astronomical studies, and in 1835, on the resignation of Mr. Pond, he had the honourable office of astronomer-royal conferred upon him. In this position he has been enabled to labour successfully for the advancement of science, and through his exertions the Greenwich Observatory stands second to none in the world. Mr. Airy has written much upon mechanics and optics; and has had his great abilities honourably recognized by various scientific societies. In 1828 he became a fellow of the Astronomical Society, and in 1835 was elected its president. In 1836 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and is a member of various other scientific societies both in Europe and America. Mr. Airy has received two of the medals of the Astronomical Society, one for his "planetary observations," and the other for his "discovery of the inequality of Venus and the Earth." He has also received the Copley, and the Royal medals of the Royal Society, and the Lalande medals of the French Academy of Sciences; is an LL.D. of Edinburgh, and was made Companion of the Bath in 1871. The freedom of the City of London was conferred upon him in 1875.

Born at Alnwick, Northumberland, 1801.

AISLINGEN, ai'-sling-en, a town of Bavaria 4 miles S. of Dillingen.

AISNE, aine, a department of France, consisting of portions of the Isle de France, Champagne, and Picardy, bounded on the N. by the department of Nord and the province of Hainault, W. by Oise and Somme, S. by Marne and Seine-et-Marne, and E. by Ardennes. It is divided into 5 arrondissements, 37 cantons, and 837 communes.

Area.—2,300 square miles.

Description.—Consisting chiefly of extensive plains undulated by numerous hills, which in no instance rise higher than 400 feet, except in the case of one whereon stands the city of Laon, which is nearly 600 feet above the level of the sea. The department is traversed by many canals and roads, twelve of the latter being supported by the state, and twenty-nine by the department.

Climate.—Temperate and healthy.

Produce.—Corn, fruit, hay, flax, and hops. In the lands which stretch along the Oise, horned cattle, sheep, and horses are reared in goodly numbers. Large quantities of artichokes and leguminous plants are grown in the district of Laon, whilst the hills of Marne are mostly planted with the vine.

Forests.—Extensive: those of Coucy, Samoussy, and Villequier occupy 60,000 acres; those of Retz and Villers-Cotterets, 30,000; and those of La Fere, Dole, and Ris, are still larger. The trees of which they mostly consist, are the beech, the plane, the oak, the poplar, and the birch.

Towns.—The principal are LAON, ST. QUENTIN, VERVINS, SOISSONS, and CHÂTAU-THIERRY.

Manufactures.—Considerable. In and around St. Quentin, the population are supported by the productions of muslins, fine cotton tissues of all kinds, linens, and Cashmere shawls. At Folembray, glass, decanters, and mirrors are made; and in other parts, hosiery, cotton twist, soap, paper, pottery, tiles, bricks, nails, &c., occupy the inhabitants. A good quantity of beer and cider is made, and there are many beetroot-sugar factories. Of flour-mills there are upwards of 1,000, and a large corn-market is held in St. Quentin.

Pop. 552,000.

Lat. between 48° 50′ and 50° N. Lon. between 2° 56′ and 4° 12′ E.

AISNE, a considerable river of the above department, joining the Oise near Compiègne. In length it is about 150 miles, 80 of which are navigable.

AISONE, aid'-zo-nai, an Italian town, in the province of Cuneo, Piedmont. Pop. 1,200.

AISTULPH, or ASTOLPHUS, ais'-tulf, king of the Lombards, who succeeded his brother Rachis in 750. The commencement of his reign was signalized by his making an inroad on the territories of the Roman see; but Pepin, king of France, besieged him in Pavia, and compelled him to restore all the places he had taken. The treaty which had been entered into was afterwards violated by Aistulph, who again invaded the Roman states. Pepin once more came to the assistance of the pope, and Aistulph retired to Pavia, where he was forced to sue for peace. He was killed in hunting.

AITHSTING, aith'-sting, a maritime parish of Shetland, joined to Sandsting on the mainland, with a bay affording good anchorage. Pop. 2,800.

AITON, ai'-ton, an Italian town. in the province of Moriano, Piedmont. Pop. 1,200.

AITON, WILLIAM, ai'-ton, a Scotch gardener, who coming to London to seek employment, obtained it, and became superintendent of the botanical garden at Kew, which he greatly improved, and in 1783 was appointed to manage also the pleasure and kitchen gardens. In 1788 he published his "Hortus Kewensis."

Born near Hamilton, Lanark, 1731; died 1793.

AITRACH, ai'-trak, a tributary stream of the Iller.

AITZEMA, LEON VAN, ait'-ze-ma, a resident representative of the Hanse Towns at the Hague, who became eminent as an historian. His "History of the United Provinces" is written in Dutch, and extends to fifteen vols. 4to. It has been continued down to 1692 and published.

Born at Doccum, Friesland, 1600; died 1669.

AIVAZORSKI, GABRIEL, historian, descended from an ancient family long settled in Poland; studied in the convent of St. Lazare, and having entered into holy orders, became professor of European and Oriental languages, philosophy and theology. Prefect of the Armenian College, Paris, 1848; founded the Armenian College at Grenelle, near Paris, 1854. Member of the Historical Institute of France, and author of histories of Russia and Turkey in the Armenian language.

Born in the Crimea, 1812.

AIVAZORSKI, EVAN, painter. Brother of the above. Professor in the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts at St. Petersburg, and of the Academy of Fine Arts, Amsterdam; decorated with the French cross of the Legion of Honour.
Born 1817.

AIX, aiks, an ancient archiepiscopal city of France, formerly the capital of Provence, now in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone. It is built in a plain on the right bank of the Arc, 17 miles N. of Marseilles. Pop. 29,000.—Aix was founded by Caius Sextus Calvinus, a Roman general, 120 years before the Christian era, and received the name of Aquæ Sextæ, from its famous springs. On the adjoining plain, near Mont Victorie, Marius gained a complete victory over the Teutons, considerably improved the town and built aqueducts to supply its inhabitants with water. Cæsar colonized it with a draught from his 25th legion, and in A.D. 450 it escaped being ravaged by the Visigoths through the intercession of an archbishop of the name of Basillius. It was subsequently sacked by the Saracens, but was rebuilt in 796. Under the counts of Provence, it grew into a place of great importance, and about the beginning of the 13th century became the arena of the poetical contests of the troubadours. This gave it a literary celebrity, and tournaments which were held here in the reign of King René, filled it with strangers from all parts of Europe. Shortly after the death of Charles III., it was united to the crown of France, when it became the seat of the Provençal parliament. In the reign of Francis I., it was plundered by the Marseillais, and in 1535 seized by Charles V., who was here crowned king of Arles. It is still regarded as the literary and artistic capital of Provence, and its churches and cathedrals enjoy an architectural celebrity. There is an academy of theology and law, and a very large and valuable public library. There are several quaint fountains, and a curious clock tower. Cotton-spinning and leather-dressing are carried on, and there is a good trade in oil, wine, and almonds. There are warm springs which are much frequented. The territory in which it stands is famous for the olive-oil which is produced from it. Five miles from Aix is the splendid aqueduct Roquefavour, 1,300 feet long and 270 feet high, carrying the canal of the Durance over the valley of the Arc.

AIX, a town of France, in the department of Savoie. Its warm baths have been famous from the time of the Romans. It is situate in a fertile and beautiful valley, near the Lake of Bourget, and has many remains of antiquarian interest. Pop. 4,460.

AIX, a small island off the west coast of France, about equidistant from Rochefort and Rochelle. It is memorable from its being the last spot of French soil on which Napoleon Bonaparte stood, just prior to his embarkation on board the Bellerophon, July 15th, 1815. Its situation is about 14 miles N.W. of Rochefort, and it contains works for military culprits. Pop. 300.

AIX D'ANGUILLON, LES, lais aiks dan'-gu-e-long, a town of France, department of the Cher.

AIXE, aiks, a town of France, department of Upper Vienne, 6 miles S. Limoges. Pop. 3,000.

AIX-EN-OTHE, aiks'-en-ote, a town of France, in Champagne, department of the Aube, 15 miles from Troyes. Manf. Cotton twist. Pop. 2,500.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, giks'-la-sha-pel', which in German is called Aachen, in an ancient city, the seat of a bishop, and the capital of a district in Rhenish Prussia. It is encompassed by walls and defended by a citadel, which in former times was surrounded by a fosse, now filled up, planted with trees, and converted into public walks. It is a principal station on the Belgian-Rhenish railway, and an important manufacturing and trading town. Generally speaking, the city is well built, with open, wide, and regular streets, in which are many handsome buildings intermingled with the Gothic façades of antiquity, now fast passing into a state of decay. Its cathedral is an octagonal structure in the Byzantine style, erected in 983 by Otho III., from a great portion of the materials which formed a part of an original chapel built by Charlemagne, and from which it took its name. The gallery of this edifice was formerly adorned with 32 pillars which Charlemagne took from the Exarchic palace at Ravenna, and which were of granite and porphyry. These were carried away by the French, during the last war, and only part of them were afterwards returned. In the sacristy the remains of Charlemagne are preserved in a costly chest. The city has, besides its cathedral, the town-house, in which is the famous coronation hall, in which 37 German emperors and 11 empresses have been crowned; the church of the Franciscans, in which are some very fine pictures; there are three monasteries and about thirty churches, bath-houses, a theatre, several hospitals, and various other public buildings. Near the town, rebuilt from the ruins, is Frankenberg, once the favourite abode of Charlemagne. Hot and cold mineral springs are in the centre of the town.

Manufactures.—Woollen cloth and needles. It has coach, glass button, and chemical factories and engineering establishments.
Population 85,551.

AIZANI, ai-za'-ne, the modern Tchafter Hissar, a city of Asia Minor, about nine hours' journey from Kutahia. Little is known of its history; but from the extensive remains of which it is composed, it was evidently a place of note. The ruins of a temple dedicated to Jupiter, built on an elevated platform, cut out of a hill side, are very extensive. The columns were single blocks of white marble of great size. Remains of a theatre, stadium, and gymnasium have also been discovered.

AIZENAY, aize'-nai, a town of France, department of La Vendée. Pop. 3,500.

AJACCIO, ă-jăs'-e-o, (Ital. a-yat'-se-o), the principal town in the island of Corsica, protected by a citadel built by Marshal de Termes, the see of a bishop, and now a department of France. It is situate on a tongue of land projecting into the Gulf of Ajaccio, on the south-west coast of the island. There is a secure and commodious harbour. The town contains a cathedral, college, and public library, and is remarkable for being the birthplace of Napoleon Bonaparte, and the house in which he was born is now the property of the municipality. This building, humble as it is, is the chief object of interest in the town, which consists of two principal streets, tolerably wide and well built, and of a few others which are both narrow and dirty. Manf. Leather and bricks. Its principal trade is in wine, olive-oil, oranges, citron, anchovies, and coral, which is collected near the coast. Pop. 16,500. Lat. 41° 54′ N. Lon. 8° 44′ E.—Steamers ply regularly to Toulon, which lies 168 miles N.N.W.

AJALA, MARTIN PEREZ D', a-jä'-la, a Spanish ecclesiastic who was sent by Charles V. to the council of Trent, and afterwards made archbishop of Valentia. He discharged the duties of his station in an exemplary manner. The principal of his works is entitled "De Divinis Traditionibus."

Born at Carthagena, 1504; died 1556.

AJAN, aï'-jan, a country on the east coast of Africa, south of Abyssinia and the Straits of Babelmandeb: it extends from Port Darnford to Ras Hasoun, embracing about ten degrees of latitude. Desc. The eastern coast is sandy and barren, but to the north the country is more fertile, producing, more particularly, an excellent breed of horses, which the Arabian merchants, who come to trade in its ports, take, together with ivory, gold, Abyssinian slaves captured in war, &c., in exchange for silks, cottons, and other cloths. Inhabitants. These are not so dark-complexioned as those of the west coast, and their hair is rather long. They are accounted good Mussulmans. Farther from the sea, there are negroes, who intermarry with the Bedouins. Little, however, is known of this extensive strip of coast. Towns. The chief are Magadoxo, Brava, and Melinde.

AJAX, aï'-jax, the son of Telamon, by Periboea or Eriboea, daughter of Alcathous, and, with the exception of the Achilles, the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. According to Homer, he encountered Hector, with whom at parting he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulysses each claimed the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was so enraged that he slaughtered a whole flock of sheep—supposing them to be the sons of Atreus, who had given the preference to Ulysses—and killed himself with his sword. On this incident one of the tragedies of Sophocles is founded. Other legends say that he was killed by Paris in battle, and by others that he was murdered by Ulysses. His body was buried at Sigæum, some say on Mount Rhœtus. His supposed tomb was visited by Alexander the Great. Hercules, according to several authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childless, might have a son with a skin as impenetrable as that of the Nemean lion, which he then wore. His prayers were heard, and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's skin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in the breast, or, according to some authorities, behind the neck.—Another Ajax (the Less) the son of Oileus, king of Locris, surnamed Locrian, in contradistinction to the son of Telamon. As one of Helen's suitors, he sailed with forty ships to the Trojan war. The night that Troy was taken he offered violence to Cassandra, who fled into the temple of Minerva. For this, as he was returning home, the goddess, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter and the power of tempests from Neptune, destroyed his ship in a storm. Ajax swam to a rock, and exclaimed that he was safe in spite of the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who struck the rock with his trident, and Ajax fell with part of the rock into the sea, and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black sheep offered on his tomb.—According to the fanciful mythology of ancient Greeks, these two heroes were supposed after death to be transported to the island of Leuce, a separate place, reserved only for the bravest of antiquity.

AJEHO, also called ALCHUKU, a city of Manchuria, in the Chinese empire. It is a busy town, inhabited by Chinese emigrants, who cultivate grain and opium in the surrounding district. Pop. about 40,000.

AJELLO, a-yel'-lo, a Neapolitan town in the province of Calabria Citra, 9 miles S. of Cosenza. Pop. 4,200.—This town is supposed to stand on the site of the ancient Tilesis.—Another town in the province of Principato Citra, near Salerno.—Another in Abruzzo, near Aquila.—Another in Illyria, 12 miles S. of Gorizia.

AJETA, a-ye-ta, a town of Naples, 8 miles from Scalea. Pop. 3,300.

AJISTAN, a-jis'-tan, a large straggling town of Persia, encompassed by gardens, and containing a royal palace. It stands 80 miles E. of Kashan.

AJMERE, adj'-meer, an Indian province belonging to the British, under the administration of the Governor-General of India. Area, 2,711 square miles. Pop. 460,722, of whom about 58,000 are Mahometans, the remainder Hindoos. In the north and north-west are ranges of mountains, the remainder of the province generally being a plain with an average elevation of 2,000 feet above the sea. The climate is healthy, but the country suffers from want of water. The province was taken from the Mahrattas by the British in 1817.

AJMERE, the capital of the above province, built at the foot of a high mountain, on the top of which is a fortress of great strength, called Taraghur. It is 228 miles W. by S. from Agra. Pop. 48,735. Lat. 26° 29′ N. Lon. 74° 43′ E.—Just above the city is a lake four miles in circumference during the dry, and six, during the wet season, well stocked with fish, and supplying the inhabitants with abundance of excellent water. It was formed by the emperors of Delhi, who dammed up the outlet of an extensive valley, which was watered by several streams, and which around the banks of this extensive basin is still plentifully irrigated. There are some wide streets and good residences, and the mosques and temples are large and of massive architecture. The Ajmere College is a fine new structure. Pilgrimages are made to the tomb of the Mahometan saint, Mayud-ud-din, which is near the town, and an annual fair is held in honour of the same saint.

AJOFRIN, a-jof'-rin, a town of New Castile, in Spain, 9 miles from Toledo. Pop. 3,000.

AJRA, aj'ra, a town of India, in the native state of Kelapore, in the Bombay presidency. The district in which it stands is fertile, and abounds with lead and iron. Lat. 16° 8′ N. Lon. 74° 17′ E.

AJURNOCA, a-joor'-nok-a, a town and district of the Brazil, 100 miles N. of Rio de Janeiro. Pop. 12,500.

AKABAH, GULF OF, ak'-a-ba, the smaller of the two arms into which the Red Sea is divided at its northern extremity, and about 100 miles long and 12 wide. It is generally about 200 fathoms deep, but its navigation is very unsafe, especially during the prevalence of north winds. The Straits of Tiran, less than half a mile wide, connect it with the Red Sea, and the small island of Tiran lies at its entrance.

AKABAH, a fortified village with an Egyptian garrison, situate on the east side of the gulf of the same name. Lat. 29° 24′ N. Lon. 36° 0′ E.

Born at Chalons, Champagne; died 1551.

AKAKIA, MARTIN, son of the above, and physician to Henry III. He wrote a treatise "De Morbis Mulieribus, et Consilia Medica," to be published after his death.—There are several other persons of the same name and family, who acquired reputation in different professions.

AKALIGURH, a-kal-e-goor, a town situate between the rivers Ravee and Chenab, in the Punjab. Lat. 32° 17′ N. Lon. 73° 37′ E.

AKASCHANSK, a-kas-kansk, a town of Asiatic Russia, on the river Onan, in the government of Irkutsk.

AKBAR, JELLAL-UD-DIN MOHAMMED, ak'-bar, ("very great"), sultan of the Moguls, succeeded his father Humayun in 1556, and was the greatest of all the sovereigns who have reigned in Hindostan. He ascended the throne in his thirteenth year, when his country was torn by dissensions; but although possessed of superior intelligence, he was wholly unequal to the task of governing his kingdom. Accordingly he called in to his assistance a Turkoman nobleman named Beyram Khan, on whom he conferred the power of regent, and left the administration of affairs chiefly to him. By the severity of the measures adopted by this personage, the country was restored to comparative tranquility; but the rigour with which he exercised his authority was felt by Akbar himself, who, in 1558, being then only sixteen years of age, broke from his control, and took the reins of government into his own hands. Beyram now raised the standard of rebellion, and for two years endeavoured to create an independent province for himself in Malwa; failing in this, however, he submitted to Akbar, and was pardoned. The young monarch now turned his attention to the enlargement of his kingdom, which had been greatly reduced by the invasions of successful chiefs, who lost no opportunity of extending their own territories in the country in which the right of the sword was the only power recognised and acknowledged. At first his dominions were comprised in the Punjab, and the Provinces of Agra and Delhi, but, by the fortieth year of his reign, his empire extended from the Hindoo-Coosh mountains to the borders of the Deccan, and from the Bramahputra to Candahar. His latter days were embittered by the death of two sons, and the rebellion of a third, Jehangir, who succeeded to the throne. Great as Akbar was as a conqueror, his sway was characterized by general mildness, wisdom, and toleration. He laboured to abolish the most cruel superstitious rites of the Hindoos in their religion, and expressed his opinion, that God could only be worshipped by following reason, and not by yielding an implicit faith to any alleged revelation. The memory of the beneficence of his reign is still vividly impressed on the mind of the Hindoo, and not without reason, as is shown by the following extract from an address presented by the rajah of Joudpoor to the bigoted Aurungzebe a century after the reign of Akbar.—"Your ancestor Akbar, whose throne is now in heaven, conducted the affairs of his empire in equity and security for the space of fifty years. He preserved every tribe of men in ease and happiness, whether they were followers of Jesus or of Moses, of Brahma or Mahomet. Of whatever sect or creed they might be, they all equally enjoyed his countenance and favour, insomuch that his people, in gratitute for the indiscriminate protection which he afforded them, distinguished him by the appellation of 'Guardian of Mankind.'"

Born at Amerkote, 1542; died 1605.

AKDASCH, ak'-dash, a town of Persia, province of Schirvan, on the Kur, numbering about 300 houses.

AK-DEYAVIN, ak-de-ya'-vin, a village of Asia Minor, 40 miles from Aleppo, where there are some interesting architectural remains.

AKEBALA, a-ke-ba'-la, a town of Turkish Armenia, 24 miles W.N.W. of Erzeroum.

AKEBAR, a'-ke-ba, a town of Arabian Irak, on the Tigris, 30 miles N.W. of Bagdad.

AKEN, JEROME VAN, Dutch painter, sometimes called Bosch, a contraction of the name of his birthplace. Originator of the fantastic style of Dutch painting. The Last Judgment and the Temptation of St. Anthony, engravings from which are well known, are characteristic examples of his style.

Born at Hertogenbosch, about 1450; died at the same place, 1518.

AKENSIDE, MARK, ak'-ken-side, an English poet and physician, who, when young, was crippled by the falling of a cleaver on his foot in the shop of his father, who was a butcher. He had a weakness of being always ashamed of his origin, though the limp in his gait was such as to preserve it continually in his memory. His parents being dissenters, intended him for the ministry in their sect, and at the age of eighteen he was sent to Edinburgh to pursue his studies; but instead of following divinity, he devoted himself to physic. In 1741 he went to Leyden, where, in three years, he took his degree of M.D. In 1744 he published his "Pleasures of Imagination," a performance which at once attained celebrity, and proved him a true poet. He soon afterwards commenced practising as a physician at Northampton. Meeting with little success, he removed to Hampstead, and a Mr. Dyson generously allowed him 300*l.* a year till he could fix himself in practice. Removing to London, he was elected fellow of the College of Physicians, one of the physicians of St. Thomas's Hospital, and physician to the queen. In 1764 he printed a discourse in Latin on the dysentery, and was in a fair way of attaining considerable eminence in his profession, when he was carried off by a putrid fever. His remains were interred in the church of St. James's, Westminster. He was an elegant writer; but his excessive admiration of the ancients exposed him to ridicule, and Smollett made him the hero of the broadly humorous description of the feast after the manner of the ancients, in "Peregrine Pickle."

Born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1721; died in London, 1770.

AKERBLAD, JAN DAVID, ak'-er-blad, a learned Swede, who, being appointed secretary to the Swedish embassy at Constantinople, had an opportunity of pursuing researches into Runic, Phœnician, and Egyptian literature. Afterwards Swedish chargé d'affaires in Paris. He was not only able to read but to converse in several European and Oriental languages.

Born 1760; died at Rome, 1819.

AKERMANN, a'-ker-man, a fortified town in the province of Bessarabia, Russia. It stands on the southern shore of the Dniestrovskoi lake, through which the river Dniester flows into the Black Sea. The harbour is well defended by a citadel on an eminence, and is commodious for shipping. The town, however, is ill built, and the streets dirty. Pop. about 45,598, and consisting chiefly of Armenians, Greeks, and Jews. Lat. 46° 12′ N. Lon. 30° 22′ E.

History.—The town was ceded to Russia by Turkey in 1812. In October, 1826, a treaty was concluded here between Russia and Turkey, by which Turkey recognized the independence of Wallachia and Moldavia, and restored the privileges of the Servians, and granted to Russia the free navigation of the Black Sea, and the passage through the Dardanelles, Russia also making some concessions. Misunderstanding respecting this treaty led to the war between Russia and Turkey in 1828, which was terminated by the peace of Adrianople.

AKHALZIKH, ak'-hal'-zik, a fortified town of Russian Armenia, situate on a feeder of the Kur, between the Black Sea and the Caspian. It trades chiefly in silk and honey. Pop. 16,000, principally Armenians. Lat. 41° 40′ N. Lon. 43° 1′ E.

AKHALZIKH, a province of Asiatic Turkey, in Armenia, on the S.W. confines of Georgia. It derives its name from the above town.

AK-HISSAR, ak-his-sar', a town of Anatolia, Asia Minor, standing on a slight eminence, containing several bazaars and khans, a Greek school, and interesting remains of antiquity. Exp. Cotton goods. Pop. about 6,000, consisting of Turks, Greeks, and Jews. It is about 60 miles N.E. of Smyrna.

AKHLAT, or ARDISH, ak-lat, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 35 miles N.W. of Vari. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 38° 35′ N. Lon. 41° 22′ E.

AKHMYN. (See EKHMIN.)

AKHTIAR, old name of Sebastopol.

AKHYTYRKA. (See ACHTYRKA.)

AKIBA, ă-kī'ba, a Jewish rabbi, who was at first a shepherd, but at the age of forty devoted himself to learning, and became a teacher. He was flayed alive by the Romans, at the age, it is said, of 120 years. He is one of the ten Jewish martyrs named in a penitential prayer used once a year in the synagogues.—Akiba was one of the first compilers of the cabalistic traditions of the Jews.

AKKA, ak-ka, a town in the Sahara, on the borders of Morocco, and a caravan-station between Timbuctoo and Morocco. Lat. 28° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 10′ W.

AKKAR, or AKKER, ak'-kar, a town of Syria, in the pashalic of Tripoli, on the river Akker, 66 miles N.W. of Damascus. Lat. 34° 32′ N. Lon. 36° 10′ E.

AKNUR, ak-nur, a town of the Punjab, Hindostan, 100 miles N.E. of Lahore. It stands on the river Chenab, and, although mostly in ruins, has recently had a new fort erected in it.

AKOLA, ak-o-la', a district of British India, in the commissionership of West Berar. The district is nearly square in shape, and almost of a dead level. It is intersected by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, of which there are five stations in the district. Area 2,660 square miles. Pop. 592,792, nearly all Hindoos.

AKOLA, the chief town of the above district. There are an English church and school, and barracks for a detachment of troops. Pop. 12,500. Lat. 20° 6′ N. Lon. 76° 2′ E.

AKREYRI, ak-ray'-re, a Danish town, on the Eyiandford, Iceland, possessed of a good harbour, and the most important place for trade, after Reykiavik, in Iceland. Lat. 65° 40′ N.

AKRON, a town in Ohio, United States, on the Ohio Canal, 30 miles from Lake Erie. It is a place of considerable trade, and has fulling mills, woollen factories, and other large establishments. Mineral paint and wheat are great articles of export. The town is the capital of Summit County. Pop. about 11,000.

AK-SERAI, ak'-se-rai, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Karamania, 80 miles N.E. of Konieh. There are some interesting Saracenic remains. Pop. about 5,000. Lat. 38° 57′ N. Lon. 34° E.

AK-SHEHR, ak'-sher, 'white city,' a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Karamania. It exports to Smyrna fine carpets, wool, wax, gum tragacanth, and galls. 60 miles S.S.E. of Karahissar. It is the ancient Philomelion of Strabo. Ak-shehr was taken by Tamerlane in 1402.

AK-SHESHEHR, ak'-shesh-er, a town of Natolia, on the Black Sea, 90 miles E. of Constantinople.

AK-SOO, ak-su, a town of Chinese Turkestan, 250 miles N.E. of Yarkand. Manf. Woollen stuffs and jasper. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 41° 7′ N. Lon. 79° E. It is a resort of trading caravans from all parts of Asia.

AKSU, ak'-soo, 'white river,' the name of several rivers in Asia, the chief of which runs through Chinese Turkestan.

AKYAB, a district in the Arracan division of British Burmah, lying along the north-eastern shores of the Bay of Bengal. The central part of the district consists of three fertile valleys, through which the rivers Myu, Koladyne, and Lemyu make their way by numerous channels to the sea. Immense quantities of rice are grown. The four chief towns are Akyab, Khungchu, Koladyne, and Arracan. The district was ceded to the British after the Burmese war of 1825. Area 5,535 square miles, of which more than two-thirds is uncultivated. Pop. 359,706.

AKYAB, principal town and port of the above district. A very large export trade is carried on. Pop. 33,989. Lat. 20° 9′ N. Lon. 92° 56′ E.

ALA, a'-la, a market-town on the Adige, in the principality of Trent. Pop. 4,000, chiefly employed in the manufacture of velvets and silks.

ALABA, or ALAVA, a-la'-va, a district of Spain, in the province of Biscay, and once the seat of a kingdom. It is about 20 miles long and 17 wide, and has some rich iron-mines. The capital of the district is called Vittoria.

ALABAMA, ă'-la-ba'-ma, one of the United States, bounded, N. by Tennessee, E. by Georgia, S. by Florida and the Gulf of Mexico, W. by Mississippi.

Extent.—330 miles from north to south, and 154 miles from east to west.

Area.—50,722 square miles.

Description.—In describing this state, the "American Encyclopædia" says,—"In the south it is generally sandy and barren, and a part of the high hills are unfit for cultivation. A large portion of the country which lies between the Alabama and Tombigbee, of that part watered by the Coosa and Talapoosa, and of the Tennessee valley, consists of very excellent land. On the margins of the rivers in the southern part there is a quantity of cane-bottom land, of great fertility, generally from one half to three quarters of a mile wide; on the outside of this is a space which is low, wet, and intersected by stagnant water. Next to this river swamp, and elevated 10 or 15 feet above it, succeeds an extensive body of level land, of a black rich soil, with a growth of hickory, black oak, post oak, poplar, dog-wood, &c. After this come the prairies, which are wide-spreading plains, or gently-waving land, resting on a soft limestone rock, abounding in shells, clothed with grass, herbage, and flowers, and exhibiting, in the month of May, the most enchanting scenery."

Chief Towns.—MOBILE is the principal commercial town and port, but the state metropolis is MONTGOMERY. Other important towns are TUSCALOOSA, HUNTSVILLE, Selma, Marion, Cahawba, Florence, and Wetumpka.

Rivers.—The chief are the Alabama, from which the state is named, the Mobile, the Tombigbee, Talapoosa, Coosa, Tennessee, Perdido, Cahawba, Conecuh, and the Chatterhoochee.

Wild Animals.—The bear, wolf, panther, fox, &c. The rattlesnake abounds.

Climate.—Variable, but healthy, except on the borders of the rivers and the coast. June is the hottest month of the year, and in winter the rivers are rarely frozen.

Produce.—Cotton, corn, barley, rye, rice, tobacco, sugar, fruits, and silk. Horses, sheep, and neat cattle are numerous, and large quantities of pigs are killed for exportation.

Manufactures.—There are several iron foundries, and cotton manufactories, and there are great numbers of distilleries, and corn and flour mills.

Minerals.—Iron, coal, marble, lead and manganese. There are salt and sulphur springs.

Population 1,262,505.

Lat. between 30° 10′ and 35° N. Lon. between 85° and 88° 30′ W.

History.—Originally Alabama belonged to Georgia; but in 1798, with the state of Mississippi, it was formed into a territory, with a part of Florida taken possession of by the United States in 1812. In 1817 the western portion of this territory was made the "State of Mississippi," and the eastern the "Territory of Alabama," which, in March, 1819, was admitted into the Union as a separate state. Seceded from the Union, 1861; readmitted, 1865.

ALABAMA RIVER, a river of the United States, in Alabama, formed by the union of the Coosna and Talapoosa, flowing S.S.W., uniting with the Tombigbee to form Mobile river, 45 miles from the head of Mobile Bay.

ALABANDA, ă-la-băn'-da, an inland town of Caria, near the river Meander. Its inhabitants were called Alabandi, Alabandeni, and Alabandenses. It was built by Alabandus, who was on that account worshipped there.

ALABASTER, or ELEUTHERIA, ă-la-bas'-ter. (See BAHAMAS.)

ABABASTER, WILLIAM, ă-la-bas'-ter, an English divine, of considerable attainments, who was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and accompanied the earl of Essex to Cadiz, where he turned Papist. On his return to England, he again became a Protestant, and had some church preferment. Applying himself to the study of the Hebrew language, he became enthusiastically fond of the Cabala, the "secret" or mystical explanation of the Scriptures, writing several works, and preaching sermons in accordance with his views. He was made a prebendary of St. Paul's and rector of Therfield, Hertfordshire. He wrote a Latin tragedy called "Roxana," (principally based on an Italian tragedy), acted at Cambridge by the students; on which occasion a lady, hearing the words sequar, sequar, pronounced in a terrible manner, was so affected as to lose her senses. He was also the author of a Lexicon Pentaglotten, folio, 1637.

Born at Hadleigh, Suffolk, 1567; died, 1640.

ALABUS, a-lai-bus, a river of Sicily.

ALACRANES ISLANDS, a-lai'-kra'-ness, a cluster in the Gulf of Mexico, on one of which, called Perez, the steamer Troeed was wrecked in March, 1847. They extend about 14 miles from north to south, and 11 from east to west. Lat. 22° 23′ 1″ N. Lon. 89° 42′ W.

ALÆA, a-lē'-a, a surname of Minerva in Peloponnesus. Her festivals are also called Alæa.

ALÆI, a-lē'-i, a number of islands in the Persian Gulf, abounding in tortoises.

ALAGHEZ, a mountain range of Armenia, connected with the Caucasus. It is volcanic in character, and its highest peak has an altitude of 13,628 feet.

ALAGOA, a-la'-go-a, a district and town on the south shore of the island called St. Michael, one of the Azores. Pop. of district, about 8,000.

ALAGOAS, a-la'-go-as, a province of Brazil, which up to 1840 formed a part of Pernambuco. It is bounded on the north and west by Pernambuco, and on the south the river San Francisco divides it from the province of Sergipe. The name of the province is derived from the lakes, lagoas, which are very numerous.

Extent.—From E. to W. about 150 miles, having a probable average width of about 60.

Description.—Mountainous and well wooded over two-thirds of its surface. About 10 miles inland from the seacoast, the country is covered with a deep alluvium, deposited, from time to time, by the numerous small streams which descend from the eastern mountain region. Here swamps and lagunes prevail.

Produce.—Tobacco, which is the staple, cotton, sugar, rice, maize, plantains, beans; in roots, yams and sweet potatoes; in fruits, pine-apples, oranges, cocoa-nuts. The mamona-tree is cultivated for its oil, and the timber trees of Algoas are the best in Brazil. Some of these are very durable; but from the quantity of tanin they possess, they affect iron to such a degree as to render bolts of it useless in a few years. Other trees produce mastic, caoutchouc, copaiba, dragon's blood, and ipecacuanha. Others, amongst which is the Brazil-wood, are used for dyes: and an inferior kind of Jesuit's bark, or quinine, is readily obtained.

Wild Animals.—The ounce, the deer, and monkeys of all kinds. The tapir and the peccary are found, and armadilloes and ant-eaters are plentiful. Land tortoises abound, and alligators infest the rivers and lakes.

Birds.—Parrots of every description, with the most beautifully plumed humming-birds. Of insects, bees are the most abundant, and of reptiles, there are several kinds of snakes that are poisonous. Domestic Animals. With the exception of the ass and the mule, which are numerous, there are few of the other sorts of European domestic animals.

Pop. 397,379, of whom more than 33,000 are slaves.

Lat. between 9° and 10° S. Lon. between 36° and 38° 30′ W.

ALAGOAS, the capital of the above province, stands on the western margin of the Lake of Manguaba. It is situate in a fertile district, abounding in orange and jack trees, and producing large quantities of sugar and tobacco. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 9° 40′ S. Lon. 35° 50′ W.

ALAGON, a'-la-gon, a town of Spain, 15 miles N.W. of Saragossa. Pop. 2,000.

ALAGON, a river of Spanish Estremadura which falls into the Tagus near Coria.

ALAGORE, a'-la-gor, a town of Hindostan, in the Mysore, 23 miles E. of Seringapatam.

ALAIN, JOHN, a'-lain, a Danish author, who wrote "On the Origin of the Cimbri," and other subjects.

Born 1569; died 1630.

ALAIN DE LILLE, a'-lain de-leel', surnamed the Universal Doctor, and a divine of great reputation in the university of Paris.

Born 1114; died about 1203.

ALAIN, CHARTIER, a French writer, who produced several pieces, the most esteemed of which is his "Chronicle of Charles VII." to whom he was secretary. Flourished at the beginning of the 14th century.

ALAIS, á-lai, a town of France in the arrondissement of Alais, department of Gard, built in a plain at the foot of the Cevennes mountains. Silk, serges, thread, gloves, and ribands are manufactured. There are also glass, pottery, and chemical works, and a considerable trade is carried on in wine, corn, and cattle. There are large coal and iron mines in the neighbourhood, and blast-furnaces and iron-foundries are numerous. There is a new Cathedral. In former times Alais was a stronghold of the Protestants, from whom it was taken by Louis XIII. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 44° 7′ 26″ N. Lon. 4° 4′ 44″ E.

ALAJUELA, á-la-ju-aï-la, a city of Costa Rica, Central America, situate to the N.W. of Cartago. A place of considerable trade. Pop. with environs, 12,500.

ALAKANANDA, á-la-ka-nan'-da, a river of Hindostan, considered sacred by the Hindoos. It rises in the Himalaya mountains, flows through the province of Gurwal, and at Devaprayuga ("the meeting of the gods") unites with the Bhagirathi, when it receives the name of the GANGES.

ALALIA, ă-lai'-le-a, a town of Corsica, built by a colony of Phoceans. L. C. Scipio destroyed it in the first Punic war, B.C. 562.

ALAMANES, ă-la-maï'-nes, a statuary of Athens, and disciple of Phidias.

ALAMANNI, LUIGI, a-la-man'-e, a Florentine, who, conspiring against Julius de Medici, was compelled to quit his native country, until Charles V. captured Rome, when he returned and was employed in public affairs, till the re-establishment of the Medici family obliged him to leave Florence again. He finally settled in France, and became a favourite of Francis I., who in 1544 sent him ambassador to the Imperial court. Alamanni was of a noble family, and wrote many beautiful poems in the Italian language.

Born at Florence, 1495; died at Amboise, 1556.

ALAMAS, DE LOS, á-la-mas, a Mexican town in the state of Sinalao. Pop. about 10,000, mostly engaged in mining operations.

ALAMOS, BALTHAZAR, á-la-mos, educated at Salamanca. He entered into the service of Anthony Perez, secretary of state to Philip II., and when that minister fell into disgrace, Alamos was cast into prison, where he lay eleven years. On the accession of Philip III. he obtained his liberty, and was employed by the duke of Olivarez in several important situations. He translated Tacitus into Spanish, and left other works.

Born at Medina del Campo, 1550: died 1634.

ALAN, or CAMEL, ăl'-an, a river of Cornwall, England, which rises a few miles north of Camelford, and joining the Bristol Channel near Bodmin, forms the estuary of the harbour of Padstow.

ALAN of Tewkesbury, author of the "Life and Banishment of Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury."

Died 1291.

ALAN, ALLEN, or ALLEYN, WILLIAM, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1550 became one of its fellows. In 1556 he was chosen principal of St. Mary's Hall, and two years afterwards was made canon of York; but on the accession of Elizabeth he went to Louvain, and was appointed head of the English college. Here he wrote, in defence of the Romish church, some treatises, which raised his reputation as a controversialist to such a degree, that he obtained several valuable preferments. In his own country, however, he was considered a traitor, and a man was hanged for bringing over from the continent some of his books. In 1586 he published a defence of the Pope's bull for excommunicating Queen Elizabeth to which he added an exhortation to her subjects to revolt against her in favour of the Spaniards, maintaining that the heresy of a sovereign absolved subjects from the allegiance. In 1587 he was made a cardinal, and in 1589 archbishop of Mechlin. He founded the college for English Catholics at Douay.

Born at Rossall, in Lancashire, in 1532; died at Rome in 1594.

ALAN of Lynn, so called from the place of his nativity. He became famous for his theological writings. Lived in the 15th century.

ALAND, SIR JOHN FORTESCUE, ăl'-ănd, an English judge, who took the name of Aland, in compliment to his lady, who was the eldest daughter of Henry Aland, esq., of Waterford, in Ireland. He was educated at Oxford, whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar about 1690. In 1714 he was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to the king. In 1717 he was created a baron of the Exchequer, and, next year, one of the justices of the court of King's Bench. On the accession of George II. he was removed from that office, but for what cause does not appear. In 1728 he was made one of the justices of the Common Pleas, which situation he resigned in 1746, and was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of Baron Fortescue of Credon. Baron Fortescue belonged to the ancient family of Fortescue, in Devonshire, and was an able lawyer, an impartial judge, and versed in the Northern and Saxon literature. He published, in 1714, 8vo. his ancestor Sir John Fortescue's treatise on "Absolute and Limited Monarchy."

Born in Devonshire, 1670; died 1746.

ALAND, á-land, the principal island, which gives the name to a group in the Baltic, not far from the point of meeting of the gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, and lying between the coast of Finland and Upland, in Sweden. The Finnish name of the island is Ahvenanmaa. Of the group there are about eighty inhabited, although the population on the whole is exceedingly sparse,—not more than 16,000. They were ceded, in 1809, by Sweden to Russia, and have become the usual station of the Russian fleet in the Baltic. The chief island is a place of considerable importance, its length being about 18 miles from north to south, and 14 from east to west. It is mountainous, with a deeply indented coast-line with several excellent harbours, one of which—that of Ytternais—is large enough to give shelter to the whole of the Russian fleet. The island has a vast citadel, with fortifications capable of protecting 60,000 men. The productions are barley, rye, potatoes, hops, and flax. A number of cattle are pastured, and many of the inhabitants are employed in fishing. The population of the island is 11,000. Lat. 60° 15′ N. Lon. 20° E. The neighbourhood of Aland is remarkable as being the scene of the first great naval action in the annals of the Russian marine. It was fought between the Swedes and Peter I., who obtained a complete victory, in 1717. On August 10, 1854, Bomarsund, on the W. side of the principal island, was captured and its fortifications destroyed by the British fleet. Steamers plying between Abo, in Finland, and Stockholm take in wood at these islands.

ALANSI, a town of Ecuador, situated 7,980 feet above the sea level, on a small river of the same name. Cloth and woollens are manufactured. Lat. 2° 13′ 22″ S. Lon. 79° 15″ W.

ALARA, a-la-ra, a town in the island of Majorca, 12 miles from Palma, in the vicinity of which there are some excellent marble-quarries. Pop. upwards of 4,000.

ALARCON, JUAN RUIZ DE, a-lar'-kon, a Spanish theatrical writer of the reign of Philip IV. Some of his productions are so excellent as to have been attributed to Lope de Vega and Montalvan. His drama of "La Verdad sospechosa" (suspicious truth) was imitated by Corneille in his "Le Menteur," which, in fact, is founded upon it. None of the Spanish dramatists, taken as a whole, merit a higher place in the drama than Alarcon, who is said to have written thirty plays. His success aroused the jealousy of other dramatists, who unmercifully caricatured him (he was lame), and endeavoured to suppress his work.

Born at Tasco, Mexico; died in Spain, 1639.

ALARD, a'-lar, a Romish divine, who wrote a great number of theological pieces now little known or regarded.

Born at Amsterdam; died at Louvain, 1541.

ALARD, LAMBERT, the inspector of the public schools in Brunswick, a theological writer and the compiler of a Greek Lexicon.

Died 1672.

ALARIC I., ăl'-e-rik, king of the Visigoths, was descended from an illustrious family, and served under Theodosius in the wars between the Goths and Romans. He afterwards served in the imperial army, but being refused a chief command, he revolted, and entering Greece, devastated several of its provinces with fire and sword. Whilst thus engaged, he was encountered by the famous Stilicho, who compelled him to retire into Epirus. About this time, A.D. 400, he was acknowledged king of the Visigoths, and entered Italy, whence he carried away a large amount of plunder and a great many captives. Two years afterwards, he again entered that country, but was opposed by Stilicho, his former enemy, and after a well-contested battle, lost his wife and children, who were taken prisoners. He then entered into a treaty, and retired across the Po. He now submitted to the emperor Honorius, who was then reigning, and into whose service he entered, and, for three years seems to have served that prince in Epirus. For this he demanded an extravagant reward, which being refused, he raised the standard of revolt, and advanced upon Rome, and laying siege to it, the Romans were ultimately compelled to comply with such terms as the conqueror chose to dictate. Having achieved this success, he withdrew into Tuscany; but finding that Honorius failed to fulfil the objects of the treaty into which he had entered, Alaric again attacked the "Eternal city," and compelled its submission. He himself now appointed Attalus, prefect of the city, to be emperor in the room of Honorius; but the imbecility of that personage rendered him unfit for the responsibilities of his station. He was therefore deprived of his regal honours, and Honorius once more enthroned. These measures, however, had hardly been completed, when a treacherous attack made by the Romans upon the soldiers of Alaric roused his indignation against the imperial city, which he gave up for six days to his soldiers. An indiscriminating pillage was the result of this act; but Alaric, to his honour, ordered his troops to spare unnecessary bloodshed, to respect female chastity, and preserve the buildings devoted to the purposes of religion. Having sufficiently satiated his vengeance, he withdrew into the southern provinces of Italy, where he died during the siege of Cosenza, in Calabria. In order that his remains might not be discovered by the Romans, they were deposited in the river Basenti, by slaves, who were then put to death.

Died 410.

ALARIC II., king of the Visigoths, ascended the throne in 484: he was slain in a battle which he fought with Clovis, king of France, near Poitiers, in 507. This monarch was of a much more pacific disposition than the first Alaric. He left behind him a regularly drawn up system of legislation, which is known as the Code Breviarium Alaricianum.

ALASCO, JOHN, a-las'-ko, uncle to Sigismund king of Poland. Having embraced the Protestant religion, after several years spent in various places in Germany and the Netherlands, he came to England in the reign of Edward VI., and became pastor to a Dutch church in London. On the accession of Mary, he returned to his own country, where he distinguished himself so greatly in the cause of the Reformation, that he received the title of Reformer of Poland. He was greatly esteemed by the leading men among the Reformers; particularly by Erasmus, whose library he purchased.

Born 1499; died 1560.

ALA-SHEHR, a town of Turkey in Asia, about 80 miles east of Smyrna. Pop. 18,000. Some beautiful remains of antique architecture are in the town. Under the name of Philadelphia, it was the seat of one of the first Christian churches.

ALASKA, a territory in the United States, formerly belonging to Russia, but purchased by the United States Government in 1867. It occupies the north-western angle of the North American continent, Lon. 141° W., and extending south to Lat. 50° 40′ N., lying between the British territories and the Pacific, and including the ALEUTIAN ISLANDS. The principal town is SITKA. (See AMERICA NORTH.)

Area.—The total area is about 400,000 square miles. The population is supposed to be about 30,000.

Mountains.—The territory is traversed by a portion of the great mountain range of North America, which generally follows the coast line. There are ten active volcanoes. The loftiest summits are—Fairweather (16,000 feet), St. Elias (14,000), Crillon (13,500), Illamna (12,000), Redoubt (12,270).

Rivers.—The principal river is the Yakon, which has a total length, including windings, of nearly 2,000 miles: at the mouth it is five miles wide. The other rivers are small and not navigable.

ALASSAC, a'-las'-ak, a town of France, department of the Corrèze. Pop. 3,160.

ALASSIO, a-las'-se-o, a seaport town of Italy, in the province of Genoa, on the Mediterranean, in the province of Albenga. It is in the division of Genoa, and is 4 miles from Albenga. Pop. about 2,200.

ALASSONA, a-lăs-o'-na, a town of European Turkey, 35 miles from Tricala. Pop. 3,000.

ALASTOR, a-lăs'-tor, an armbearer to Sarpedon, king of Lycia, killed by Ulysses.

ALA-TAGH, a-la-taw, a mountain-chain of Asiatic Turkey, dividing the two heads of the Euphrates as it runs westward from Mount Ararat. Lat. between 39° and 40° N. Lon. between 39° and 44° E.

ALATAMAHA, ăl'-ta-ma-haw', a river of Georgia, United States, which, after a course of 500 miles, falls into the Atlantic, 60 miles from Savannah.

ALATRI, a-lä'-tre, an Italian town built on a mountain, 6 miles from Frosinone. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 11,400.

ALATYR, ala'-tir, a Russian town in the government of Simbirsk, from which town it is distant about 80 miles. Manf. Glass and leather. Pop. 5,000.

ALAVA, a-lä'-va, one of the three Basque provinces of Spain, mountainous and rich in iron-mines. The chief town in VITTORIA. Area, 1,082 square miles. Pop. 96,000. Lat. between 42° 20' and 43° N.

ALAVA, DIEGO ESQUIESKI, a-lä'-va, a bishop of Cordova, in Spain, who was at the Council of Trent, and wrote a book on "General Councils."
Died 1562.

ALAVA, MIGUEL RICARDO D', Spanish general and statesmen. Originally in the Navy. At first supported Joseph Buonaparte, but afterwards joined the English army as aide-de-camp to the Duke of Wellington. Appointed ambassador to the Netherlands, by the restored King Ferdinand VII., president of the Cortes, 1822. Subsequently resided in England, until the outbreak of the Carlist war, when he supported the Queen against the Carlists. Ambassador in London, 1834; in Paris, 1835.
Born at Vitoria, 1771; died at Bareges, 1843.

ALAYA, a-la-ya, a town of Asiatic Turkey, standing on a promontory in the Mediterranean, 100 miles from Konieh. It has fallen into comparative decay. It occupies the site of the ancient Coracesium. Pop. 2,000.

ALAZON, a-la-zon, a river of Georgia, uniting with the Kur, 125 miles from Tiflis. Its course is in a south-easterly direction for 140 miles.

ALBA, a town of Italy, in the province of Cuneo, on the right bank of the river Tanaro. Pop. about 10,000.—Alba was the Alba Pompeii of the Romans, and figures in the Middle Ages as one of the principal towns of the marquisate of Montferrat. In 1631 it was annexed to the dominions of the house of Savoy. The town is the seat of a bishopric, and there is a cathedral. A large trade is carried on in cattle, silk, wine, oil, grain, and marble.

ALBA, DUKE OF. (See ALVA.)

ALBA DE TORMES, al'-ba dai tor-mes, a town of Spain, on the Tormes, 14 miles from Salamanaca. Pop. 2,300. Here, on the 26th November, 1809, the French, under Kellermann, defeated the Spaniards commanded by the Duque del Parque.

ALBA LONGA, al-ba-lon'-ga, a city of Latium, built by Ascanius, B.C. 1152, on the spot where Æneas found, according to the prophesy of Hellenus and of the god of the river, a white sow with thirty young ones. Fourteen descendants of Æneas reigned, down to Numitor and Amulius. Alba was destroyed by the Romans 695 B.C., and the inhabitants were carried to Rome. A city of the Marsi, in Italy.

ALBACETE, a province of Spain, formed in 1833, out of districts taken from Murcia and New Castile. It is bounded on the N. by Cuença, on the E. by Valencia and Alicant, on the S. by Murcia, and on the W. by Jaen and Ciudad Real. There are some hilly districts rising to a height of about 5,000 feet. In the plains and valleys the soil is generally rich, and grain and fruit are grown in abundance. The district is rich in minerals, and there are numerous mineral springs, chiefly sulphureous. The principal rivers are Mundo, in the south, and Jucar, in the north. The horses, mules, and cattle are of excellent quality. The province is traversed by the Madrid and Valencia railway. The chief towns are ALBACETE, Alcarez, Bonillo, and Chinchilla. Area, 5,971 square miles. Manf. Coarse cloths, earthenware, and cutlery. Pop. 221,500.

ALBACETE, a trading town of Spain, chief town of the province of the same name, 80 miles from Valencia. Pop. 15,200. Manf. Principally cutlery.

ALBAN, ST., the proto-martyr of Britain, who served in the Roman army, and became a convert to Christianity, through one Amphilabus, a monk.
Born at St. Albans, in the 3rd century; died for his religion, at the same place, in the persecution under Diocleisian, 303.

ALBAN, ST., sänt al'-bawng, the name of several towns in France.—1. In the department Côtes-du-Nord. Pop. 1,400.—2. In the department Isére. Pop. 1,200.—3. In the department Lozère. Pop. 2,300.—4. In the department Tarn. Pop. 700.

Died at Paris, 1800.

ALBANI, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, whose first master was Denys Calvert, who left him to the instruction of his pupil Guido, whom he accompanied to the school of the Caracci. Having finished his studies at Bologna, Albani went to Rome, where his first wife died. He married again, and his second wife was very beautiful. This lady became the mother of several fine boys, and Albani painted pieces in which his wife and children served as models for his Venuses and Cupids. He was fond of representing the fair sex, and his compositions on love-subjects are held in high esteem.
Born at Bologna, 1578; died there, 1660.

ALBANI, GIOVANNI BAPTISTO, painter. Brother of the preceding. Chiefly known by historical and landscape subjects.
Died 1668.

ALBANI, GIOVANNI GIROLAMO, a civilian and cardinal, who wrote some books in vindication of the papal power.
Born at Bergamo, 1504; died 1591.

ALBANI, ALEXANDER, an Italian, created a cardinal by Innocent XIII. This personage was a great virtuoso, and possessed a collection of drawings and engravings, which, at his death, was purchased by George III. for 14,000 crowns.
Born at Urbino, 1692; died 1779.

ALBANI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, also a cardinal, and nephew of the above, distinguished as a patron of the fine arts. Although he endeavoured to prevent the suppression of the Jesuits, he was in other respects liberal and enlightened. His palace was plundered by the French invading army of 1798, when he made his escape to Naples, stripped of all his possessions. In 1800 he returned to Rome, where he took up his abode in private lodgings.
Born at Rome, 1720; died 1809.

ALBANIA, äl-bai'-ne-a or al'-ba'-ne-a, a country of Asia, between the Caspian Sea and Iberia. All the inhabitants are said to have blue eyes. Some maintain that they followed Hercules from Mount Albanus, in Italy, when he returned from the conquest of Geryon.—The Caspian Sea is called Albanum Mare, as being near Albania.

ALBANIA, a large province in the south-west of European Turkey, which stretches along that part of the Mediterranean called the Ionian Sea, and comprehends, in its widest acceptation, the ancient Illyria and Epirus, and parts of Macedonia and Chaonia, and includes the recently formed eyalets (or modern divisions of Turkey) of Uskub, Roumelia, and Yania. The limits of this country are not very exactly defined, but, to serve general purposes, it may be said to be bounded on the N. by Servia, Bosnia, and Montenegro; on the E. by Roumelia; on the S. by Greece; and on the W. by the Mediterranean Sea, along the coast of which it extends for upwards of 200 miles.

Area.—Estimated at about 18,944 square miles.

Description.—Extremely mountainous, cut up into deep ravines, and presenting all the characteristics of sublimity, in a scenic point of view. The mountains of the Khimára,—the former Acroceraunian,—running in a north-western direction parallel to the coast, attain an elevation of 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, as also does the southward chain of the Tzumerka.

Rivers.—Although there are many streams in Albania, they are neither so large nor important as to require particular notice. They take their rise mostly in the eastern parts of the country, and after a winding and tortuous course, fall in the Mediterranean or Adriatic Sea. The Drin, or Drind, flowing into the Adriatic, is the largest; other rivers are the Boyana, Beratino, Voyussa, Kalamas and Arta.

Lakes.—The largest is the lake of Scutari; lake Schrida, a very beautiful lake, 2147 feet above the sea level, is 20 miles long and 8 broad; Joannina and Butrintz are other lakes.

Climate.—Variable, but healthy on the whole. Spring cannot be said to commence before the middle of March; but the heat of the months July and August is excessive. September is the vintage season, and the December rains are succeeded by sharp frosts in January. Wild Animals.—The wolf, the bear, and the jackal. The lakes swarm with water-fowl of almost every description. Domestic Animals.—Horses, asses, oxen, sheep, and goats. The horses are small, but active and spirited. There is a breed of dogs not unlike the English shepherd dog, although larger and sharper in the head, with a bushy tail. Produce.—Barley, maize, oats, cotton, and tobacco. In fruits, the grape, orange, lemon, fig, pomegranate, and mulberry are grown.

Inhabitants.—The Albanians, or Arnauts, are supposed to have sprung from the Illyrians. They are an active muscular race, seldom exceeding five feet six inches in height, and capable of undergoing great fatigue. Their attachment to their mountains is great, and, as they all carry arms, it is difficult to distinguish the peasant from the soldier. They are mostly robbers, a profession, amongst themselves, not considered disgraceful. Their women are tall and strong; but as they are kept in great subjection, and viewed in the light of cattle, they are made to labour as such, and often unmercifully used. In religion about half the people are Mahometans, the remainder belong to the Greek Church, and there are many Roman Catholics. Pop. 1,200,000.

Manufactures.—Capotes, embroidered velvets, cloths, and stuffs. The wild character of their country, and the imperfect state of their civilization, however, render them foes to the arts of peace generally. Their trade principally consists of exchanging the natural productions of their own for the manufactured goods of other countries.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The province is divided into the pachalics of Janina, Ilbessan, and Scutari, and the sandjaks (or the subordinate divisions), of Delvino and Avlona. The chief towns are the ports of Durazzo, Avlona, Prevesa and Pargo; Scutari, Berat, Argyro Casho and Arta; and Akhrida and Joannina in the eastern mountain districts.

Lat. between 38° and 43° N. Lon. from 18° 40′ to 21° 50′ E.

History.—The Albanians maintained a struggle under their chief, George Castriot, or Scanderbeg 1443
Submitted to the Turks after the seige of Scutari . 1478
Ali Pacha, of Janina, defeated the Turkish Pacha, and governed independently; captured and murdered 1822

ALBANO, a town of Italy, about 15 miles to the south-east of Rome. It is the seat of a bishopric. There are many beautiful villas in the neighbourhood, and extensive vineyards. Pompey, Clodius, Tiberius, Domitian, and other ancient Roman magnates had splendid villas here, and at a short distance from the town, on the Appian Way, are considerable remains of a large amphitheatre, and a sepulchre. On the summit of the adjacent mountain, Monte Carvi, 3,000 feet high (the ancient Mons Albanus), stood the famous temple of Jupiter, built by one of the Tarquins, where the solemn assemblies of the forty-seven cities of the Latin confederates were held. This hill is several times referred to in the Æneid of Virgil. Pop. about 6,400. Near the town is the remarkable Alban Lake, or Lago di Castello, six miles in circumference, 1,000 feet deep, and 918 feet above the sea level. It occupies the basin of an extinct volcano. In the year 390 B.C. the Romans constructed a tunnel, nine miles and a half long, through the solid lava and rock, to let off the surplus water.

ALBANO, a well-built town of Italy, 11 miles from Potenza. Pop. nearly 3,000.

ALBAN'S, ST., saint al'-bănz, a city and municipal borough in Hertfordshire, 21 miles from London, on a hill, and separated from the site of the old Roman city of Verulam by the Ver, a small stream flowing into the Colne. The town has railway communication with London by the London and North-Western, the Great Northern and Midland lines. Straw-plaiting, especially the manufacture of Brazilian hats, is the staple trade of the town, but there are also a silk mill, breweries, malt-houses, an iron foundry, and rope works, and there are many corn-mills in the vicinity. A straw-plait market and a corn market are held every Saturday. There are four parishes: St. Peter's, St. Alban's, St. Stephen's, and St. Michael's, out of the last of which an ecclesiastical district has been assigned for Christ Church, a new edifice in the Italian style. In St. Michael's Church, an old and interesting building, is the monument of Lord Bacon, who was buried there. He bore the titles of Baron Verulam and Viscount St. Alban's. The church was restored in 1867. St. Alban's Abbey Church is one of the most venerable ecclesiastical edifices in the kingdom. It is built in the form of a cross, running 548 feet from east to west, and having a breadth of 206 feet at the intersection of the transept. Its tower has an elevation of 144 feet, crowned with battlements, and is amongst the most perfect parts of the building. Every style of architecture, from the time of the Normans to that of Henry VII., may be traced in it; and although it is constructed mostly of bricks, flints, and tiles, its appearance is, in the highest degree, imposing; whilst the antique air which it preserves imparts to it a venerable aspect in the eyes of those lovers of antiquity who delight in architectural structures. The shrine of St. Alban, recently discovered and re-erected in the Saint's chapel, the altar and rood screens, and the tomb of Humphrey duke of Gloucester, are very beautiful and interesting. A complete restoration of the building is in progress. The abbot of St. Alban's was mitred, and as a peer of the realm had a seat in Parliament. He took precedence of all other English abbots from the time of Pope Adrian IV., who was Nicholas Breakespere, and the only Englishman who rose to the pontificate. Of the old Benedictine Monastery, founded to commemorate the martyrdom of St. Alban, only the gate-house remained to modern times, and it was used as a prison until the erection, in 1867, of the new jail, a castellated building on the north-east side of the town. A clock tower in the market-place, of great antiquity, and a good specimen of the early perpendicular style of architecture, was restored in 1867, and the basement is now used as a telegraph office. The Corn Exchange was erected in 1859. The town gives a title and a dukedom in the Beauclerc family; and the Earl of Verulam takes his title from the old Roman city, traces of which are still visible. Pop. 10,930.

ALBANY, or ALBANIA, a country of hills, the original Celtic name for Scotland; latterly restricted to the Highland region, parts of Argyleshire, Perthshire, and Inverness-shire. The title of duke of Albany was conferred on the regent of the kingdom at the council held at Scone in 1298. The title was held by Charles I. and James II. Prince Charles Stuart, the young Pretender, in his latter days, sometimes assumed the incognito title of the duke of Albany, which was also borne as a second title of the duke of York, second son of George III.

ALBANY, LOUISA, countess of, al'-ba-ne, laughter of Prince Gustavus-Adolphus, of Stolberg-Gedern, in Germany, and wife of Charles James Edward, the grandson of James II., and known as the Young Pretender. Their marriage took place in 1772, but the countess being much the younger, the match was ill-assorted, and she retired to a convent. Subsequently she went to France, but on the death of her husband in 1788, returned to Italy, and finally settled in Florence. Here she secretly allied herself by marriage to Count Alfieri, the poet, taking the title of Countess of Albany, as the relict of the last of the Stuarts. On the death of Prince Charles Edward, the French Government allowed her a pension of 60,000 livres. She was possessed of a refined mind, loved literature and the arts, and whilst in Florence her house was the resort of the most cultivated and distinguished persons. Alfieri died in her house, and in 1810 she erected to his memory in the church of Santa Croce, a monument executed by Canova.

Born, 1753; died at Florence, 1824.

ALBANY, awl'-ba-ne, a city of the United States, in Albany, a county of the same name, State of New York, on the W. bank of the Hudson, 145 miles N. New York. It is one of the oldest towns in the Union, the legislative capital of New York, and in population, wealth, and commerce, the second city in that State. It is built on a narrow alluvial tract, running along the side of the river, and standing at the head of the sloop-navigation on the Hudson. Among the public buildings are the Capitol, a splendid edifice in the Renaissance style, and a marble city hall with a gilded dome, which when illumined by the rays of the sun, is seen from a great distance, producing a dazzling effect. There are a university, a medical college and museum, and many public schools. Most of the private buildings are built of stone or brick, and from the structure of some of the more antiquated houses, the Dutch origin of the place is at once recognized.

Commerce and Manufactures.—The town is a great emporium for the transit trade; it is connected by canal with lakes Ontario, Erie, and Champlain, and by railway with New York, Buffalo, Boston, and other great towns. A most extensive timber trade is carried on, and there are manufactories of tobacco, sheet-iron, ropes, carriages, hats, soap, and copper-ware. It has both iron-furnaces and type-foundries; saw-mills, malting-houses, and breweries; and it exports large quantities of flour and agricultural produce.

Lat. 42° 39′ N. Lon. 73° 44′ 49″ W.

History.—From a Dutch fort erected in 1612, the present city of Albany has arisen. In 1623 it was founded by the Dutch, and was called Beaver-wyck, then Williamstadt; by which it was known down to 1664, when it came into the possession of the English, who gave it its present name, after James II., to whom, when Duke of York and Albany, the proprietorship of the colony was granted by Charles II.

ALBANY, a river of North America, which falls into James's Bay, Lat. 51° 30′ N.; Lon. 84° 30′ W. Runs N.E. through a chain of small lakes, from the S. end of Winnipeg Lake. There is a large cataract, the Great Fall, in the estuary.

ALBANY, a district of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, bounded on the N. by Caffraria, E. and S. by the Indian Ocean, and W. by the river Zondag. It extends about 70 miles from E. to W., with an average breadth of 25, and an area of 1,792 square miles. The surface of the country is beautifully undulated by hill and dale, here and there studded with huge timber trees, which give it all the appearance of a succession of immense parks. The district is traversed by the Great Fish River, Zondag, Karuka, Bosjesmans, Buffalo, and Kasowka. The settlers are labouring to improve the growth of wool, and have established several woollen manufactories. The principal trade at present consists in ivory, horns, hides, and live stock.—GRAHAM'S TOWN is the chief town, and Salem and Bathurst are places of some importance. Lat. between 33° and 35° N. Lon. 27° E.—The former inhabitants of this district were a tribe of the Ghonagua Hottentots, but they have gradually given place to European settlers, who may now be considered the sole possessors of the country.

ALBANY, one of the districts in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company. Lat. between 49° and 55° N. Lon. between 81° and 93° W.

ALBANY, a seaport town of West Australia, built on the western shore of King George's Sound, has a very fine harbour, named Princess Royal, and is a coaling station of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers, carrying the Australian mails. The town was founded in 1826. The population, including convicts, is small. Lat. 34° 55′ S. Lon. 117° 55′ E.

ALBARRAZIN, al'-bar-ra-thene, a strong town of Spain, in the province of Aragon, on the Guadalaviar. Pop. 1,800. 100 leagues E. of Madrid.

ALBATEGNI, al'-ba-ten'-ye, an Arabian astronomer, who lived in Mesopotamia, and who wrote a book on the knowledge of the stars and the obliquity of the zodiac, which was printed at Nuremberg in 1537, 4to, and at Bologna in 1545. He was the first who substituted sines for chords, and who may be said to have determined the length of the tropical year. His contributions to astronomical science, in relation to the precession of the equinoxes, and the eccentricity of the earth's orbit, was very valuable. He is considered to have had a larger number of methods in spherical trigonometry than the Greeks, and to be the greatest of the Arabian school, which connects Greek science with that of our own times.

Born at Batan, in Mesopotamia, about the middle of the 9th century; died, 929.

ALBAY, al-bai, a town of Luzon, one of the Philippine Islands, situate in a fertile but volcanic district, and the residence of a governor. Pop., town and district, 13,000.

ALBAZIN, al-baï'-zin, a town of Great Tartary, with a strong fortress to defend it against the Chinese and Mogul Tartars. It is on the road from Moscow to Pekin. Lat. 54° N. Lon. 103° 30′ E.

ALBEMARLE, GEORGE MONK, Duke of, ăl'-be-marl, a younger son of Sir Thomas Monk, of Potheridge, near Torrington, Devonshire. He entered the army as a volunteer, and served in the Netherlands under his relation, Sir Richard Grenville. On the breaking out of the war between Charles I. and the Scotch in 1639, he obtained a colonel's commission, and attended his majesty in both his expeditions to Scotland. At the commencement of the rebellion in Ireland, in 1641, he was sent to that country, where his services were so important as to obtain for him the favour of the Lords Justices, who appointed him governor of Dublin. At the time of his return to England, the town of Nantwich was invested by the Parliamentary forces, against whom he was despatched; but he was taken prisoner and confined in the Tower. Here he remained till 1646, when, on the ruin of the royal cause, he was released on condition of accepting a command in the army of the Parliament, to which he consented. He was now despatched to Ireland to subdue the rebels there; but concluding an unsatisfactory peace with them, he drew upon himself the indignation of the Parliament, who passed a vote of censure upon his conduct. Cromwell, however, had discovered the great military talents which he possessed, and, raising him to the rank of a lieutenant-general, conferred upon him the chief command of the army in Scotland. Whilst here, his conduct was such as to excite the suspicion of the Protector, who, not long before his death, wrote him a letter to which he added this postscript:—"There be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart: I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him and send him up to me." In 1653, Monk, as Admiral, defeated the Dutch fleet, commanded by Van Tromp, off the North Foreland. On the death of Cromwell, the position of Monk was one of extreme difficulty; but having a powerful army at his command, he determined to march into England. That he was favourable to the restoration of the Stuart dynasty, the sagacity of the late Protector had already discovered; but as he acted with extreme caution, no one could positively decide as to what were the real objects he had in view. Accordingly, when he arrived in England, he was courted by the republicans, whilst the royalists feared that he would set up for himself. The moderate party, however, pressed him to call a free parliament, to which, being in accordance with his own desires, he acceded. When this assembly met, they voted the restoration of the king, with whom General Monk had carried on a secret correspondence, and who was consequently restored to his throne without violence or bloodshed. Thus was this great event effected by the prudence of one man, who became an object of the highest esteem, both with the people and the king. Wealth and honours were now heaped upon him. He was created duke of Albemarle, with a grant of £7,000 a year, and subsequently was appointed, in conjunction with Prince Rupert, admiral of the fleet, and gained a great victory over the Dutch, in an engagement which lasted three days, off the mouth of the Thames. Whilst the plague ravaged the city of London, he remained among the inhabitants, many of whom regarded his presence at such period as a great consolation. The character of Monk, as represented by Macaulay, is that of a prudent and cautious rather than a bold and far-seeing man; and hence the impenetrable secrecy with which he veiled his policy on the death of the great Cromwell. In private life he was possessed of many virtues; and although it is said he never feared the shot of a cannon, he had a wholesome dread of his wife, who was a vulgar, violent-tempered woman, the daughter of a common blacksmith, and, it is said, of a female barber, and had been bred a milliner. She bore him a son, who was named Christopher, duke of Albemarle, and who, in 1688, died governor of Jamaica. The general was the author of a work on military and political affairs, which was published in 1671, and a collection of his letters was printed in 1715. He was interred in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Potheridge, Devonshire, 1608; died in London, 1670.

ALBEMARLE, a central county of the United States, in Virginia. Area, 700 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hill and dale, and irrigated principally by the head-waters of the Rivanna. Pro. Wheat, rye, Indian corn, oats, potatoes, and tobacco. Vast herds and flocks of cattle, sheep, and swine are raised. Manf. These consist of cotton and leather; there are many flour, grist, and saw mills, and some distilleries. Pop. 15,959 white, and 16,659 coloured. Chief town, Charlottesville.

ALBEMARLE SOUND, an inlet in the United States, on the coast of North Carolina, in the N.E. part of the state. It is 60 miles long from E. to W. and from 4 to 15 wide, may be considered as the estuary of the Roanoke and Chowan rivers, communicates with Pamlico Sound and the ocean by many narrow inlets, and with Chesapeake Bay by a canal cut through Dismal Swamp.

ALBEMARLE, or AUMALE, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, situate on the Bresle, 13 miles from Neufchâtel. Manf. Earthenware, woollens, and serges. Pop. Upwards of 2,000.—In 1592 a combat was here fought with the Spaniards, and Henry IV. wounded.

ALBENDORF, ăl'-ben-dorf, a village of Prussian Silesia, 8 miles from Glatz. Pop. 1,300. In its neighbourhood is the sanctuary of New Jerusalem, said to be annually resorted to by 80,000 pilgrims.

ALBENGA, al-bain'-ga, formerly a province of Sardinia, and at one time included in the Duchy of Genoa, situate on the southern slope of the Apennines, near where they join the maritime Alps. Ext. Thirty miles, with an average breadth of 18, along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. Area, 263 square miles. Desc. Diversified with mountains and valleys; the plain of Albenga is remarkable for its fertility. Pro. Oil, corn, hemp, wine, and fruit. Many of the inhabitants pursue a seafaring life. Pop. about 60,000.

ALBENGA, chief town of the above, is the see of a bishop, and distant 42 miles S. from Genoa. It is situated on a plain about a mile from the sea coast. Pop. 5,000, mostly agricultural.—This is the Albingaunum of the ancients (the baptistery of the church of St. Michael, was originally a Roman temple), and in the Middle Ages was a municipal town under the supremacy of Genoa.

ALBER, ERASMUS (better known by the Latinized form of the name, Alberus), German theologian. A friend and partisan of Luther, under whom he studied theology at Wittenberg, one of the most learned and witty men of his age; but his tendency to satire and his vigorous denunciation of abuses involved him in continual disputes. His fables and hymns are highly esteemed.

Born about 1500; died, at Wittenburg, 1553.

ALBERCHE, al'-ber-chai, a river of Spain, rising in Old Castile, and joining the Tagus, near Talavera de la Reyna.

ALBERGATI CAPACELLI, the Marquis Francis, al'-bair-ga'-te-ca'-pa-chel'-le, an Italian senator, as well as a comic writer, who spent his early youth in every kind of dissipation, and did not apply himself to study before he had attained his thirty-fourth year. At forty, however, he had not only become a powerful dramatist, but such an excellent performer, as to merit the title of the "Garrick of the Italian nobility." His countrymen declare his works to be unrivalled for wit, humour, facetious sallies, and knowledge of the world. A complete edition was published at Venice in 1783, in 12 vols. 8vo.

Born at Bologna, 1730; died 1802.

ALBERGOTTI, FRANCIS, al'-bair-got'-e, an Italian civilian, the disciple of Baldi, and who, after exercising his profession as an advocate at Arezzo, removed to Florence, where he received the honour of nobility. His character for veracity was so great, that he had the title of "teacher of solid truth." Flourished in the 14th century.

ALBERIC, al'-be-rik, a French historian, and canon of Aix, who, not being able to take an active part in the first crusade, wrote its history from the year 1095 to 1120. Lived in the 13th century. His Chronicle was printed at Helmstadt in 1584.

ALBERIC DE ROSATE, dai ro-sa'-te, of Bergamo, a lawyer, who wrote Commentaries on the Decretals. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERONI, GIULIO, al'-bai-ro'-ne, cardinal and statesman. He was of low origin, being the son of a poor vine-dresser. When a boy, he was a chorister in a church at Piacenza, but, having entered into orders, became curate of a village near Parma, where he happened to relieve the wants of the secretary of the duke of Vendôme, who had been robbed. Some time afterwards the duke entered Italy with his army, for which there was no means of providing, as the peasantry had taken the precaution to conceal their corn. He happened to be in the neighbourhood of the village, in which the poor curate, who had formerly relieved the necessities of his secretary, resided. This circumstance being remembered, he was sent for in the present distress of the duke, to whom he revealed the secret places in which the peasantry had concealed their grain. This service was so great, that the duke, on returning to Madrid, took him with him, and procured him the favour of the princess of Urfius, the favourite of Philip V. By her recommendation, he was appointed agent for the duke of Parma at the Spanish court, and greatly advanced the interests of his sovereign, by obtaining Elizabeth Farnese, princess of Parma, for his second wife. For this, Alberoni was made a privy counsellor, then was created prime minister, and finally had a cardinalship conferred on him. Having thus obtained the highest honours, he engaged himself with schemes for the benefit of the Spanish nation. He organized the army, created a naval force, reformed many abuses, and restored Spain to the prestige it had lost. He endeavoured to form alliances with Peter the Great of Russia and Charles XII. of Sweden, to involve Austria in a war with Turkey, to excite an insurrection in Hungary, and to cripple the power of France by encouraging disturbances with that kingdom. His ambition was to revive the splendid empire of Charles V., and for that purpose to weaken other European powers. For five years he was the most powerful man in Spain; but being undermined by foreign influence, he was deprived of his posts and banished. Pope Clement XI. deprived him of his honour as a cardinal, and endeavoured to have him arrested; but his successor, Pope Innocent XIII., restored him to the dignity of cardinal in 1723. In 1740 Alberoni retired to Piacenza, where he passed the remainder of his life.

Born at Firenzuola, in Parma, 1664; died at Piacenza 1752.

ALBERT, al'-bert, Duke of Austria, and subsequently Emperor of Germany, was the son of Rudolph of Hapsburg, who founded the Austrian imperial dynasty. He was crowned in 1298, after defeating and slaying his competitor, Adolphus of Nassau. But the Pope refused to acknowledge him, and summoned him to appear before him to ask pardon and do penance. This he refused to do, and formed an alliance with Philip the Fair of France against the Pope. The Pope, however, persuaded him to break off the alliance, and in return pronounced the deposition of Philip, and gave the kingdom of France to Albert. Philip, however, successfully defended his own. Albert then engaged in war with Holland, Hungary, Bohemia, and other states. He was assassinated by his nephew John, son of the duke of Suabia, whose paternal estates he had seized.—On the bank of the Reuss, where Albert was murdered, Agnes, his eldest daughter, and queen of Hungary, built a monastery, and called it Königsfelden. Here, after taking a dreadful vengeance, not only on the assassins of her father, but on at least a thousand persons whom she supposed to be implicated in their crime, she shut herself up and ended her days. Her apartments are still shown in the dilapidated building, which stands on the high road from Basle to Baden and Zurich, and in the vicinity of the fortress of Hapsburg, whence originally sprung the house of Austria.

Born 1248; murdered 1308.

ALBERT, Archduke of Austria, was the third son of the emperor Maximilian II. He adopted the ecclesiastical profession, and obtained a cardinalship and the archbishopric of Toledo. In 1594 he was made viceroy of Portugal, in which capacity his conduct was so satisfactory to his uncle, Philip II., king of Spain, that he sent him into the Low Countries to endeavour to quell the insurrection which had risen in the seven United Provinces. In this, however, he had little success. In 1598 he renounced the ecclesiastical character, and married the daughter of Philip. In 1600 he encountered Prince Maurice of Nassau at Nieuport, and was defeated. This battle decided the independence of Holland. Albert afterwards directed his energies against Ostend, to which he laid siege, and after the loss of 100,000 men on both sides, the place fell before his arms. A twelve years' truce was now concluded with the Dutch, and, before the termination of that period, Albert expired.

Born 1559; died 1621.

ALBERT, Prince of Mecklenburg, was elected king of Sweden in 1364 by those nobles who had become dissatisfied with the reign of Magnus II., and by whom that monarch was deposed. The result of this measure was a war between the partisans of Albert and Magnus, which lasted several years, and which was finally closed in 1371, by Magnus making a formal resignation of the crown to Albert. The new monarch, however, was less fortunate in pleasing his nobles than the former king. Accordingly, those disaffected chiefs offered the crown to Margaret, queen of Denmark and Norway, who marched into the country, and after a fierce battle at Talkoping, in 1388, took Albert prisoner. Albert was kept in confinement till 1394, when he recovered his liberty on condition of ceding Stockholm to Margaret. He attempted again to recover his crown, but failing, spent the remainder of his life in Mecklenburg.

Died 1412.

ALBERT, first Margrave of Brandenburg, duke of Saxony. His margravedom was afterwards raised to be an electorate. He suppressed with great rigour a revolt of the Wends, almost depopulating the country, in 1157; but afterwards made a pilgrimage to Palestine, and on his return endeavoured to introduce Christianity among them. He is known in history as Albert the Bear, from his armorial bearings, and was one of the most energetic princes of his age.

Born 1106; died at Ballenstadt, 1170.

ALBERT, Margrave of Brandenburg, the first duke of Prussia, was son of the margrave of Anspach and Baireuth. He was at first intended for the Church, but preferring a military career, accompanied the emperor Maximilian I. in his expedition against Venice. When scarcely twenty-one years of age, he was elected grand-master of the Teutonic order in 1511, and entered into a war with Sigismund, king of Poland, in defence of the independence of that order. A peace was concluded at Cracow in 1525, by which it was stipulated that the grand-master should possess Prussia as a fief of Poland. Before this he had avowed himself a Protestant, and shortly afterwards he married a princess of Denmark. In consequence of this act he fell under the ban of the empire, and the latter years of his life were embittered by political and theological disputes.

Born 1490; died 1568.

ALBERT, Margrave of Brandenburg, called the Alcibiades of Germany, was the son of Casimir margrave of Culenbach, who, dying when he was an infant, left him in the care of his uncle. In 1541 he took possession of his hereditary estates, and in the disturbances of Germany during the reign of Charles V., entered into the confederacy formed by Maurice, elector of Saxony, and other princes, against that monarch. He committed many excesses in this war, burning towns, and levying heavy contributions wherever he marched. Subsequently a league was formed against him, at the head of which was his old ally the elector of Saxony. Between these princes a great battle was fought at Siverhus, in 1553, in which Maurice was slain and Albert wounded. He was afterwards put under the ban of the empire, and deprived of his possessions.

Born 1522; died 1558.

ALBERT, known as Albertus Magnus, Count of Bollstadt, and Bishop of Ratisbon, was a distinguished scholar and natural philosopher. He studied at Padua, and became a monk of the Dominican order, of which he afterwards was provincial. He devoted the last years of his life to the study of optics, geometry, astronomy, astrology, music, and other sciences. He was the most learned man of his age, and of course considered a magician.

Born at Lauingen, Suabia, 1205; died at Cologne, 1280.

ALBERT, CHARLES D', sharl dal'-bair, duke of Luynes, a favourite of Henry IV. and Louis XIII. He rose to the highest honours, caused the fall of the Marshal d'Ancre, and ruled the kingdom as he pleased; so that even his master was jealous and afraid of his power. He fomented the war with the Huguenots, and in 1621 laid siege to Montauban, where he was seized with a fever, of which he died.

Born 1578.

ALBERT, JOSEPH D', of Luynes, prince of Grimberghen, and ambassador from the emperor Charles VII. of Germany to the French court. He was the author of—1. "Timandre instruit par son Génie." 2. "Le Songe d'Alcibiade," 1759, 8vo.

Born 1671; died 1758.

ALBERT, KRANTZ, a German professor of divinity. He wrote the "History of Saxony, and of the Vandals;" a Chronicle from the time of Charlemagne to 1504, &c.

Born at Hamburg; died 1517.

ALBERT, of Stade, a Benedictine monk, who wrote a Chronicle from the creation to 1256. Lived in the 13th century.

ALBERT, of Strasburg, who compiled a Chronicle from 1270 to 1378. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERT DURER. (See DURER.)

ALBERT, PRINCE, Albert Francis Augustus Charles Emmanuel, prince of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and consort of Queen Victoria, the second son of the late duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. He received the rudiments of his education under the consistorial councillor Florschutz, and completed it at the University of Bonn, where he studied, in addition to literature and philosophy, natural history, chemistry, and the fine arts. For music he had an especial taste, and some of his compositions display great ability. A few days previous to his marriage with the queen, on the 10th of February, 1840, he was naturalized by an act of Parliament, and by another act, passed on the 4th of August of the same year, it was provided that he should assume the responsibility of regent should the queen die before the next lineal heir to the throne should have attained the age of eighteen. The title of Consort was conferred on him in 1842; and in 1857 the title of Prince Consort made him a prince of the United Kingdom, and gave him the precedence to which his exalted station entitled him. He was a member of the Privy Council, Field-Marshal, Colonel of the Grenadier Guards, Governor and Constable of Windsor Castle, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and held several other high offices. Besides assisting in many other noble undertakings, he took an active part in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and contributed not a little to its success. The tendencies of the Prince Consort's mind were entirely of a pacific character, and all his pursuits aimed at exalting and refining the sentiments, whilst ameliorating the condition, of the people. He was handsome in person, and irreproachable in private character and in every relation of domestic life. The intense affection he inspired in the queen, and how deeply she mourned him, are shown in the biography partly written by herself, and in the magnificent tributes she has paid to his memory. Tennyson speaks of him as worthy to rank with the King Arthur of the "Idylls of the King." The Albert Memorial in Hyde Park, and the splendid mausoleum at Windsor, will assist to perpetuate his memory. He died after a short illness caused by taking cold, and his death was profoundly mourned throughout the United Kingdom.

Born at Saxe-Coburg, 1819; died at Windsor, 1861.

ALBERT EDWARD, Prince of Wales, and heir to the British throne, merits a place in this work on account of the high responsibilities which he is, in all probability, destined to fulfil as sovereign of the British empire. The Prince has travelled much, and his agreeable manners make him a great favourite. A very severe attack of illness, in the winter of 1871, excited great sympathy, and his recovery was celebrated by a State visit to St. Paul's Cathedral, to return thanks.

Subsequently to his recovery, engaged in untiring efforts to promote public advancement and the spread of intelligence, concerning which the exhibitions at South Kensington will ever redound to his high reputation, while his judicious abstention from party politics is well worthy of remembrance as an example for princes.

Born 1841.

ALBERT, ALEXANDER MARTIN, known as Albert Ouvrier (or workman), originally a button maker, then a journalist, and a member of the Provisional Government of France after the revolution of February, 1848, and was elected representative in the National Assembly of the Department of the Seine. For taking part in the rising against the government, in the following May, he was sentenced to transportation, and was not set at liberty until the amnesty of 1859. He afterwards obtained employment in the gas-works at Paris.

ALBERT, a town of France, department of Somme, 18 miles from Amiens. Manf. Woollen, cotton, leather, and paper. Pop. 4,000.

ALBERT, a division of Cape Colony, South Africa, annexed in 1848. It has the Orange river on the N., the Oorlog on the W., and the Storm-berg mountains on the S. and E. The population is about 10,000. The climate is healthy, but very cold in winter. The chief town is Burghers-dorf, about 20 miles south of the Orange river.

ALBERT LAKE, in Russell county, South Australia, and united to Victoria Lake by a strait at its northern extremity.

ALBERT NYANZA, Lake. (See AFRICA.)

ALBERT TOWN, a shipping port of South Australia, forming a suburb of Adelaide.

ALBERTET, al'-bair-tai, a poet and mathematician of Provence, who flourished in the 13th century.

ALBERTI, CHERUBINO, al-bair'-te, an eminent historical painter and engraver of Italy.

Born 1552; died 1615.

ALBERTI, ARISTOTLE, an ingenious Italian mechanic, who, it is said, removed the entire tower of Maria del Tempio at Bologna to a distance of thirty-five paces.—He went to Hungary, where he erected various works, and obtained the title of Chevalier. Lived in the 16th century.

ALBERTI, ANDREW, author of a Latin book on perspective, printed at Nuremberg, 1678, folio.

ALBERTI, JOHANN, a German lawyer, who abridged the Koran, with notes, for which he was knighted. He published in 1556 the New Testament in Syriac, the whole edition of which, with the exception of 500 copies, were sent to the East: he also wrote a Syriac grammar.

Died 1559.

ALBERTI, LEON BATTISTA, an eminent architect, who was employed by Pope Nicholas V., and who was the architect of several excellent works at Florence, Rome, Rimini, and Mantua. He also distinguished himself as a sculptor, poet, painter and philosopher.

Born at Genoa, 1404; died 1472.

ALBERTI, GIOVANNI, a brother of the above, who excelled in perspective and in historical subjects.

Born near Florence, 1558; died 1601.

ALBERTI, DOMINICO, a Venetian musician, who was for some time in London, but who afterwards went to Rome, where he attained great eminence as a singer and a performer. He excelled on the harpsichord, and invented a new style of playing on that instrument. Lived in the 18th century.—In 1737 he set to music Metastasio's "Endimione," and published some other fine pieces of his composition.

ALBERTINELLI, MARIOTTO, al'-ber-te-nel'-e mar-e-ot-o, a pupil of Roselli, an imitator of Fra Bartolomeo, and one of the finest of the early Florentine painters. His chef-d'œuvre is in the Imperial Gallery of Florence, and is known as the Visitation of Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist, to the Virgin. He was a man of singularly dissipated habits, to which he fell a victim at the early age of 45.

Born at Florence, 1475; died 1520.

ALBERTINI, GEORGIO FRANCESCO, Italian theologian, a Dominican monk, who acquired great reputation as a preacher. Appointed by the Pope professor of dogmatic theology in the College of the Propaganda at Rome. Author of many works of great reputation.

Born at Parenzo, 1732; died there 1810.

ALBERTINUS, FRANCIS, ăl-ber-ti'-nus, an Italian Jesuit, who wrote a system of theology, and a book in which he maintained that brutes have their guardian angels.

Died 1619.

ALBERTINUS, MUSSATUS, an Italian, who wrote the history of the emperor Henry VII., and several poetical pieces. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERTRANDY, JOHN CHRISTIAN, ăl'-ber-tran'de, a Polish scholar, historical antiquary and numismatist, who, under the educational care of the Jesuits, rose to be bishop of Zenopolis. He subsequently became keeper of the medals and librarian to King Stanislaus, who, on account of his great merit as a numismatist, presented him with the order of St. Stanislaus, the great medal of merit, besides the bishopric of Zenopolis. In the 70th year of his age, he was called upon to preside over the newly-instituted Royal Society of the Friends of Science at Warsaw, of which he continued an active member until his death.

Born at Warsaw, 1731; died 1808.

ALBERTUS, ăl'-ber-tus, an Archbishop of Mentz, who conspired against the emperor Henry V., for which he was imprisoned.

Born at Lorraine; died 1137.

ALBERTUS MAGNUS. (See ALBERT.)

ALBEZI, BARTHOLOMEW, al'-bait'-se, or Bartholomew of Pisa, a Franciscan monk who wrote several books, the most noted of which is that on the conformity of St. Francis with Jesus Christ, in which he makes the saint equal, if not superior, to the Saviour.

Died 1401.

ALBI, or ALBY, al'-be, capital of the department of Tarn, in France. It is situate on a eminence above the river Tarn, and is the see of an archbishop. Manf. Coarse woollen cloths, cotton and hosiery goods, small wares, and candles. It has bullet-foundries and copper and iron works; several oil and paper mills; and in the neighbourhood coal-mines are worked. Anise, and other seeds, in considerable quantities, are grown in the vicinity

Pop. about 17,500. Lat. 43° 55′ 4″ N. Lon. 2° 8′ 39″ E.—During the reign of Louis XIV. this town was one of the strongholds of Protestantism, and, according to some, the sect called the Albigenses derive their name from it. It has a very fine cathedral, called Sainte-Cécile. The church of St. Salvi, having a tower built in the Moorish style, dates from the 13th century; but some portions are older. There are several large industrial establishments at Pont, a suburb on the opposite side of the river, which is crossed by a fine bridge.

ALBI, HENRY, a learned Jesuit, who wrote a history of illustrious cardinals.
Born 1590; died 1659.

ALBICUS, an archbishop of Prague, whose attention to Huss and other reformers has caused many writers to attack him violently. Lived in the 15th century.—He wrote some medical pieces, which were printed at Leipsic in 1484.

ALBIN, ELEAZAR, draughtsman and engraver. Famous for the delineation of insects and other subjects of natural history.
Born in London, towards the end of the 17th century, but exact dates of birth and death unknown.

ALBINEN, al-bē′-nen, a village of Switzerland, in the canton of Vallais, about 5 miles from the Rhone, on its north side. Lat. 46° 23′ N. Lon. 7° 38′ E. This village stands on the brink of a precipice overlooking a valley, whence there is no access to it, but by ladders placed against the face of the perpendicular rock. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants, men, women, and children, ascend and descend often with heavy burdens, without fear, and with comparatively few accidents.

ALBINI, ăl-bī′-ni, two Roman orators of great merit, mentioned by Cicero. This name is common to many tribunes of the people.

ALBINO, al-bē′-no, a town of Italy, in the province of Lombardy. There are extensive spinning mills, lime and tile kilns, and manufactories of agricultural implements. In the neighbourhood is Mount Poretto, on which alabaster of surpassing beauty is found. Pop. 2,500.

ALBINOVANUS CELSUS, ăl′-be-no-vaĭ′-nus sel′-sus, a Latin poet, who was intimate with Ovid. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and heroic poetry; but only two of his pieces are extant, one, an elegy on the death of Drusus, and another on that of Mecænas. Flourished in the early part of the 1st century.

ALBINUS, ăl-bī′-nus, a Roman general, who was made governor of Britain by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the soldiers in Britain. Severus had also been invested with the imperial dignity by his own army; and these two rivals, with about 50,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was victorious, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhone, A.D. 198. Born at Adrumetum, in Africa.—A prætorian, sent to Sylla as ambassador from the senate during the civil wars. He was put to death by Sylla's soldiers.—A Roman plebeian, who received the Vestals into his chariot in preference to his family, when they fled from Rome, which the Gauls had sacked.

ALBINUS, BERNARD, whose real name was Weiss, i.e. White, studied physic at Leyden, where, in 1702, he became professor in that faculty. He wrote several valuable treatises on medicine.
Born at Dessau, 1653; died 1721.

ALBINUS, BERNARD SIEGFRIED, son of the above, became professor of anatomy and surgery at Leyden. His anatomical plates, in 3 vols. folio. 1744, 1749, and 1753 (engraved by Vandelaar), prove him to have been one of the greatest anatomists that ever lived.
Born at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, 1697; died at Leyden, 1770.

ALBINUS, CHRISTIAN BERNARD, younger brother of the above, also a distinguished anatomist, and professor at Utrecht.
Died 1778.

ALBINUS, PETER, professor of poetry and mathematics at Wirtemberg, and secretary to the elector at Dresden. He published the "Chronicles of Misnia" in 1580, and other pieces.

ALBION, ăl′-be-on, son of Neptune by Amphitrite. According to the mythological legends he came into Britain, established a kingdom, and first introduced astrology and the art of building ships. He was killed at the mouth of the Rhone, with stones thrown by Jupiter, because he opposed the passage of Hercules.

ALBION, the largest island of Europe, now called Great Britain. The etymology of the name is very uncertain. The Greek alphon, 'white,' the Phœnician alp, 'high,' or alpin, 'high mountain,' and the Hebrew alben, 'white,' have each been said to furnish its origin, from the height of the chalky cliffs on the coasts of the island. Some, however, have derived it from King Albion. See ALBANY.

ALBION, a name given to several post townships in the United States.

ALBION, NEW. This name was given by Sir Francis Drake to California, with part of the adjoining coast, when he took possession of it. But recent geographers, and among others Humboldt, limit the denomination of New Albion to that part of the coast which extends from Lat. 43° to 48° N. It is now comprehended within the limits of Oregon.

ALBIS, al′-bis, a mountain-range in the canton of Zug, Switzerland, running in a southerly direction nearly parallel with the Lake of Zurich. Hütliberg, attaining a height of 2,792 feet, is its loftiest summit.

ALBITTE, ANTOINE LOUIS, al′-beet, a fierce Jacobin. In 1791 he was elected, with Sers for his colleague, a member of the Legislative Assembly, representing the department of the Lower Seine, whilst following, at the same time, the profession of an advocate at Dieppe. He and Sers obtained the passing of the resolution which decreed destruction to every statue of a sovereign, and placed a representation of Liberty in its stead. He now became a member of the National Convention, and was among those who first voted against allowing Louis XVI. counsel at his trial, and next that he should be put to death. In 1793 he carried the measure for massacring prisoner emigrants in foreign countries, whether found with or without arms. He became commissioner to the armies of the republic, and rose to the military rank of adjutant-general. In this capacity he was present at the siege of Lyons, and afterwards at Toulon, where he became acquainted with Napoleon. Although his career was, as that of a wild beast, tracked with blood, he was still successful, and plunged into the greatest excesses of extravagance. At Bourg, he bathed every morning in the milk which was brought to supply the inhabitants of the town, and in his private hours would amuse himself by guillotining in effigy the king of England and the Pope. Although in great danger, and voted to be arrested by the Convention, after the 20th May, 1795,—amongst the most dreadful days of the revolution,—he was so fortunate as to make his escape, and, subsequently, after the general amnesty of the 26th October, 1795, was appointed by the Directory municipal commissary at Dieppe. When the Directory fell, he became a warm partisan of Napoleon, who made him his sub-inspector of reviews. As such he accompanied the emperor in his invasion of Russia, and during the retreat from Moscow died of cold, hunger, and fatigue. This wretch is said to have preserved his existence for three days on the remains of a flask of brandy, which in his dying moments he shared with one of his companions; and this is the only act of benevolence recounted in his history.

ALBO, JOSEPH, al'-bo, a Spanish rabbi, whose learning was considerable, and who, in 1412, assisted at a conference between the Jews and the Christians held in the presence of Pope Benedict XIII. He wrote a book against the Gospels, and called it "Sepher Hikkarim."

Died 1428.

ALBOIN, king of the Lombards. In 568 he subdued the north of Italy, as far as the Tiber, and fixed his residence at Pavia. He was assassinated by the paramour of his wife, Rosamond, daughter of Cunimond, king of the Gepidæ, whom he had killed in battle, and from whose skull he made Rosamond drink wine at a feast at Verona. This incident forms the subject of tragedies by Rucellai and Alfieri. He was a very popular monarch, and was the hero of national song for many centuries.

ALBOLADREY, al-bo-la'-dre, a town of Andalusia, in Spain, on the banks of the Almeria, and about 20 miles from the town of Almeria. The inhabitants are chiefly occupied with agricultural pursuits, and some of them are employed in the lead-mines of the Sierra de Gador. Pop. 2,100.

ALBON, JACQUES D', djak-dal'-bon, marquis of Fronsac, and marshal of St. Andre; a French nobleman, who in 1547 was made gentleman of the bedchamber by Henry II. In 1550 he was deputed to bear the collar of his order to Henry VIII. of England, by whom he was invested with that of the Garter. On his return, he was appointed to the command of the army in Champagne, where he greatly distinguished himself; but at the battle of St. Quentin was taken prisoner. On the death of Henry II. he was chosen one of the regency. Killed at the battle of Dreux. The Huguenots called Albon "the harquebusier of the West."

ALBONA, al-bo'-na, a town of Austria, in the province of Illyria, 20 miles from Fiume. Its neighbourhood abounds with excellent fruit, especially olives, grapes, and chestnuts. Pop. 1,600.

ALBONI, SIGNORA MARIETTA, al-bo'-ne, a charming and popular contralto singer, who made her début in England, at the Royal Italian Opera, as Arsace, in "Semiramide," in the spring of 1847. In 1853 she married Count Pepoli, an Italian nobleman. Retired from the stage 1863.

Born at Forli, Italy, 1824.

ALBORAN, al'-bor-an, a small island belonging to Spain, off the Mediterranean coast, the resort of smugglers, pirates, and fishing-vessels. It is not more than 2 miles long and 1 broad. Lat. 35° 58' N. Lon. 31° 1' W.

ALBORNOZ, GIL ALVAREZ CARILLO DE, al-bor'-noth, archbishop of Toledo, and afterwards cardinal, to which high office he was appointed by Pope Clement VI., at Avignon, who sent him as legate to Rome, where he secured the restoration of the papal authority in Italy. He was of a very bold spirit, and taking up arms in favour of Pope Urban V., he brought all Italy into subjection, and then retired to Viterbo. Albornoz was a man of chivalrous spirit, and a successful military commander, although an ecclesiastical teacher. He was the instrument of saving the life of his sovereign, Alphonso XI., whilst engaged with the Moors at Tarifa. After he had subdued Italy, Urban sent for him to give an account of the manner in which he had conducted the administration of the country; when he loaded a cart with old locks and keys, and bringing them before the pontiff, said, "Here are the locks and keys of the towns and castles I have taken for you, and put into your possession, and with which I now present you." Urban was satisfied with his conduct, and remained his friend ever afterwards, appointing him legate at Bologna. He founded the grand college at Barcelona. After his death his remains were removed with great state to Toledo, the Spanish king rendering almost royal honour to the corpse, and the Pope granting indulgences to those who assisted at the funeral.

Born at Cuença; died at Viterbo, Italy, 1367.

ALBOSTAN, al-bos'-tan, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 64 miles from Merash. Pop. estimated at 9,000.

ALBOZ, al'-both, a Spanish town of Andalusia, 40 miles from Almeria. Manf. Blankets, coarse linen fabrics, and earthenware. It has several oil and corn mills. Exp. Corn and oil. Imp. Brandy and wine. Pop. 8,000.

ALBRECHTSBERGER, JOHANN GEORG, German musician, one of the most learned composers of his age; organist to the Court of Vienna, and kapellmeister of St. Stephen's Cathedral. Beethoven, Hummel, and Moscheles, were among his pupils. Author of treatises on composition.

Born near Vienna, 1736; died 1809.

ALBRECHT, WILHELM, vil'-helm al'-brecht, a distinguished German agriculturist, who taught the science of rural economy in Fellenberg's school, at Hofwyl. He wrote much on agricultural subjects, and edited a weekly journal which was devoted to the science of rural economy. He also edited "Annals of the Agricultural Society of Nassau," to which society he was perpetual secretary.

Born 1786; died in Franconia, 1848.

ALBRET, JEANNE D', Queen of Navarre, and mother of Henry IV. of France. She was a great supporter of the Reformation. It is supposed she was poisoned at Paris, whither she went to assist at the marriage of her son and Margaret of Valois.

Born 1528; died 1572.

ALBRET, a district in the South of France, included in the arrondissement of Mont-de-Marsan, in the department of the LANDES. The district gave the title of viscount to the Sieurs of Amanjeu, a descendant of whom was Henry, King of Navarre, who, in 1550, assumed the title of Duke d'Albret.

ALBRICUS, al-bri'-kus, a philosopher and physician, who received his education at the University of Oxford. Flourished in the 13th century.—He was the author of various works written in Latin.

ALBUCASA, or ALBUCASIS, al-bu-ka'-sa, an Arabian physician, who composed many excellent works, excelled in surgery, and has described many instruments and operations. Lived in the 11th century.

ALBUERA, al'-boo-air'-a, a village of Spain, in the province of Estremadura, 13 miles from Badajoz. Here the Anglo-Spanish army, under Lord Beresford, defeated the French under Marshal Soult, after a sanguinary conflict, on the 16th May, 1811. In this battle the allies lost 7,000 and the French 8,000 men, within four hours.

ALBUFEIRA, al'-boo-fair'-a, a Portuguese seaport town in the province of Algarves, 40 miles E. of Cape St. Vincent. Pop. 4,000. Its harbour is defended by a citadel.

ALBUFERA, al'-boo-fair'-a, (in Arabic, "the lake"), a lake of Spain, 7 miles S. of Valencia. It communicates by a narrow strait with the Mediterranean, abounds with fish, and is the haunt of numberless sea-fowl. Ext. 11 miles long and four wide. Near this lake the French marshal, Suchet, defeated the Spaniards, January 4, 1812, for which he was rewarded with the title Duke of Albufera. (See SUCHET.) The rich domain was given to the Duke of Wellington in recompense of his services in Spain.

ALBULA, al-boo'-la, a mountain-pass in Switzerland, Grisons. It crosses Mount Albula from the valley of Bergun. Highest point 6,980 feet above the level of the sea.

ALBULA, ăl'-bu-la, the ancient name of the river Tiber.

ALBUMAZAR, al'-bu-ma'-zar, an Arabian physician and astronomer. His principal works, "An Introduction to Astronomy," and "The Book of Conjunction," were published in Latin translations in Europe in the 15th and 16th centuries.

Born at Balkh, in Turkestan, 805; died at Wasid, 885.

ALBUNOL, a town in Spain, province of Granada. Exports fruit, wine, and spirits of wine. Pop. 6,750.

ALBUQUERQUE, al'-boo-kerk'-ai, a town of Spain in the province of Badajoz, near the frontiers of Portugal, 26 miles from Badajoz. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 7,000.

ALBUQUERQUE, a town of Mexico, on the Rio del Norte. Pop. 7,000. Also a village in Mexico.

ALBUQUERQUE ISLANDS, or S.W. KEYS, a group in the Caribbean Sea, 110 miles E. of the Mosquito coast. Lat. 12° 4′ N. Lon. 81° 50′ W.

ALBUQUERQUE, ALPHONSO DE, an eminent Portuguese, descended from a royal stock, who, in 1503, was sent with a squadron to India by King Emanuel. In the same year that monarch despatched another, under Francis Albuquerque, who was either a cousin or an uncle to Alphonso. Francis arrived first, and having restored the king of Cochin to his capital, was joined by his relation; when they built a fort, and compelled Zamorin, prince of Calicut, to sue for peace. The two Albuquerques soon after sailed for Portugal, where Alphonso arrived in safety, but the other was lost. In 1507 he sailed for Ormuz, and attacked and subdued Zeifaclin, its king; but he was soon obliged to relinquish this conquest and return to India. Here, in a rash attack on Calicut, he was wounded and compelled to retreat. In 1510 he took Goa, but was forced to re-embark, on account of a mutiny on board his fleet. He afterwards captured the strong city of Malacca, and projected other enterprises, when he received intelligence that he had been superseded in his office by Lopez Soarez, a personal enemy, who had obtained an influence over the king. Albuquerque was taken ill at Goa, where he died. He has been named the "Great," and called the "Portuguese Mars," from the magnitude and extent of his military exploits. He was the first to lead a European fleet into the waters of the Red Sea. That he was a great and enlightened man there can be no question; and this is testified in the rare fact of both Moors and Indians, after his death, repairing to his tomb as to that of a father, to implore redress from the cruelty and wrong which they were doomed to suffer from his successors. Fifty years after his death, his remains were conveyed to Portugal. His last enterprise was against Ormuz, which he took in 1507, and which remained in the hands of the Portuguese until 1622, when, in conjunction with Shah Abbas, it was retaken by the English. (See ABBAS.) The son of Albuquerque was ennobled by Emanuel, king of Portugal, who commanded him to take the name of Alphonso. He wrote a history of his father's enterprises, and died in 1580.

Born near Lisbon, 1453; died, 1515.

ALBUQUERQUE COELHO, EDWARDD', a noble Portuguese, who distinguished himself as a soldier, and wrote a "History of the Wars of Brazil." His work was printed at Madrid in 1654, 4to.

Died 1658.

ALBURY, a town of New South Wales, near the boundary of Victoria, Australia, and on the right bank of the Murray river, which is navigable to that point, where it is crossed by a strong girder bridge. The town, made a municipality in 1859, has railway communication with Melbourne and Sydney, from which chief towns it is respectively 205 and 351 miles distant. There are several good public buildings, and the town has a great reputation for the production of wines. Pop. about 5,715.

ALBITIUS, TITUS, a Roman philosopher, and proprætor of Sardinia, who for corruption was banished by the senate. On account of his attachment to the Grecian language and customs, he is ridiculed by Cicero.

Died at Athens.

ALCÆUS, ăl-sē'-us, a celebrated lyric poet, of Mitylene, in Lesbos, who fled from a battle, and whose enemies hung up, in the temple of Minerva, the armour which he left in the field. He was a contemporary of the famous Sappho, to whom he paid his addresses. Flourished about 600 B.C. Of all his works, nothing but a few fragments remain: they are found in Athenæus. He was the inventor of the beautiful metre which bears his name.

ALCALA DE CHIVERT, dai she'-vairt, a town in the province of Valencia, Spain, 29 miles from Castellon. Pop. 5,000.

ALCALA DE LOS GAZULES, al-ka-la' dai los ga'-thoo-less, a town and district of Spain, 30 miles E. of Cadiz. Pop. upwards of 6,000, chiefly agricultural.

ALCALA DE GUADAIRA, dai ge-da'-ra, a town and district of Spain, 7 miles from Seville, famous for the fine quality of bread made there. Pop. 7,000.

ALCALA DE HENARES, dai hai-nar'-ess, a walled new Castilian town of Spain, situate on the right bank of the Henares, 16 miles from Madrid. Pop. 8,700. This town was celebrated for the university, founded in 1510, and is interesting as the birthplace of Cervantes, who was born in 1547, of the emperor Ferdinand, the brother of Charles V.; of the poet Figuerroa; and of Antonio de Polis, the historian of the conquest of Mexico. The Polyglot Bible of Alcala, by Cardinal Ximenes, was printed here. It took fifteen years to complete it, namely, from 1502—1517, and the cost exceeded £11,000. Only 600 copies were printed, and £522 has been paid for a single copy. There are in the town a military academy, and a large powder and leather factory.

ALCALA DEL RIO, dail ré-o, a town of Spain, standing on the right bank of the Guadalquiver, 10 miles from Seville. Pop. 3,000.

ALCALA LA REAL, lai rai-al', a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 18 miles from Jaen, with a rich abbey. The town is at an elevation of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. It owes its name "La Real," or the royal, to having been captured by Alphonso XI. of Leon, in 1340. It has a trade in wool and wine. Pop. 6,800.—The Spaniards were here defeated in 1810 by the French.

ALCAMENES, al-ka-mé'-nes, one of the Agidæ, king of Sparta, known by his apophthegms. He succeeded his father Teleclus, and reigned thirty-seven years. Lived 900 years B.C. The Helots rebelled in his reign.

ALCAMENES, a Greek sculptor, the disciple and rival of Phidias. He was one of the three greatest statuaries of ancient Greece, the others being Phidias and Polycletus. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

ALCAMO, al-ka'-mo, a town and district of Sicily, the town being 22 miles from Trapani. Near it are the ruins of the ancient Segesta. Pop. town and district, 20,000.

ALCANDER, ăl-kăn'-der, a Lacedæmonian youth, who accidentally put out one of the eyes of Lycurgus, and was generously forgiven by the sage, though the people were clamorous for his punishment.

ALCANEDE, al'-ka-nai-dai, a town of Portuguese Estremadura, 12 miles from Santarem. Pop. 3,000.

ALCANIZ, al'-ka-neeth, a walled town of Spain, on the right bank of the Guadaloupe, 60 miles from Saragossa. The streets are spacious, and the public buildings include a very fine collegiate church, a gothic town-hall, college, hospital, and barracks. A beautiful public promenade is a mile long. Manf. Silk, worsted, linen, and soap. There are flour and oil mills. Pop. 6,000.

ALCANTARA, al'-kan-ta'-ra, a town of Portuguese Estremadura, on the Tagus, near Lisbon.

ALCANTARA, the Arabic name signifying the 'bridge,' a fortified town in Spanish Estremadura, on the Tagus, which is crossed by an old Roman stone bridge. It is 35 miles from Caceres, and trades principally in cloth, wool, wheat, barley, rye, and oil. These it sends to Zarza, Ceclavin, and Portugal, receiving in return, linen, wearing apparel, and colonial produce. Its vicinity abounds with fruits and vegetables, and its inhabitants gather a great deal of honey and wax. Pop. 4,500.—The bridge from which Alcantara takes its name, was erected by Trajan, A.D. 105. During the Peninsular War it was partially blown up, and again in the Civil War of 1836; since which time it has remained in a ruinous condition.

ALCANTARA, a thriving seaport of Brazil, in Maranhao, opposite the island of Maranhao. A considerable trade is done in the export of rice and salt. Pop. about 10,000.

ALCARAZ, al-ka'-rath, a town of Spain, in the province of New Castile, 34 miles from Albacete. Manf. Chiefly woollens; and there are in the neighbourhood mines of zinc and copper. Pop. 3,000.

ALCATHOUS, ăl-kăth'-o-us, a son of Pelops, who being suspected of murdering his brother Chrysippus, came to Megara, where he killed a lion which had destroyed the king's son. He succeeded to the kingdom of Megara, and, in commemoration of his services, festivals, called Alcathoia, were instituted there.

ALCAUDETE, a Spanish town in the province of Andalusia. There are good public buildings and convents and churches, in some of which valuable pictures are preserved. Grain and oil are exported Pop. 6,250.

ALCAZAR DE SAN JUAN, a town of Spain, in the province of Ciudad-Real. It is a busy town, situate on the Madrid and Alicante railway, with manufactures of soap, saltpetre, gunpowder, chocolate, and woollens. Pop. 7,800.

ALCAZAR KEBIR, a city of Morocco, 80 miles N.W. of Fez. It was formerly of great importance, and the place where the expeditions of the Moors against Spain were prepared. The battle in which King Sebastian of Portugal was killed, was fought near the town in 1578. Pop. 6,000.

ALCEDO, ANTONIO DE, an-to'-ne-o dai al-thai'-do, a native of Spanish America, who has distinguished himself as a geographer. Little or nothing is known of his history, more than that he was an officer in the royal army, and an ardent geographical student. He spent twenty years of his life in compiling a "Dictionary of American Geography," which in 1786 was published in Madrid.

ALCENOR, ăl-sé'-nor, an Argive, who, alone, with Chromius, survived the battle between 300 of his countrymen and 300 Lacedæmonians.

ALCESTE, or ALCESTIS, ăl-sés'-te, daughter of Pelias. She, with her sisters, put to death her father, that he might be restored to youth and vigour by Medea, who, however, refused to perform her promise. Upon this, the sisters fled to Admetus, who married Alceste; but being pursued by an army headed by their brother Acastus, Admetus was taken prisoner, and redeemed from death by the generous offer of his wife, who was sacrificed in his stead to appease the shades of her father. Some say that Alceste, with an unusual display of conjugal affection, laid down her life for her husband, when she had been told by an oracle that he could never recover from a disease except some one of his friends died in his stead. Hercules, adds the legend, visited the infernal regions, and compelled Pluto to restore her to her husband. This is the subject of a tragedy by Euripides.

ALCESTER, ăl'-ses-ter, commonly pronounced aulster, or auster, a town of England, in Warwickshire, at the confluence of the Alh and Arrow. It is 14 miles from Warwick, and 103 from London; a station on the Redditch and Evesham branch of the Midland Railway. Needle-making is carried on to a small extent, and there are agricultural implement works and brickfields. Pop. 5,290.—The antiquity of Alcester is very great, and its name indicates it to have been a Roman station. In its neighbourhood, coins and other Roman remains have been found. An abbey, of which some traces remain, was founded here in 1140.

ALCHABITIUS, al'-cha-bit'-e-us, an Arabian astrologer, who lived in the 12th century. He wrote "On the Judgment of the Stars," "The Conjunction of the Planets," and "Optics," printed at Venice in 1491, and at Seville in 1521.

ALCHINDUS, al-chin'-dus, an Arabian astrologer and physician, some of whose works are extant; one of which, upon the art of magic, is full of superstition and absurdity. Lived about the 12th century.

ALCIATI, ANDREA, al'-se-a-te, a famous lawyer, who in 1529 was chosen professor of law at Anjou. He subsequently removed to Bourges, to discharge the same office, at the desire of Francis I. The duke of Milan prevailed upon him to return to his native country, where he was created a senator. His most esteemed work is his "Emblems."
Born near Milan, 1492; died 1550.

ALCIBIADES, ăl'-se-bī'-a-dēs, an Athenian, and disciple of Socrates, celebrated for his great and versatile talents, his abilities as a soldier and statesman, his love of display, and his adventurous career. He was the nephew of Pericles, and his father was Clinias, who was killed at the battle of Chæronea. He traced his ancestry, on the father's side, up to the heroic ages, through Ajax to Jupiter. He was possessed of one of the greatest fortunes in Athens, and he took a wife who brought him the largest dowry that had been given in Greece. These advantages concurred with the vivacity of his temper and the generosity of his disposition to render him acceptable in society. By degrees he fell into excesses, and, in pursuing the flowery paths of pleasure, too often forgot the admirable lessons of virtue taught him by the greatest of moral philosophers. His profusion and ambition seemed to go hand in hand in stimulating his desire to become famous. He contended at Olympia with seven chariots in the same race, and won the first, second, and third or fourth crown—success unexampled as the competition. He afterwards feasted all the spectators; and the entertainment was not more remarkable for its profusion and for the multitude of the guests, than for the new kind of homage paid to him by the subjects of Athens. The Ephesians pitched a splendid Persian tent for him; the Chians furnished provender for his horses; the Cyzicenes, victims for the sacrifice; the Lesbians, wine and other requisites for the banquet. At the age of 18, according to the Athenian law, he attained his majority, and in 432 B.C., whilst serving with Socrates at the siege of Potidæa, his life was saved by that philosopher. For the valour he displayed on this occasion, he was rewarded with the crown and suit of armour given by the Athenians, at the instance of Socrates, to whom, however, it appears to have been more justly due. Subsequently, at Delium, he, in his turn, saved the life of the philosopher. The friendship of these two distinguished personages may be regarded as one of the most extraordinary instances of mutual respect and affection which history has recorded as having existed between two celebrated men of entirely opposite natures. The virtuous teachings of the philosopher, however, were inadequate to subdue the violent passions of the statesman and soldier. In the Peloponnesian war, Alcibiades was appointed to command with Lamachus and Nicias, in an expedition against Syracuse; but while he was thus employed, a charge of impiety was preferred against him at home. One morning all the Hermæ, or half-statues of Mercury, which abounded at Athens, were found defaced; and on a reward being offered for the discovery of the offenders, some slaves gave information that it was done by Alcibiades and his drunken companions. For this he was ordered home; but, fearful of the consequences, he withdrew to Sparta, and stirred up the Lacedæmonians to declare war against Athens. Soon after this, however, his friendship for the Spartans declined, in consequence, it is said, of discovering a conspiracy to assassinate him, and he went over to Persia. Subsequently, he was recalled by the Athenians, when he obliged the Lacedæmonians to sue for peace, made several conquests in Asia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of short duration; the failure of an expedition against the island of Andros exposed him again to the resentment of the people, and he fled to Pharnabazus, whom he almost induced to make war upon Lacedæmon. This was told to Lysander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two servants were sent for that purpose, and they set on fire the castle where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his escape.
Born at Athens, 450 B.C.; killed 404 B.C.

ALCIDAMUS, ăl-sid'-a-măs, a Greek rhetorician, who was the disciple of Gorgias, the orator and sophist. He wrote a discourse in praise of death. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.—There are two orations extant under his name; the first printed by Aldus in his edition of the Greek orators, 1518, and the second in the same printer's edition of Isocrates, 1518.

ALCIDES, ăl'-sī'-dēs, a name of Hercules, either from his strength (alke), or his grandfather, Alcæus. —Also a name of Minerva.

ALCIMUS, ăl'-se-mus, surnamed Jachim, a high-priest of the Jews, who obtained that office from Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria, but rendered himself odious to his countrymen by his avarice and cruelty. He died two years after his election. Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

ALCINOUS, ăl-sin'-o-us, a son of Nausithous, king of Phæacia, in the island now known as Corfu, praised for his love of agriculture. According to Homer, he was a grandson of Neptune, and entertained and listened to the wonderful adventures of Ulysses when shipwrecked on his coast; whence arose the proverb of the stories of Alcinous for improbability.

ALCINOUS, a Platonic philosopher, who wrote an "Introduction to the Philosophy of Plato," which has been translated into English by Stanley. Lived in the 2nd century A.D.

ALCIPHRON, ăl'-se-fron, a Grecian sophist, whose epistles give a curious picture of Grecian manners. An English translation of them was published in 1791. Lucian is supposed to have imitated him.

ALCIPPUS, ăl'-sip'-pus, a reputable citizen of Sparta, banished by his enemies.

ALCIRA, al-thē'-ra, an ancient walled town of Spain, on an island in the Xucar, in the province of Valencia. Silk, rice, and oranges are largely exported. A very beautiful stalactite grotto is near the town. Pop. 15,500.

ALCITHOE, ăl'-sith'-o-e, a Theban woman who ridiculed the orgies of Bacchus. She was changed into a bat, and the spindle and yarn with which she worked into a vine and ivy.

ALCKMAAR, or ALKMAAR, alk'-mar, the chief town in North Holland, neat, clean, well built, and strongly fortified, on the great North Holland or Helder Canal, 19 miles from Amsterdam. It has a good trade in corn, flower-roots, seeds, and butter. It is the greatest cheese-mart in the world, upwards of 4,000 tons of that article being sold every year. Pop. 10,500. Lat. 52° 38' N. Lon. 4° 43' E.—In 1573 this town was besieged by the Spaniards, who failed to take it after persevering for ten years in the attempt. In 1799 the British and Russian troops under the duke of York capitulated here to the French.

ALCMÆON, ălk-mē'-on, a philosopher of Crotona, and the disciple of Pythagoras. He was the first writer on natural philosophy, and believed in the theory that the stars were animated beings.

ALCMÆON was son of the soothsayer Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. When his father went to the Theban war, where, according to an oracle, he was to perish, he charged him to revenge his death upon Eriphyle, who had betrayed him. As soon as he heard of his father's death, he murdered his mother; for which crime the furies persecuted him till the river god Phlegeus purified him, and gave him his daughter Alphesibœa in marriage. Alcmæon presented her with the fatal collar which his mother had received to betray his father, and afterwards divorced her, and married Callirhoe, the daughter of Achelous, to whom he promised the necklace he had given to Alphesibœa. When he attempted to recover it, Alphesibœa's brothers murdered him, on account of his treatment of their sister, and left his body a prey to dogs and wild beasts. Alcmæon's children by Callirhoe revenged their father's death by killing his murderers.

ALCMÆON, a son of Syllus, driven from Messenia, with the rest of Nestor's family, by the Heraclidæ. He came to Athens, and from him the Alcmæonidæ were descended.

ALCMÆONIDÆ, ălk-me-on'-e-de, a noble family of Athens, descended from Alcmæon. They undertook, for three hundred talents, to rebuild the temple of Delphi, which had been burnt; and finishing the work in a more splendid manner than was required, they gained popularity, and by their influence, the Pythia prevailed on the Lacedæmonians to deliver their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ.

ALCMAN, ălk'-man, one of the earliest Grecian writers, of whose poems only some fragments remain in different authors. He is said to have been the first writer of amorous poetry. Müller, in his "Literature of Greece," says, "that he is remarkable for simple and cheerful views of life, connected with an intense enthusiasm for the beautiful in whatever age or sex, especially for the grace of virgins."

Born at Sardis, in the 7th century B.C.

ALCMENA, ălk-mē'-na, daughter of Electryon, king of Argos, by Anaxo. Her husband, Amphitryon, going against the Ætolians, Jupiter, who was enamoured of Alcmena, resolved to visit her. The more effectually to accomplish this, he assumed the form of Amphitryon, declared that he had obtained a victory over Alcmena's enemies, and even presented her with a cup, which he said he had preserved from the spoils for her sake. The prophet Tiresias told Amphitryon of Jupiter's intrigue, when he returned to his wife, proud of the dignity of his rival. Alcmena became pregnant by Jupiter, and afterwards by her husband; and the twins, Hercules the son of Jupiter, and Iphiclus the son of Amphitryon, were born. After Amphitryon's death, Alcmena married Rhadamanthus, and went into Bœotia. This marriage, according to some authors, was celebrated in the island of Leuce. The people of Megara say that she was buried in their city, near the temple of Jupiter Olympus.

ALCOBACA, al'-ko-ba'-za, a town of Estremadura, Portugal, standing on the small river Alcoa, 15 miles from Leiria. Several manufactures, especially of cotton fabrics, muslin, and wool, are carried on. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in the vaults of an ancient abbey, many of the Portuguese monarchs, and the unfortunate Inez de Castro, are entombed.

ALCOCK, JOHN, al'-kok, an English prelate, educated at Cambridge. He became dean of Westminster, and master of the Rolls, and in 1471 was preferred to the see of Rochester; whence he was translated to Worcester, and finally to Ely. He was ambassador to Castile in 1470. Henry VII. made him lord president of Wales and chancellor of England. He endowed a school at Kingston-upon-Hull (now Hull), built the hall at the palace in Ely, and founded Jesus College, Cambridge. He was buried in the chapel which he built at Hull.

Born at Beverley, Yorkshire, about 1440; died at Wisbeach, 1500.

ALCOCK, JOHN, organist and musical composer. For more than fifty years he was organist and choir-master at Lichfield cathedral. His best-known works are "Harmonia Festi," and "Harmony of Sion."

Born in London, 1715; died at Lichfield, 1806.

ALCON, ăl'-kon, a famous archer, who, on seeing his son attacked by a serpent, took his aim with such precision that he killed the reptile, without hurting his offspring.

ALCORA, al-kor'-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Valencia. Trade. Chiefly fruit. Pop. 6,000.

ALCOUTIM, al'-koo-teem, a town and castle of Portugal, province of Algarve. It is situated on the Guadiana, 25 miles from Tavira. Pop. 2,000.

ALCOY, al'-ko-e, a busy, thriving town of Spain, in Valencia, 24 miles from Alicante, situate among hills near the source of a river of the same name. Manf. Principally woollen stuffs and paper; and is famous for its papelitos, or paper cigars, and its peladillos, or almond sugar-plums. Pop. 27,000.

ALCOY, a river in the province of Valencia, running an E.N.E. course for 35 miles, and falling into the Mediterranean near Gandia.

ALCUDIA, al-koo'-de-a, an ancient fortified town of Majorca, opposite Minorca. Pop. about 1,100.

ALCUDIA DE CARLET, al-koo'-de-a dai kar'-lait, a town of Spain, in Valencia. Pop. 2,000.

ALCUDIA, DUKE OF. (See GODOY).

ALCUESCAR, al-koo-ais'-kar, a town of Estremadura, Spain, 28 miles from Caceres. Pop. 3,600.—In 1812 the allied troops here assembled, before the battle of Arroyo de Molinos.

ALCUIN, or ALCUINUS, FLACCUS ALBINUS, ăl'-ku-in, an English divine, educated first by the Venerable Bede, and then by Egbert and Aelbert, archbishops of York. He afterwards became abbot of Canterbury, and in 782 went to France, at the request of Charlemagne, who gave him several rich abbeys: he attended that prince to the council of Frankfort. Alcuin was the most learned and accomplished man of his age, a great public teacher, and the principal instrument in reviving the extinguished elements of literature and science. His works were published, in one vol. folio, at Paris, in 1617. He founded the school and the abbey of St. Martin of Tours, where he spent in retirement the last years of his life.

Born at York about 735; died at Tours, 804.

ALCYONE, or HALCYONE, ăl-si'-o-ne, daughter of Æolus, married Ceyx, who was drowned as he was going to consult the oracle. The gods apprised Alcyone in a dream of her husband's fate; and when she found, on the morrow, his body lying on the shore, she threw herself into the sea, and was, with her husband, changed into birds of the same name, who keep the waters calm and serene while they build, and sit on their nests on the surface of the ocean.

ALCYONE, one of the Pleiades, daughter of Atlas and Pleione. She had Arethusa by Neptune, and Eleuthera by Apollo. She, with her sisters, was changed into a constellation. (See PLEIADES.)

ALCYONE, the daughter of Evenus, carried away by Apollo after her marriage. Her husband pursued the god with bows and arrows, but was not able to recover her. From this, her parents called her Alcyone, and compared her fate to that of the wife of Ceyx.—A town of Thessaly, where Philip of Macedon, Alexander's father, lost one of his eyes.

ALCYONEUS, ăl-se-ō'-ne-us, a giant, brother to Porphyrion. He was slain by Hercules. His daughters, mourning his death, threw themselves into the sea, and were changed into halcyons by Amphitrite.

ALCYONIA PALUS, ăl-se-ō'-ne-a paï'-lus, a lake in Corinth, the depth of which the Emperor Nero attempted in vain to fathom. Its banks were grassy, and covered with rushes. Nocturnal orgies were annually celebrated there in honour of Bacchus.

ALCYONIUM MARE, ăl-se-ō'-ne-um mair'-e, a name given to that portion of the Sinus Corinthiacus, or Gulf of Lepanto, which lay between the promontory of Antirrhium and the coast of Megaris.

ALCYONIUS, PIETRO, ăl'-se-ō'-ne-us, an Italian writer and corrector of the press to Aldus Manutius, and afterwards professor of Greek at Florence. He resigned that position and went to Rome, where he perished during the troubles excited by the Colonnas. He wrote some ingenious pieces in Latin.

Born at Venice, 1487; died 1527.

ALD, or ALDE, ald, a river of England, in Suffolk, rising near Framlingham, and joining the North Sea at Orford.

ALDABRA, al-dă'-bra, an island in the Indian Ocean, composed of three separate parts, having a connection by coral rocks, and abounding in land turtles. Lat. 9° 26′ S. Lon. 46° 35′ E.

ALDAN, al-dan, a river of Siberia, which rises on the confines of China, and joins the Lena in Lat. 63° 12′ N.; Lon. 129° 40′ E. There are several towns upon its banks, and, in a course of 500 miles, it is fed by various tributaries.

ALDAN MOUNTAINS, an E. Siberian chain of mountains, terminating at Behring Straits. Average height, 4,000 feet. A branch which traverses Kamtchatka reaches an elevation of 10,548 feet, and in Kliutshewskaja attains 15,763 feet. The lower limit of perpetual snow is at a height of 4,475 feet. (See ALTAI.)

ALDAYA, al-dă'-ya, a town of Spanish Valencia, 7 miles from Valencia. Pop. 2,100.

ALDBOROUGH, or ALDEBURGH, ald'-bur-o, a market-town and watering-place, in Suffolk, on the Alde, 9½ miles from Dunwich. Pop. of the parish, 1,990. This town has a coasting trade, and many of its inhabitants are engaged in fishing. It is a sea-bathing resort, with a good hotel and many villas and lodging-houses. It was the native place of the poet Crabbe, who was born in 1754, and of whom there is a bust placed in the church, which is the largest in the county, and has been recently restored.—A station on the East Suffolk branch of the Great Eastern Railway.

ALDBOROUGH, a market-town and parish on the river Ouse, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Area, 8,750 acres. Pop. town and parish, 2,667. —The town is supposed to stand on the site of the ancient Isurium Brigantium.

ALDBOURN, or AUBOURNE, ald'-born, a parish of Wiltshire, 6 miles from Marlborough; possessed of several ancient remains. Area, 8,060. Pop. 1,622.

ALDEA, al-daï'-a, the name of several places in Spain, with different prefixes; of which these are the principal:—DEL REY, dail rai, in New Castile, 12 miles from Cuidad Real. Manf. Lace. Pop. 1,700. DAVILA DE DUERO, da-vé'-la dai doo-air'-o, 43 miles from Salamanca, on the Duero, has a fair export trade. Pop. 1,500. DEL CANO, dail ka'-no, in Estremadura, 15 miles from Caceres. Pop. 1,300.

ALDEA, the name of several villages and towns in Brazil; at one of them, in the province of Espirito Santo, the Indians build canoes, their squaws make a kind of coarse cloth, and spin cotton and thread for lamp wicks for the inhabitants of Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, &c.

ALDEA GALEGA, al-daï'-a gal-aï'-ga, a town of Estremadura, Portugal, standing 10 miles from Lisbon, on the estuary of the Tagus. Pop. 4,000.—It makes a ferry-station between Badajoz and Lisbon.

ALDEBERT, or ADALBERT, al'-de-bair, a French imposter, who pretended to be inspired, and exercised the episcopal function without authority: he was condemned by a council at Rome, and thrown into prison, where he died. Lived in the 8th century.

ALDEGONDE, PHILIP VAN MARNIX, Baron Von St., statesman and theologian. Studied at Geneva; resisted the introduction of the Inquisition into the Netherlands; fled to Germany, on the arrival of the Duke of Alva, 1566; returned on the establishment of the Republic; Professor of Theology at Leyden.

Born at Brussels, 1538; died at Leyden, 1598.

ALDEGREVER, HEINRICH, hine-rish al-de-graï'-vair, a German painter and engraver, who was both a pupil and a successful imitator of the performances of Albert Durer.

Born at Paderborn, 1502; died 1562.

ALDENHOVEN, a town in Prussia, between Juliers and Aix-la-Chapelle. Near this town, in 1793, the Prince of Coburg defeated the French, inflicting immense loss.

ALDERBURY, al-der-ber'-e, a town and parish in the county of Wilts, 3 miles from Salisbury. Area, 3,950 acres. Pop. 1,438.—A station on the South-Western Railway. At about the distance of a mile from this town is Clarendon, where formerly stood a mansion, of which there are still some remains, and which was a frequent residence of the early English monarchs. In this mansion Parliament assembled, and Henry II. enacted the celebrated "Statutes of Clarendon," framed to check the encroachments of popery.

ALDERETTE, BERNARD and JOSEPH, al'-de-ret, two brothers of the Society of Jesus, who wrote two learned works on the origin of the Castilian languages and the antiquities of Spain. They were so perfectly alike as to be frequently mistaken for each other.

Born at Malaga, and flourished in the seventeenth century.

ALDERNEY, or AURIGNY, al'-der-ne, an island of Great Britain, in the English Channel, 7 miles from Cape la Hogue, in Normandy. The intermediate channel, called the Race of Alderney, is of dangerous navigation in stormy weather. The island forms part of a chain extending to the Caskets, whereon there is a lighthouse. The island is between three and four miles long, and less than two miles in breadth. The coast is bold and rocky. There is excellent pasture land, and Alderney cows are famous for the richness of their milk. The town of Alderney is in a valley, near the centre of the island. The old church dates from the twelfth century, and there is a new one in the transition Norman style. There is also an Albert memorial.

Population.—2738.
History.—
Acquired, with the other Channel Islands, by William the Conqueror 1066
Prince William, son of Henry I., and 140 others, drowned in the Race of Alderney 1120
The Victory man-of-war wrecked, and Admiral Sir John Balchin and 2160 men drowned . . 1744
A breakwater to make Alderney a naval station begun in 1852. The works suspended, after nearly a million and a half of money had been spent 1871

ALDERSHOTT, or SHOLT, al'-der-shot, a parish in Hants, 3 miles from Farnham, and 48 miles from London. An extensive heath in the vicinity was, in 1855, appropriated for the purpose of forming a permanent camp for military instruction. At first only wooden huts were erected; but now some of the finest barracks in the country are at Aldershott. Reviews and sham fights on a very extensive scale are frequently held, and there are usually about 15,000 troops in the camp, which is divided by the Basingstoke canal into the North and South Camps. A busy town has grown up near at hand. Access is afforded to the camp by the London and South-Western Railway, and the Reading branch of the South-Eastern line.

ALDHELM or ADELM, ST., ald'-helm, bishop of Sherborne, and consecrated at Rome by Sergius I. He is said to be the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and the first who introduced poetry into England. The people in his time being extremely illiterate, paid little regard to prosaic discourses, which suggested to Aldhelm the idea of entertaining them with ballads of his own composition, in which he blended religious subjects with those of a lighter kind, and thus induced numbers to listen to his addresses.

Born at Malmesbury 656; died 709.

ALDHUN, ald'-hun, the founder of the see of Durham. In 990 he became bishop of Landisfarne, or Holy Island, which place he left on account of its being infested by the Danes. Taking with him the body of Cuthbert, he went to Durham, where he built a church.

Died 1018.

ALDINI, GIOVANNI, al-dé'-né, a nephew of Galvani, the discoverer of galvanism. He was a Knight of the Iron Crown and Councillor of State at Milan. He delighted in philosophical pursuits, and at his death bequeathed his philosophical instruments and a large sum of money to found a public institution at Bologna, to instruct artisans in chemistry and physics.

Born at Bologna, 1762; died at Milan, 1834.

ALDINI, COUNT ANTONIO, a brother of the above, who distinguished himself as an Italian statesman.

Born at Bologna, 1756; died at Pavia, 1826.

ALDOBRANDINI, SYLVESTER, al'-do-bran-dé'-ne, a Florentine writer, who was appointed advocate of the treasury and apostolic chamber by Pope Paul III.

Died 1558.

ALDOBRANDINI, IPPOLITO, a son of the above, who became pope, as Clement VIII., in 1591. The most accurate edition of the Vulgate was published under his supervision.

Born 1536; died 1605.

ALDRED, ald-red, abbot of Tavistock, and bishop of Worcester, who became ambassador to the emperor of Germany, and was the first English bishop to visit Jerusalem, which he did in 1058. On his return he was made archbishop of York, with leave to hold his former see; but the pope refused him the pallium (archbishop's robe) unless he resigned the bishopric. On the death of Edward the Confessor, Aldred crowned Harold II., and afterwards assisted in the coronation of William the Conqueror.

Died, it is said, of grief caused by the Danish ravages in the North of England, 1069.

ALDRIC, ST., al'-drik, a bishop of Mans, who held a distinguished station in the court of Charlemagne and Louis the Debonnair. He renounced it, however, for the ecclesiastical state, and in 832 was made bishop of Mans. He convoked an assembly of bishops for the reformation of abuses in the church, and compiled a body of canons.

Died 856.

ALDRICH, HENRY, ald'-rich, a divine who from Westminster school went to Christchurch, Oxford, where he was elected student. In 1681 he was installed canon of Christchurch, and in the same year took the degree of D.D. He wrote, in the reign of James II., two able tracts, "On the Adoration of our Saviour in the Eucharist." After the Revolution of 1688, he was made dean of Christchurch, in which station he behaved in the most exemplary manner, and every year published a Greek classic, or part of one, as a gift to the students of the college. He was appointed one of those persons who were intrusted with the publication of Lord Clarendon's history. His knowledge of architecture and music was considerable, as appears by Peckwater Square, in Oxford, the chapel of Trinity College, and the Church of All Saints, which were designed by him; and the numerous services and anthems which he composed. He held the rectory of Wem, in Shropshire, and in the convocation of 1702 sat as prolocutor. Besides the above works, he printed "Artis Logicæ Compendium," and the Elements of Architecture, in Latin.

Born at Westminster, 1647; died 1710.

ALDRICH, ROBERT, an English prelate, who was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He was afterwards appointed canon of Windsor, provost of Eton, and register of the order of the Garter. In 1537 he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle. He was the writer of several works which evince considerable learning, and was famous as a preacher and for the purity of his Latin style.

Born at Burnham; died at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, 1556.

ALDRINGER, al'-dring-er, a general of the German empire. Though a servant to some young students at Paris, he acquired a knowledge of the languages and sciences, and then went to Italy, and had an appointment under Cardinal Madrucci; of this, however, he was deprived, and going to Germany, he entered the army as a common soldier. His merits were soon recognised, and he was raised to the rank of captain. After passing through several gradations, he was made a field-marshal and was also employed as ambassador. He distinguished himself on many occasions as a brave commander; but his avarice and cruelty were extreme.

Born at Luxembourg; slain near Landshut, in 1634.

ALDROVANDI, ULYSSE, al-dro-van'-de, an Italian, distinguished as a natural historian, professor of philosophy, and afterwards of natural history, in the university of Bologna. After passing a life devoted to the most exalted pursuits, and bringing together, at vast labour and expense, a magnificent collection of minerals, plants, and animals, he died, it is said, in an hospital, to which he was compelled to resort on account of his poverty; but this is doubtful, as the Senate of Bologna gave him a good salary, besides munificent donations to assist him to carry on his researches. He was buried with great pomp at the public expense. In 1599 he published his first work on natural history, which was devoted to birds; in 1603 his work on insects appeared; and in 1606 that on the lower animals. The remainder of his works were published after his death, and are a monument of his industry and zeal.

Born at Bologna, 1522; died there, 1607.

ALDRUDE, al'-droo-dai, Countess of Bertinoro, in Romagna, who was celebrated for her beauty and magnanimity, and who, in conjunction with William degli Adelardi, a citizen of Ferrara, compelled the Venetians and Imperialists to raise the siege of Ancona. On her return homeward she encountered several parties of the enemy, and in every action was victorious. Lived in the 12th century.

ALDSTONE, or ALSTON MOOR, ăls'-ton land, on a hill, at the bottom of which is the river Tyne, crossed by a stone bridge. There is a spacious Town Hall, erected in 1859. This parish is famous for its lead-mines, which, till 1715, belonged to the earls of Derwentwater, but which are now possessed by Greenwich Hospital. Area, 35,060 acres. Pop. of town and parish, 8,307.—A station on the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway.

ALDUS. (See MANUTIUS.)

ALEA, ă-lé'-a, a surname of Minerva, from her temple built by Aleus, son of Aphidas, at Tegæa, in Arcadia. The ivory statue of the goddess was carried by Augustus to Rome.

ALEA, a town of Arcadia, built by Aleus. It had three famous temples—that of Diana Ephesia, of Minerva Alea, and of Bacchus. At the annual festival held here in honour of the latter deity, women were beaten with scourges, in accordance with a command of the Delphian oracle.

ALEANAR, a town in Spain, in the province of Tarragona. Wheat is exported. Pop. 3,000.

ALEANDRO, GIROLAMO, cardinal. He studied at Venice, and attained distinction as a Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic scholar; then taught the belles-lettres at Paris, where he became professor and rector of the university, and afterwards entered into the service of Pope Leo X., who appointed him librarian of the Vatican. At the diet of Worms he displayed his eloquence against Luther, causing the works of the great reformer to be burned, and himself proscribed. Clement VII. made him archbishop of Brindisi, and appointed him his nuncio to France. He was present with Francis I. at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, and shared his captivity, but in the following year returned to Rome. In 1531 he was despatched to Germany in the same capacity, and vainly endeavoured to prevent Charles V. from making a truce with the Protestants. In 1538 he was made a cardinal by Paul III.

Born at Motta, near Venice, 1480; died at Rome, 1542.

ALEANDRO, GIROLAMO, grand nephew of the above, was distinguished for his abilities and learning. He first held the appointment of secretary to Cardinal Octavio Bandini, and lastly to Cardinal Barberini. He was regarded as one of the most learned Italians of his age, and wrote commentaries, poems, and treatises on antiquity.

Born at Motta, 1574; died at Rome, 1629.

ALEGAMBE, PHILIP, al'-e-gamb, a Jesuit, who took the religious habit in Sicily, and afterwards became professor of philosophy and divinity at Gratz, in Austria. In 1638 he went to Rome, and was retained there by the general of his order as secretary for Germany and president of spiritual affairs. He wrote various histories and biographies relating to the Jesuits.

Born at Brussels, 1592; died at Rome, 1652.

ALEGRINUS, JOHN, ăl-e-grī'-nus, a cardinal and patriarch of Constantinople, who was appointed legate to Spain and Portugal.

Born at Abbeville, in Picardy; died 1240.

ALEMAN, LOUIS, al'-e-man, a Roman cardinal, who, in 1422, being archbishop of Arles, was sent legate to Sienna by Pope Martin V. The object of his mission was to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to that city. Afterwards the Pope made him a cardinal, and he was appointed subsequently president of the council of Basil, in which he opposed Eugenius IV., who excommunicated him. Nicholas V. restored him to his dignities, and sent him as legate into Germany.

Born at Bugey, 1390; died 1450; and was canonized in 1527.

ALEMAND, LOUIS AUGUSTIN, a lawyer of Grenoble, who, in 1690, published the posthumous remarks of Vaugelas, with a preface and notes of his own. He also wrote the "Journal Historique de l'Europe," and some other works.

Born at Grenoble, 1653; died there, 1728.

ALEMAN, MATEO, al'-a-man, a Spanish writer, who satirized the manners of his countrymen in a work entitled "Guzman de Alfarache, the Spanish Rogue," which was published at Madrid in 1599, and has been translated into various European languages.—Lived in the 16th century.

ALEMBERT, JOHN LE ROND D', da-lam'-bair, a French mathematician and philosopher, the illegitimate son of Madame de Tencin and M. Destouches, a commissary of artillery. His mother had him abandoned in the streets the day after his birth. He was named John le Rond from the church near which he was discovered by the overseer of the district, who gave him in charge of a glazier's wife. His father hearing of his abandonment by his mother, charged himself with his maintenance and education. At the age of twelve he was placed in the college of Mazarin, where he composed a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which the Jansenists read with astonishment. He then engaged in the study of mathematics, in which he made a surprising progress. On leaving the college, he went to live with his nurse, with whom he resided forty years, contented with an annual fortune of 1,200 francs, which had been left him. His friends advised him to endeavour to better his condition by studying the law, in which he subsequently took his degrees, but soon quitted the profession, in order to apply himself to the more congenial study of the physical sciences. Whatever progress he may have made in these, however, he abandoned them for mathematics, and in 1741 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. Two years after this event, he produced his treatise on dynamics. In 1746 he obtained the prize medal from the Academy of Berlin for a discourse on the theory of winds. In 1749 he solved the problem of the precession of the equinoxes, ascertained its quantity, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis. In 1752 he published an essay on the resistance of fluids, and soon after obtained a pension from Louis XV. He next engaged with Diderot in compiling the celebrated "Encyclopédie," for which he wrote the preliminary discourse, which was so excellent, that it drew from Condorcet the compliment that in a century only two or three men appeared capable of writing such. While engaged on mathematical subjects, his name was not much known; but now he became celebrated by works of an historical and miscellaneous character; such as his "Philosophical, Historical, and Philological Miscellanies," "The Memoirs of Christiana, Queen of Sweden," and his "Elements of Philosophy." Frederick, king of Prussia, offered him the office of president of his academy, and Catharine, the empress of Russia, invited him into her dominions as tutor to the grand duke; but Alembert refused both. The king of Prussia gave him a pension of 1,200 francs. In 1765 he published his dissertation on the destruction of the Jesuits. He also published nine volumes of memoirs and miscellaneous pieces, and the "Elements of Music." In 1772 he was elected secretary to the French Academy, and wrote the history of seventy of its members, who died between 1700 and 1771. He died of the stone, being unwilling to submit to an operation; he had for some time suffered from extreme melancholy, caused by the death of Mdlle. de l'Espinasse, to whom he was tenderly attached. D'Alembert enriched the science and literature of his country by the publication of a great many more works, which, after his death, were collected by M. Bastien, and published in 18 vols. 8vo.—In religious opinions he was sceptical, but avoided positive assertions of disbelief. He was of an extremely benevolent disposition.

Born in Paris, 1717; died there, 1783.

ALEMTEJO, a-laim-tai'-sho, a province of Portugal. Area, 10,255 square miles. It is divided into three districts, Beja, Evora, and Portalegre. Desc. Beautifully diversified with hill and dale, watered by the Tagus in the N., the Sado in the S., and the Guadiana in the E. Pro. Chiefly corn and rice, with which it mostly supplies Lisbon. Manf. Earthenware and woollen cloths. Pop. 350,103. Lat. between 37° 20′ and 39° 40′ N.

ALEN, JOHN VAN, fon a'-len, an eminent Dutch painter, who, in birds, landscapes, and representations of still life, enjoyed a distinguished reputation.

Born at Amsterdam, 1651; died 1698.

ALENCON, a-len'-son (Fr. a-lan-song), a city of France, and capital of the department of the Orne, in a plain on the Sarthe, 105 miles from Paris. The suburbs are St. Blaise, Casau, Montsor, La Barre, and Lancret. The town is pleasantly situate and well built, having wide and open streets. The cathedral of Notre Dame, in the Gothic style, was erected in the 16th century; a portion of the old castle remains. Manf. Cloth, linen, straw hats, artificial flowers, and hosiery; and a few houses still make the celebrated lace, pointe d'Alençon. There are extensive tanneries, glass-houses, and smelting-houses. Pop. about 16,000. The Alençon diamonds are crystals of smoke quartz found in neighbouring granite quarries.

ALENIO, GIULIO, a-lai'-ne-o, a Venetian Jesuit, who, during thirty-six years, propagated Christianity in China with great success. He wrote several books on religious and mathematical subjects in the Chinese language.

Born at Brescia; died 1649.

ALENQUER, a-lain'-kair, a fortified town of Portuguese Estremadura, on a river of the same name, 25 miles from Lisbon. It has extensive paper-mills, which are the principal support of the working population. Pop. 3,300.

ALEOTTI, GIAMBATTESTA, al'-e-ot'-e, an Italian architect, who, from a common labourer, by great diligence and application to the study of geometry and architecture, rose to considerable eminence. He erected the citadel of Ferrara, the great theatre at Parma, and other important public edifices. He produced several works on the subject of his profession.

Born at Argenta, 1546; died 1636.

ALEOTTI, VITTORIA, musical composer, daughter of the above. In 1593 she published a "Garland of Madrigals."

ALEPPO, a-lep'-o, or HALEB, a city of Asiatic Turkey, capital of a pashalic of the same name, in the north of Syria, and one of the chief emporiums of commerce in the Ottoman empire. It is a telegraph station on the Indo-European line, and there are resident consuls of most of the European powers. The city is built on eight small hills, and is intersected by the river Koeik. It is, of itself, not above three miles and a half in circumference, and is surrounded by an ancient strong stone wall and ditch; but including the suburbs, it embraces seven or eight miles. In general, the city is regularly built, the houses of the opulent being of white stone. The streets are for the most part broader than usual in the East, though appearing gloomy, from the height of the walls on each side. They are well paved, and have two commodious footpaths raised six inches high. The oldest monument of the town is the aqueduct, which supplies more than 200 fountains in the city. A new citadel has been erected. A distinct quarter of the city is allotted to Jews, and the Europeans have another. There are several mosques, but none have more than a single minaret or steeple. The members of the Greek, Armenian, Syrian, and Maronite communions have each a church. Many caravanseries or inns, spacious quadrangular edifices, one story high, are scattered over the city, besides coffee-houses with a fountain in the middle, and a gallery for musicians. The gardens in the environs are famous for the plantations of pistachios. The town was named Berœa, by Selenius Nicator, who lived in the third century B.C. It was the centre of the Saracenic power.

Manufactures.—Silk, cotton, shawls, and gold and silver threads, with which it supplies the Turkish provinces. There are also extensive cloth factories, dye-works, soap-factories, and rope-walks.

Imports.—Chiefly wool, goat's-hair, silk, and Indian piece-goods, cotton yarns and fabrics, with sugar, cochineal, indigo, woollens and colonial goods, steel, paper, velvets, glass, coral, and some dye-woods. Large caravans arrive from Bagdad, Bosra, Diarbekir, Kurdistan, Mosul, and Armenia.

Population, about 120,000; consisting of Turks, Arabs, Christains, and Jews.

Latitude, 36° 11′ N.

Longitude, 37° 10′ E.

History.—

Taken by the Saracens	638
Sacked by Timour	1400
60,000 persons died of the plague	1797
Great earthquake, destroying two-thirds of the town, and 8,000 people	1822
The Mahometans attacked the Christians, destroyed or plundered eight churches, and killed several thousand persons	1850

ALER, PAUL, a'-lai, a French Jesuit, whose work, entitled "Gradus ad Parnassum," has long enjoyed an established reputation in the schools of Europe.

Born in Luxemburg, 1656; died 1727.

ALES, a'-lais, an episcopal town of Sardinia, 30 miles from Cagliari. Pop. 1,200.

ALES, ALEXANDER, ails, a Scotch divine, who, from being a zealous Catholic, became as zealous a Protestant. His real name was Alane, but he is known in polemical literature as Alesius. In 1535 he visited England, and was greatly esteemed by Henry VIII. and Archbishop Cranmer; but soon after went to Germany, where he rose successively to the professorial chairs of Divinity in the universities of Frankfort and Leipsic. He wrote several books on theological subjects, particularly on the doctrine of the Trinity and the necessity of good works to justification.

Born at Edinburgh, 1500; died 1565.

ALESIA, a-lé'-sia, a town of ancient Gaul, besieged and captured by Cæsar. The town was destroyed by the Normans in 864. The modern village of Alise, Côte d'Or, is situated near the site of the old town.

ALESHKI, a-lesh-ke, a Russian town in the government of Taurida, opposite Kherson, on the estuary of the Dnieper. Pop. 1,500.

ALESSANDRI, ALESSANDRO, Italian author. A lawyer who held some important offices at Rome and Naples. Best known by a book on dreams, apparitions, &c.

Born at Naples, 1461; died at Rome, 1523.

ALESSANDRIA, a'-les-an'-dré-a, a province of Northern Italy, formerly included in Piedmont. The soil is very fertile, producing large cereal crops and flax. Silk is an important product. Area, 1,528 square miles. Pop. 754,983.

ALESSANDRIA, the chief town of the province, with a citadel, amongst the strongest in Europe, on the Tanaro, in Upper Italy. The town was built in 1168, and was first named Cæsarea, but received its present name in honour of Pope Alexander III., who made it the seat of a bishopric. Manf. Woollen, linen, and silk goods; stockings, hats, &c. Pro. In the district in which it stands, wheat, maize, flax, madder, and fruit are raised; the mulberry, the walnut, and the poplar are cultivated; and the ditches which separate the fields from each other, being almost constantly filled with water, the country is well irrigated. The cultivation of flowers is also much attended to. Pop. 61,201.—Two miles from the town is the village of Marengo, the scene of the defeat of the Austrians by Napoleon, on June 14, 1800.

ALESSANO, a-les-an'-o, a town of Italy, in Terra d'Otranto, 200 miles E.S.E. of Naples. Muslins and cotton stuffs are manufactured. Pop. 1,800.

ALESSI, GALEAZZO, a-les'-e, a famous Italian architect, who planned the monastery and church of the Escurial, the royal palace of Madrid, and designed many palaces at Genoa.

Born at Perugia, 1500; died 1572.

ALESSO, D', MATTHEW PEREZ, da-les'-so, an Italian, eminent as a painter and an engraver. His most celebrated performance is a fresco figure of St. Christopher, in the great church of Seville. The calf of each leg is an ell in thickness, and all the other parts are in proportion.

Born at Rome; died 1600.

ALET, a French town in the department of the Aude, beautifully situated, and resorted to on account of the hot springs. The ruins of an abbey, built in the 11th century, are very interesting. There is an ancient episcopal palace. Pop. 1,260.

ALETINO, BENEDETTO, al'-e-té'-no, the fictitious name of a professor of philosophy in the Jesuits' college at Naples. In 1688, he printed a work which had for its object the overthrowing of the Cartesian philosophy, and the establishing in its stead that of Aristotle.

Died 1719.

ALEUTAN, or ALEUTIAN ISLANDS, a-lu'-tan, or the Catherine Archipelago (so named from having been explored by direction of the Empress Catherine). The Russian word aleut signifies a bold rock. A chain of islands, numbering more than 150, in the North Pacific Ocean, stretching from the peninsula of Kamtchatka, in Asia, to Cape Alaska, in North America. Behring's Island, Attoo, Unimah, and Gonalashka, are the largest. The inhabitants subsist chiefly by fishing and hunting, exporting the skins of the otter, the fox, and other animals. Behring's and Copper Island belong to Russia; the others were transferred to the United States in 1867, and form a portion of the territory of Alaska. Desc. Volcanic and rocky, and some of the hills in a constant state of fiery activity. Vegetation is scanty, and agriculture almost unknown. Pop. estimated at about 9,000. Lat. extending from 52° to 55° N. Lon. from 163° W. to 172° E.

ALEXANDER. (See PARIS).

ALEXANDER, surnamed "the Great," was the son of Philip, king of Macedon, and Olympias, a woman of a fierce and energetic character. At an early age he was placed under the tuition of Lysimachus, and afterwards under Aristotle, who took great pains to form the mind of his illustrious pupil; and throughout his brief but active life the influence which his distinguished tutor had exercised over his mind frequently manifested itself amidst his most gigantic undertakings. When still young, the ambition of his character was observed in several expressions which historians delight to record. "My father will leave me nothing to achieve," said he, on hearing of the victories of Philip. "Give me kings to encounter, and I will enter immediately," was another of his remarks when his father expressed surprise that he did not enter the lists at the Olympic games. It is related that, at a very early age he succeeded in subduing Bucephalus, his famous war-horse, which no one had previously been able to manage. The "Iliad" of Homer was his favourite book, and Achilles was the hero whom he chose for his model, and upon whose merits he endeavoured to form himself. On the assassination of Philip, 336 B.C., he ascended the throne, in his twentieth year, and began that series of conquests by which his name has acquired a world-wide celebrity. At this period several of the Grecian states were struggling to shake off the Macedonian yoke, imposed on them by Philip, when Alexander went against them, compelled them to submit, and acknowledge him generalissimo of all the Grecian armies. He then marched into Thrace, and made several conquests. During his absence, Thebes revolted; on the intelligence of which Alexander returned into Greece, took that city by storm, and put many of the inhabitants to death. He also destroyed all the buildings except the residence of Pindar, the poet. This severe example had its effect on the other states; and even Athens, which was the most impatient under the domination of Macedon, distinguished itself by a servile submission to the conqueror. He next turned his arms against Darius Codomannus, king of Persia, and in his 22nd year crossed the Hellespont, with an army of about 40,000 men. It was on this expedition that he, with his friend Hephæstion, visited Ilium (Troy) and the mound in which the remains of Achilles were supposed to lie. With the force at his command, he defeated the Persians at the Granicus, a little stream flowing from Mount Ida to the Propontis, and afterwards made himself master of Sardis, Ephesus, Miletus, Halicarnassus, and other important places. At Gordium, where he assembled his army, he cut the famous knot which united the pole and the yoke of the ancient wagon of Gordius, the legendary king of Phrygia, on unloosing which the fate of Asia was said to depend. While he was in Cilicia he fell into a dangerous fever, owing to his imprudently bathing in the river Cydnus when very hot. In this state he received a letter from Parmenio, intimating his suspicions that his physician Philip had been bribed to poison him. When Philip attended with a strong medicine, Alexander gave him the letter to read as he drank off the potion. On his recovery from this illness, he liberally rewarded the physician for his skill and integrity. Shortly after this he defeated Darius (who had collected an army of 600,000 men) near Issus, took a quantity of treasure and a number of prisoners; among whom were the mother, wife, and children of the king of Persia, who made his escape by flight. The generous conduct of Alexander to these fallen princesses forms the most brilliant episode in his distinguished career (333 B.C.). This victory was followed by the conquest of Phœnicia, Damascus, and other places. The siege of Tyre, however, occupied him seven months, and in revenge he perpetrated great barbarities on the inhabitants. He next marched to Jerusalem, where (according to a not very authentic story) he was met by the high-priest, dressed in his sacerdotal vestments. On seeing this venerable personage, the hero bowed to the ground with such reverence as excited the astonishment of Parmenio, who attended him; when Alexander informed him that a personage of his description had appeared to him in a dream in Macedonia, and promised him success in his expedition. The high-priest then presented to the monarch the prophecy of Daniel, in which it was foretold that a Grecian prince should destroy the Persian empire. In consequence of this Alexander bestowed liberal presents on the Jews, and passed into Egypt, which country he subdued. While there he founded the city of Alexandria (see ALEXANDRIA), and went into the Libyan desert to consult the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, the priest of which flattered his vanity by asserting that he was the son of that deity. He then quitted Egypt, marched through Phœnicia, and crossed the Euphrates, proceeding to the Tigris, which he crossed without opposition at a spot below Nineveh. Darius, having collected an immense army, resolved to make another struggle for his dominions, but was defeated at Arbela (or Gaugamela), and the fate of Asia was decided, 331 B.C. This battle was followed by the taking of Babylon, the enormous treasure accumulated by Darius falling into the conqueror's hands; Susa and Persepolis. The latter city Alexander caused to be burnt (it is said) at the instigation of a favourite Athenian courtesan named Thais. While pursuing Darius, he received intelligence of his having been slain in the deserts of Parthia by one of his own satraps, called Bessus. This individual Alexander caused to be put to death for his treachery, and when he came to the spot where the body of the unfortunate king lay, he covered it with his own cloak, and sent it to Persepolis to be buried in the royal tomb. The ambition for conquest had now become in Alexander an inordinate passion. He entirely subdued Persia, and then prepared to invade India. He overran districts now portions of Afghanistan, and in the early part of the year 326 B.C. he crossed the Indus,—it is supposed at a place a little north of the modern Attock,—and entered the Punjab, or the country of the Five Rivers. On the banks of the Hydaspes,—the modern Behut, or Beduster,—he encountered Porus, an Indian prince, with a numerous army, in which were several elephants. The wonted fortune of the Macedonians prevailed; but Alexander was so pleased with the gallantry of Porus, that he restored him his kingdom, and entered into an alliance with him. Near the spot where the battle was fought, Alexander's famous horse died, and to preserve its memory the city of Bucephalia was founded. Pursuing the tide of conquest which seemed to roll him to success, he advanced to the Acesines (the Chenaub), traversed the barren plain between it and the Hydraotes (the Ravee), where he was met by a second Porus: him he defeated, and gave his kingdom to the former Porus. Continuing his march, he arrived at the river Hyphasis (the Garra), which was the limit of his Indian expedition, and where he erected twelve colossal towers to mark this circumstance. All the country he had subdued between the Hydaspes and the Hyphasis he presented to Porus, the first; and thus made him the most powerful Prince in India. He now ordered a fleet to be built, and sailed down the Indus, and leaving the ships to Nearchus, whom he directed to the Persian Gulf, returned with his army through Persia to Babylon, where he was carried off by a fever, in the thirty-third year of his age. He had four wives,—Barsina, the daughter of Artabazes; Roxana, a Persian princess whom he had taken captive, and by whom he left a son of his own name, who was assassinated, with his mother, by Cassander; Parisatis, daughter of Artaxerxes Ochus; and Statira, daughter of Darius Codomannus. By his own direction, his body was carried to Alexandria, where Ptolemy Lagus deposited it in a gold coffin, which one of his successors changed for a glass one. Having appointed no successor, his generals divided his conquests among themselves. The character of Alexander was made up of very great and very bad qualities. He committed many odious cruelties, and he drank to a shameful excess. He ordered one of his most faithful friends and ablest generals, Parmenio, to be assassinated, having previously subjected his son Philotas to horrible tortures (which Alexander himself witnessed). Finding at Sogdiana, near Samarkand, a colony of Greeks, the descendants of those who, more than a century before, had surrendered some treasure to Xerxes, he had them all cruelly massacred. In one of his drunken fits he stabbed his most intimate friend Clytus with his own hand. Yet he often performed deeds that indicated a benevolent disposition; and though he was pleased with the fulsome ascription of divinity, and at Bactria actually ordered a public recognition of his divine nature, on other occasions he expressed his abhorrence of adulation and flattery. He possessed a taste for learning and the fine arts, and had always about him men of science, philosophers, and poets.

Born at Pella, 356 B.C.; died at Babylon, 323 B.C.

ALEXANDER BALAS, an impostor, who was employed by the Romans to personate the son of Antiochus Epiphanus, king of Syria, in order to take possession of that kingdom. He defeated Demetrius Soter, the lawful heir; but that prince, with the aid of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, afterwards gained a victory over the usurper, who fled into Arabia, where he was slain, 145 B.C.—There are in the British Museum many copper and silver coins with the head of Balas.

ALEXANDER JANNÆUS, king of the Jews, was the son of Hyrcan, and succeeded his brother Aristobulus, 104 B.C. Aristobulus had cast him into prison; whence he was taken at his death and placed on the throne. He began his reign by murdering one of his brothers, and entered into hostilities, which lasted long, with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Egypt. His cruelties irritated his subjects, and produced a civil war, which endured six years. Alexander, however, proved successful, and in one day caused 800 captives to be crucified, after their wives and children had been murdered before their eyes. Having secured the throne, he carried his arms into foreign countries, and made several important conquests.

Died of intemperance, 79 B.C.

ALEXANDER was the son of Aristobulus II., king of the Jews, and grandson of Jannæus. He was sent prisoner to Rome by Pompey, with his father, brother Antigonus, and two sisters, but escaped on the journey, and going into Judæa, he raised an army, and opposed Hyrcan, the brother of Aristobulus, but was defeated by Gabinius, the Roman general, A.M. 3979, taken prisoner, and sent to Rome. Cæsar afterwards restored him to liberty, in hope that he would be serviceable to him in Syria; but he again turned against the Romans, and with the same bad success. Scipio caused him to be beheaded at Antioch, by order of Pompey, 49 B.C.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS. (See SEVERUS.)

ALEXANDER I., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Edgar in 1107. Before his accession he was remarkable for his seeming piety and humility, but afterwards he was so distinguished by his fiery disposition that he was called "the Fierce." He was very rigorous in the administration of justice; on which account several insurrections took place, all of which he subdued.

Died 1124.

ALEXANDER II., king of Scotland, succeeded his father, William the Lion, in 1214, at the age of 16. He engaged in a long and destructive war with John, king of England, who invaded his dominions; but he retaliated severely, by marching into England, where he committed great ravages. In 1221 he married Joan, the sister of Henry III. of England; in consequence of which peace was for a time restored between the two kingdoms. While engaged in putting down an insurrection in Argyleshire, he died of fever.

Born at Haddington, 1198; died in the island of Kerrera, 1249.

ALEXANDER III., king of Scotland, was the son of the preceding by his second wife, Mary de Coucy, and came to the crown at the age of eight years. Soon after he was married to Margaret daughter of Henry III. of England, whom he assisted against the English barons. He defeated the king of Norway, who had invaded Scotland with a large army. He was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse, leaving the character of a great and good prince. He engaged in a long dispute with the Papal power for the independence of the Scottish church.

Born at Roxburgh, 1241; died near Kinghorn, on the coast of Fife, 1286.

ALEXANDER, king of Poland, was chosen such on the death of his brother, John Albert, in 1501. He was a courageous, humane, and liberal prince.

Born 1461; died 1506.

ALEXANDER NEVSKOI, grand-duke of Russia, and a saint of the Greek church. His father, the grand-duke Jaroslaf II., in 1227 removed his residence from Novgorod to Peryaslaf, leaving at the former place his two sons, Feodor and Alexander, as his representatives. Five years after, Feodor died, and Alexander became sole viceroy. About 1239 he married a princess of Polotzk, and began to strengthen his kingdom against the incursions of his neighbours, who drew to their interest Valdemar II., king of Denmark, with the Swedes and the Teutonic knights. Notwithstanding this combination, Alexander mustered his forces, and proceeded to engage the enemy. The armies met on the banks of the Neva, near where St. Petersburg now stands. The battle began at six in the morning, and lasted the whole day: by the time that the shades of evening were drawing over the field, Alexander had gained a complete victory. His surname, derived from the name of the river, was given him on account of this victory. In the following year he was equally successful in a second campaign. After his death, he was canonized; and in 1712, Peter the Great erected a monastery on the spot where he gained his fame, to which, in 1723, he caused the bones of the saint to be brought in great pomp. The empress Catherine built a superb church within the same monastery, with a magnificent mausoleum for herself and her descendants. The shrine of the saint is of massive silver. Peter the Great instituted the order of St Alexander Nevskoi; but dying before he had named the knights, that was done by Catherine I. in 1725.

Born at Vladimir, 1219; died at Gorodetz, 1263.

ALEXANDER I., emperor of Russia, was the son of the emperor Paul and of Maria, daughter of Prince Eugene of Würtemberg. In 1793, he married Elizabeth, daughter of the Crown Prince of Baden. On the 24th of March, 1801, his father was assassinated, and Alexander ascended the throne. At that time Russia was engaged in a war with England; and as he found that her commerce was being greatly crippled by the naval ascendancy of the British, he took immediate steps to endeavour to reconcile the hostile differences between the two kingdoms. Accordingly a convention took place, and an agreement was signed between them on the 17th of June, 1801. The unparalleled successes of Napoleon were then striking alarm into the breasts of most of the sovereigns of Europe, and on the 11th of April, 1805, Alexander concluded an alliance with England, which was joined by Austria on the following 9th of August, and by Sweden on the 3rd of October. The lightning rapidity with which Napoleon conducted his wars, however, rendered almost entirely nugatory the influence of Russia against him; for the succession of battles which were fought between the 6th and the 18th of October completely crushed the armies of Austria before the arrival of the Russian troops. On the 25th, Alexander made his appearance at Berlin, concluded a secret convention with the king of Prussia, joined hands with him at midnight at the tomb of Frederick the Great, whose coffin he kissed, and in the gloomy vault of the departed the two sovereigns pledged themselves to an eternal friendship with each other. He hastened now to join the emperor of Austria. On the 2nd of November the Russian and Austrian troops, commanded in person by their respective emperors, were met and beaten by the French at the battle of Austerlitz, which was the cause of an immediate convention being agreed to between France and Austria, and the departure of Alexander with the remains of his shattered army. In order to gain time and recruit his strength, Alexander feigned to treat for peace, but suddenly broke off the negotiations, or failed to fulfil the conditions which had been partially made, and recommenced hostilities. The battles of Jena and Eylau were fought and won by Napoleon, and on the 14th of June, 1807, the united armies of Russia and Prussia were signally defeated at the destructive battle of Friedland, and compelled to fall back behind the Niemen. This terrible event ended the campaign. On the 21st an armistice was arrangeand five days later, the emperors of Russia and France met in a tent on a raft, in the middle of the Niemen. It is affirmed that the foes became friends, and on the 7th of July following, a treaty of peace was signed at Tilsit. Alexander, in a secret article, engaging to unite with Napoleon in a war against England. This treaty converted all the former friends of Alexander into enemies. In accordance with the plans of Napoleon, on the 24th February, 1808, Alexander declared war against Sweden, and finally, after much hard fighting, obtained possession of Swedish Finland. On the 27th September, the French and Russian emperors again met at Erfurt, where a congress was held for the purpose of bringing about a general peace; and although both Napoleon and Alexander united in proposing terms to England, the negotiations proved unsuccessful, and were broken off in a few weeks. The friendship between these two sovereigns lasted five years, and the treaty of Vienna, signed on the 14th of October, 1809, brought to Russia the annexation of Eastern Galicia, ceded by Austria. By the close of 1811 disputes had risen to such a height between the two emperors, that a rupture became inevitable, and on the following 19th of March, Alexander declared war against Napoleon. A peace was concluded with Turkey, with which Russia had been at war, and by the 25th of June, Napoleon, with an immense army under his command, was marching upon Russian ground. Alexander had an interview in Finland, with Bernadotte, the crown-prince of Sweden. The French army had already entered Smolensk. "Should St. Petersburg be taken," said he, "I will go into Siberia. I will resume our ancient customs, and, like our long-bearded ancestors, will return anew to conquer the empire." "This resolution," cried Bernadotte, "will liberate Europe!" On the 7th of September, Borodino was fought, and on each side 25,000 men fell. On the 14th Moscow was entered by the French, but only to find it a vast pile of smoking and flaming ruins. Napoleon commenced his retreat, and before the remnant of his immense army had crossed the Niemen, on the 16th of December, the bones of 300,000 Frenchmen were already bleaching on the plains of Russia. Alexander had joined his army in pursuit of Napoleon. He was present at the battle of Dresden, fought on the 26th and 27th August; at that of Leipzic on the 18th October; and on the 24th of February, 1814, met the king of Prussia at Chaumont. Here these two sovereigns bound themselves by a treaty to pursue the war against France until it was successfully closed, even at the sacrifice of all the resources of their dominions. On the 30th of March following, they victoriously entered the French capital. Napoleon being deposed, shortly afterwards Alexander, with the king of Prussia, visited England, being magnificently received, and on the 25th of July he arrived at his own capital, St. Petersburg, where he was greeted with every public demonstration of joy by his admiring subjects. At the congress of Vienna, opened on the 3rd November, 1814, Alexander was recognized as king of Poland, which country had, for some time, been merged in his dominions. The escape of Napoleon from Elba, and the events which followed it, brought Alexander again to Paris, where, on the 26th September, 1815, he, the emperor of Austria, and the king of Prussia, affixed their signatures to an instrument, which had for its object the preservation of universal peace on Christian principles, and which was called the Holy Alliance. By the 13th December following, he was once more in his own capital. With the banishment of Napoleon, the great events which had marked the political career of Alexander closed. In the beginning of 1825 he left St. Petersburg on a tour through his southern provinces. After visiting the principal towns in the Crimea, he arrived at Taganrog, on the Sea of Azof. Here he was taken ill of the common intermittent fever of the country, and gradually sank into insensibility and then into death. As a sovereign, he greatly extended the happiness of his people, promoted their literature, advanced their civilization, and improved their institutions. He founded upwards of 2,000 schools for the benefit of the humbler classes, established 204 gymnasia, and remodelled seven universities. He abolished personal slavery, paved the way for the final emancipation of those serfs that are attached to the soil, and from a subordinate rank, raised his country to be one of the leading European powers.

Born 1777; died at Taganrog, 1825.

ALEXANDER II., emperor of Russia, surnamed Nicholaewitch, as the eldest son of the emperor Nicholas. His mother was a sister of Frederick William IV., the late King of Prussia. In 1841 he married the Princess Maria, daughter of the grand-duke of Darmstadt. On the death of his father, which took place on March 2, 1855, he became autocrat of all the Russias, and immediately issued a proclamation intimating his resolution to pursue the plans of Nicholas, and, if possible, bring the war, which was then raging in the Crimea, to a termination. Peace was concluded the same year; and Alexander steadily devoted himself to the administration of internal policy. By a ukase issued in March, 1861, he emancipated 23,000,000 of his subjects; and four years later he established elective representative assemblies in the provinces. His conduct to the Poles was also very liberal. In 1874 he came to England to visit his daughter married to H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh. All his efforts to effect reforms did not secure his own safety, and he was assassinated by the throwing of a bomb at his carriage at St. Petersburg on March 13, 1881.

Born 1818; assassinated 1881.

ALEXANDER III., son of the preceding, succeeded to the throne of Russia March 13, 1881. He had previously married Mary (formerly Dagmar) princess of Denmark, on Nov. 9, 1866. The early months of his reign were much disturbed by secret conspiracies which pointed to danger of his life, and great precautions were resorted to in order to secure his safety. After a time, an appearance of comparative security was restored. The emperor evinced considerable interest in the negotiations for determining the north-west boundary of Afghanistan, he being credited with an earnest desire for a peaceful settlement.

Born 1845.

ALEXANDER I., bishop of Rome. A Roman by birth, and succeeded Evaristus in 109. He stands as a martyr and saint in the Roman calendar. Platina attributes the introduction of holy water to this bishop.

Died 119.

ALEXANDER II., Pope, whose family name was Anselmo Baggio, was raised to the papal see in 1061. The imperial party opposed his election, and in a council held at Basil procured Cadalous, bishop of Parma, to be elected by the name of Honorius II. After a strong contest, the party of Alexander prevailed, and all Europe acknowledged him pope. He carried the papal power to a great height, and most of the sovereign princes yielded to his authority.

Born at Milan; died 1073.

ALEXANDER III. (Ronaldo Ranuci), Pope, succeeded Adrian VII. in 1159. There was a competitor set up against him by the emperor Frederick I., but England and France acknowledged Alexander. On the death of his opponent, the emper procured Cardinal Guy to be elected pope, by the name of Paschal III.; but Alexander being supported by the Roman clergy, excommunicated the emperor, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. On this Frederick marched to Rome, and having driven out Alexander, placed his rival in the pontifical chair; but becoming weary of the contest, he acknowledged Alexander as legal pontiff, yielding him the customary homage at Venice by kissing his foot; after which act the excommunication was removed. This pontiff took part with Thomas à Becket in his quarrel with Henry II., and canonized him after his assassination, and was also engaged in a long dispute with William the Lion of Scotland. He summoned the Third Council of the Lateran, which confirmed several important measures he proposed for the government of the Church.

Died 1181.

ALEXANDER IV. (Count Rinaldo de Segni), Pope, was raised from the bishopric of Ostia to the papal throne, in 1254. He claimed a right to dispose of the crown of Sicily, but was unsuccessful in the dispute which it occasioned. He took refuge at Viterbo, on account of the violent disputes at Rome between the Guelphs and Ghibellines, and there he passed his last days.

Died at Viterbo, 1261.

ALEXANDER V. (Pietro Philargi), Pope, was born of such poor parents that in his childhood he was obliged to go about begging. An Italian monk taking a fancy to him, got him admitted among the Friars Minors. After studying at Paris and Oxford, he obtained the bishopric of Vicenzia, and next the archbishopric of Milan. Pope Innocent VII. made him cardinal, and appointed him legate. On the deposition of Gregory XII., in 1409, the council of Pisa elected him pope. It is generally believed that he died from poison, administered by his successor, Pope John XXIII., having only occupied the pontifical throne for less than a year.

Born in Candia; died 1410.

ALEXANDER VI., Pope. The original name of this pontiff is generally believed to have been Rodrigo Lenzuoli. It is said he assumed the name Borgia, by which he was generally known, on being adopted by his maternal uncle, but some doubt is thrown on this by one of his biographers. His mother was sister to Calixtus III., by whom he was made cardinal in 1455. On the death of Innocent VIII., he contrived by his intrigues to get himself elected by the conclave, though he had then four sons and a daughter by a Roman lady. (See BORGIA.) His son, Cæsar Borgia, was a monster of wickedness like himself. There is hardly a crime of which these profligate wretches have not been accused, and it seems with justice. At length Providence punished them by the same means which they had prepared for the ruin of others. In 1503 the pope and his son attempted to poison a rich cardinal on account of his wealth, when, by a mistake of the attendant, they drank the wine which they had destined for their victim. The pope died almost directly, but Borgia recovered, and was killed some years afterwards. The remains of the pope were insulted by the soldiers and servants of his son, stripped and thrown into a vault. Some time afterwards they were transferred to the Spanish Church of St. Mary of Montserrat.

Born at Xativa, in Valencia, 1431; died at Rome, 1503.

ALEXANDER VII., Pope, was originally called Fabio Chigi. After passing through a variety of offices with credit, he became a bishop and cardinal. In 1655, on the death of Innocent X., he was elected pope, owing to his affectation of extraordinary piety and humility. He published, in 1656, a famous bull against the Jansenists; yet, it is said, he was a liberal-minded prelate, and particularly favourable to the Protestants. He engaged in a long dispute with Louis XIV. of France, during which the papal see lost possession of Avignon. He was an eminent scholar, and an encourager of learning.

Born at Siena, 1599; died 1667.

ALEXANDER VIII. (Pietro Ottoboni), Pope, received several preferments from Urban VIII.; Innocent X. created him a cardinal, and in 1689 the college raised him to the papal chair. He was notorious for enriching his relatives at the expense of the papal treasury, which he almost exhausted.

Born at Venice, 1610; died 1691.

ALEXANDER of Ægea, a Peripatetic philosopher, was the tutor of Nero, whom it is said he corrupted by his instructions. Lived in the 1st century A.D.—He wrote a commentary on Aristotle's Meteorology.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Hierapolis, who espoused the doctrine of Nestorius, that there were two different natures in Christ, which he supported in the council of Ephesus. Lived in the 5th century, and died in exile.

ALEXANDER of Hales, theologian, known as the "Irrefragable Doctor." An English ecclesiastic, who studied in Paris, where he became a noted professor of theology and philosophy; afterwards a Minorite friar. His works were ordered by Popes Innocent IV. and Alexander IV. to be used by all professors and students of theology. With great power and subtlety he advocated the supremacy of the church, and denounced heretics.

Died 1245.

ALEXANDER of Paris, a French poet, who wrote a poem on the life of Alexander the Great, in verses of twelve syllables, which measure has ever since been called Alexandrine. Flourished in the 12th century.

ALEXANDER, an English abbot, who was sent by Henry III. to support the rights of the English nation at the court of Rome. This commission he discharged with such fidelity that Pandulphus, the pope's legate in England, excommunicated him, and caused him to be imprisoned. His works are, "Victoria a Proteo," "De Ecclesiæ Potestate," "De Potestate Vicaria," "De Cessatione Papali," &c.

Died about 1217.

ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO, an eminent lawyer, who, from his exceeding honesty, renounced his profession, owing to the corrupt state in which the practice of it was in his time. He wrote a curious book entitled "Genialium Dierum," in the manner of Aulus Gellius's "Attic Nights."

Born at Naples, 1461; died about 1524.

ALEXANDER, JOSEPH ADDISON, D.D., an eminent American biblical scholar, professor of biblical and ecclesiastical history at Princeton. Wrote a translation and critical commentary on the Book of Psalms and Isaiah, and was a contributor to religious periodical literature.

Born at Philadelphia, 1809; died 1860.

ALEXANDER WILLIAM, Earl of Stirling, a Scotch statesman and poet, who received the honour of knighthood from James I. In 1621 the same monarch gave him a grant of Nova Scotia, which he intended to colonize, and Charles I. afterwards patronized the scheme by appointing him lieutenant of that country, and founding an order of knights-baronet in Scotland, each of whom was to contribute towards the settlement, and to have a portion of the same. The number for these baronets was limited to 150. Sir William afterwards sold Nova Scotia to the French. In 1626 he was appointed Secretary of State for Scotland; in 1630, created a peer, as Lord Alexander, of Tullibody, and Viscount Stirling, and the following year appointed judge in the Court of Session; in 1633 he was created Earl of Stirling, and in 1639 Earl of Dovan. Notwithstanding the great affluence of Alexander in powers of versification, he was very deficient in the poetic faculty. His poem entitled "Aurora" was published in 1604, and in 1607 a collection of his tragedies appeared. The title is now extinct, the last of the male descendants having died in 1739.

Born at Menshie, Scotland, 1580; died in London, 1640.

ALEXANDER, POLYHISTOR, an historian, who was the slave of Cornelius Lentulus, who became his pupil, and gave him his freedom. He was burnt to death in his house at Laurentum, which so affected his wife, that she hanged herself. He wrote five books concerning Rome; and various other works of his, in history and philosophy, are mentioned by Plutarch and others. Suidas says that in his writings he mentions a Hebrew woman named Moso, who was the author of the Jewish laws. All his works are lost.

Lived 80 years B.C.

ALEXANDER, ST., a Phrygian by birth, and a physician. Martyred by being devoured by wild beasts. One of the saints and martyrs of the Roman church.

Died 177.

ALEXANDER, ST., an Asiatic, who though connected with an Eastern court, quitted it for a religious retirement. He founded the order called Acœmetes, because one of them was always to be on the watch to sing hymns.

Died about 430.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Jerusalem, celebrated alike for his piety and his sufferings. He studied under Pantœnus, and afterwards under St. Clement of Alexandria. Being made bishop of Cappadocia, he was imprisoned in the persecution begun by Severus, and remained in confinement nearly eight years. On his release he was associated in the government of Jerusalem with Narcissus, on whose death he became sole bishop; but in the reign of Decius he was again imprisoned and cruelly used. He wrote many letters, which are lost; but Eusebius has preserved extracts of four. He was the founder of a library at Jerusalem, spoken of by Jerome.

Died 251.

ALEXANDER, a county of Illinois, at the angle between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Area, 375 square miles. This county was organized in 1819. Thebes is the capital. Desc. Chiefly pastoral and agricultural. Pop. 59,135.

ALEXANDRETTA or SCANDEROON, ăl'-ex-an-dret'-a, or skăn'-de-roon, the seaport of Aleppo, at the south-east part of a bay in the Mediterranean. Besides having a large trade, it has the best harbour on the Syrian coast. Lat. 36° 35′ 18″ N. Lon. 36° 9′ E.

ALEXANDRIA, ăl'-ex-an'-dre-a, the Iskenderiyeh of the Arabs, a large and celebrated city, the ancient capital of Egypt, founded by Alexander the Great. Dinocrates, a celebrated architect, who rebuilt the temple of Diana, at Ephesus, was engaged to lay out its plan. It is situate 118 miles N.W. from Cairo, on the south-east coast of the Mediterranean, and at no great distance from the Lake Mareotis. Under the dynasty of the Ptolemies, a race of enlightened princes, whose pride it was to foster commerce and the sciences, this city made great progress. On what was then the island of Pharos, but which is not an island now, they built a pharos, or lighthouse, which was considered one of the seven wonders of the world. The city, at that epoch, engrossed the commerce of India, the grand object of ancient ambition. It became also, at the same time, the centre of all sciences connected with mathematics, astronomy, and geography, and contained an immense library, the largest of antiquity, chiefly collected by Ptolemy Soter. Altogether it consisted of 700,000 volumes, 500,000 of which were destroyed when Julius Cæsar was blockaded in the Greek part of the city, and the rest by the Saracenic general Amer, A.D. 640. After falling before the arms of the Romans, Alexandria scarcely lost any of its splendour, and continued still to be the channel by which the commodities of India, Arabia, and Eastern Africa were transported to Europe; but when conquered by the caliphs, and subjected to the Saracen yoke, it then began and continued to decline till the discovery of a passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, in 1497, gave the final blow to its importance and trade. There are now very few remains by which its ancient magnificence can be recognized. One of the two obelisks known as Cleopatra's Needles is still standing, and the other, which was presented to the British Government by Mehemet Ali, was successfully transported to this country by Mr. Dixon, C.E., at the expense of Dr. Erasmus Wilson, and erected on the Thames Embankment, in 1878. The origin of the name of "needles" being applied to these singular erections, arises from the Arabic word mesalleh, signifying both an obelisk and a packing-needle; and as the Arabs ascribe them to Cleopatra, so they adopted the word needle as being the more appropriate term by which the works of a lady should be recognized. The pillar of Diocletian, better known as "Pompey's Pillar," stands between the city and Lake Mareotis, and the catacombs are at a distance of about two miles from it, cut in the face of a calcareous rock, which fronts the sea. Such are the principal memorials of the vast and ancient city, which, according to Diodorus Siculus, had on its rolls in his time (44 B.C.) 300,000 freemen. When Amer took it, he said, in his letter to the caliph, that he found in it 4,000 palaces, 4,000 baths, 40,000 Jews who paid tribute, 400 royal circuses, and 12,000 gardeners, who supplied the city with all kinds of herbs in great plenty. The modern town does not exactly occupy the site of the ancient Alexandria, but is built on a broad neck of land between the two harbours, of which the eastern is the New Port and the western the Old Port. In the new parts of the town the streets are wide and regular, and the houses built in the European style. The principal shops, hotels, banks, commercial offices, and the English consulate and church, are in the Grande Place. The chief public buildings are the palace of the pasha, the naval arsenal, the naval and military hospitals, the custom house, two theatres, several mosques, churches, and convents. In the Turkish quarter the streets are narrow and filthy, and the houses irregular and ill-built. The town is fortified, and there are large barracks. The water-works are on an extensive scale. There is a railway from Alexandria to Suez. The trade of the town is considerable. Its port is frequented by British, Austrian, and French steamers. In 1798, the city was stormed and taken by Napoleon. In 1801 the French surrendered to the British, five months after an assault in which Abercrombie was mortally wounded. At the commencement of warlike operations to put down the rebellion of the Egyptians against the Khedive in 1882, Alexandria was bombarded and set on fire by the British fleet.

Pop. consequently reduced from 213,000 to 208,000.

ALEXANDRIA, a town of Scotland, 4 miles N. of Dumbarton. Pop. 4,650, chiefly employed in the cotton manufacture. An elegant suspension bridge connects the town with Bonhill, on the opposite side of the Leven.—A station on the North British Railway.

ALEXANDRIA, the capital of a barren district of Russia, in Cherson, 70 miles W. of Ekaterinoslav. Pop. 2,500; of the district, 21,000.—This is the name of various small places throughout Russia.

ALEXANDRIA, a county in Virginia, United States. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in agricultural and pastoral pursuits.

ALEXANDRIA, the capital city and port of the above, on the west bank of the Potomac, 7 miles S. of Washington. Trade. Maize, wheat, flour, and tobacco. Pop. 14,000.—Alexandria, previous to 1846, belonged to the district of Columbia. It has a commodious harbour, to which ships of the line can ascend by the river, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal begins here. The town is connected with Washington by railway.

ALEXANDRIA, a division of the eastern division of Cape Colony. It has an area of 1,250 square miles, is fertile, and thickly wooded. It is bounded on the S.E. by the ocean, by the Uitenhage division on the W., and by Albany on the N. and E. The population is about 6,700. A village of the same name is the principal place.

ALEXANDROV, a'-ex-an'-drov, a small town of European Russia, 58 miles from Moscow, where the czar Ivan Vasilievitch occasionally spent the summer, and where he established the first printing-press introduced into Russia.—Here is the imperial breeding-stud of horses, an establishment supported by the crown, and remarkable for the extent and disposition of its buildings. It was commenced in 1761, by the empress Elizabeth, and twenty years were spent in its erection.

ALEXANDROVOSK, al'-ex-an'-dro-vosk', a town of European Russia, 48 miles from Ekaterinsolav, the capital of a district of the same name, on the left bank of the Dnieper, at the mouth of the Moscovka. The town is fortified, and the district is for the greater part a barren heath. Inland productions are shipped here for the Black Sea. Pop. about 5,000.

ALEXEJEV, FEODOR YACOVLEVICH, Russian architectural painter. For several years scene-painter at the Imperial Theatre, St. Petersburg. Member of the Academy of Fine Arts, and Professor of Perspective, studied at Venice, and has been styled the Russian Canaletti.

Born 1755; died at St. Petersburg, 1821.

ALEXICACUS, ăl-ex'-e-kaï'-kus, a surname of Apollo, from his delivering mankind from plagues

ALEXIS, ă-lex'-is, a Greek comic poet, uncle to Menander, of whose works a few fragments remain. Flourished 4th century B.C. Plutarch says he lived to the age of 106, and other ancient writers assert that he wrote 245 plays.

ALEXIS of Piedmont, a writer, who was of a noble family, and spent fifty-seven years of his life in travelling. At the age of 82 he was in Milan, and happening to see a poor man expire under the hands of an unskilful surgeon, he was so deeply stung by remorse for not interfering to save his life, that he renounced the world and sought retirement in a hermitage. Lived in the 16th century.—He was the author of "Medical Secrets," a work which was printed at Basil, 1536 and which has been translated into several languages.

ALEXIS, or ALEXEI, MICHAELOWITCH, mï'-kel-o-vitch, the son of Michael, czar of Russia, ascended the throne in 1645, at the age of fifteen. His reign was disturbed by two pretenders to the throne, one of them the celebrated Demetrius, and by foreign and civil wars. Having succeeded in quelling domestic dissension, he engaged in a war with Poland, which ended by his acquiring the provinces of Smolensko, Tchernigov, and Seweria, for a sum of money. He next entered upon a long and destructive war against Charles Gustavus, of Sweden, who was more than his equal, and compelled him to retire within his own territories. He next engaged the Turks, uniting his forces with those of the king of Poland, under the famous John Sobieski, who, on the 18th October, 1672, gained a splendid victory over the Ottomans at Kaluzo. A short peace with Turkey was the result of this battle; but the terms on which it was obtained being deemed unsatisfactory by the Polish chief, war was recommenced, and before it was again concluded, Alexis died. He was an upright but severe prince, and was the first who caused the laws of Russia to be printed. He also encouraged the arts and sciences, paid attention to the interests of commerce, and laid the plans of those projects which his son Peter the Great afterwards carried into execution.

ALEXIS PETROWITCH, pe'-tro-vitch, son of Peter the Great, by Eudokia Lapukin, when a child was committed to the care of the Russian priests, who instilled into him all their barbarous prejudices. He was of a disposition which seemed likely to overturn all the reforms which his father had planned for the civilization of his people, and in 1716 he was compelled to renounce his right of succession. He afterwards escaped to Vienna, and put himself under the protection of Charles VI., who sent him first to Inspruck, and then to Naples. By a promise of forgiveness, however, he was induced to return to Moscow, where he was thrown into prison, tried secretly, and condemned to death. The trial was printed by order of the emperor. The public manifesto asserts that he died of an apoplectic fit, but it is suspected that he was secretly put to death.

Born at Moscow, 1695; died 1718.

ALEXIS I. COMNENUS, kom-ne'-nus, who on the deposition of Nicephorus, in 1081, was chosen emperor of the East by the troops. The greatest part of his reign was disturbed by wars with the Turks, Scythians, and other powers. He was the father of the celebrated Anna Comnena, who wrote the history of her father's reign.

Born at Constantinople, 1048; died 1118.

ALEXIS II. COMNENUS, surnamed PORPHYROGENITUS, por'-fi-ro-gen'-e-tus, was the son of Michael Comnenus, whom he succeeded in 1180, under the care of the empress Mary, his mother. Her conduct gave offence to the nobility, and at length an open insurrection ensued, headed by Andronicus Comnenus, who took Constantinople in 1183, imprisoned the empress, and compelled the young emperor to admit him as his associate in the empire. In the year following, however, he caused Alexis to be strangled.

Born 1167; died 1183.

ALEXIS III. ANGELUS, emperor of the East, deposed his brother Isaac, and threw him into prison, where he was deprived of his sight. Alexis, the son of Isaac, prevailed on the French and Venetians to espouse the cause of his father. A large army besieged Constantinople in 1203, and the usurper fled with his treasure to Thrace. The people then released Isaac, and placed him on the throne. Alexis fell into the hands of Theodore Lascaris, who put out his eyes, and confined him in a monastery, where he died.

ALEXIS IV. ANGELUS, after the flight of his uncle, was associated with his father Isaac in the government. He was deposed and put to death by the people, for endeavouring to raise heavy contributions to pay his allies, and to bring the Eastern empire under the authority of the pope.
Died 1204.

ALEXIS V. DUCAS, called Murtzuffle, from his black heavy eyebrows, on the murder of the last-mentioned emperor, was raised to the throne. The Latins, however, laid siege to Constantinople, and pressed it so closely, that Murtzuffle was obliged to escape by night. He was deprived of his eyes by his father-in-law, to whom he fled for refuge; and, after rambling about as a mendicant, was seized by the Latins, who cast him from the top of Theodosius's Pillar, when he was dashed to pieces.
Died 1204.

ALEXIS I. to IV., emperors of Trebizond between 1204 and 1446.

ALEXIS DEL ARCO, a-laix'-es dail ar'-ko, a celebrated deaf and dumb Spanish portrait-painter.
Born at Madrid, 1625; died 1700.

ALEXOPOL, ă-lex'-o-pol, the capital of a circle in Poltawa, Russia, 30 miles S. of Poltawa.

ALEYBEH, a-lai'-be, a large and populous place in W. Africa, on the bank of the Senegal. Lat. 16° 50′ N. Lon. 14° 4′ W.

ALEYN, CHARLES, a-lain', an English poet, who wrote two poems on the battles of Cressy and Poictiers, and some other effusions.

ALFACAR, al-fa-ka, a town of Grenada, with extensive and fine Moorish remains. Pop. 1,100.

ALFANI, DOMENICO, an Italian painter, and fellow student with Raffaele. His pictures are chiefly at Florence, and in the churches of Perugia.
Born at Perugia, 1483; died 1540.

ALFAQUES, al-fa'kais, a Spanish seaport town in the province of Tarragona, at the mouth of the Ebro. Lat. 43° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 45′ E.—In the neighbourhood there are extensive marshes and small ponds, where a great quantity of salt is deposited, procured, and constantly being exported.

AL-FARABI, ABU NASR MUHAMMAD IBN TARKHAN, Arabian philosopher and physician. Wrote on the sciences, art, and metaphysics.
Died at Damascus, 950.

ALFAR DAGH, al-far daw, a mountain of Asiatic Turkey, in Anatolia, not far from the Black Sea. Lat. 40° 35′ N. Lon. 33° 5′ E.

ALFARO, al-far-o, a town of Spain, at the conflux of the Alama and Ebro. It is a handsome, busy town, in a fertile district. Manf. Hats, cloth, saltpetre, and leather. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 42° 16′ N. Lon. 1° 52′ W.

ALFARO Y GAMEZ, JUAN DE, Spanish painter. Studied under Velasquez, chiefly distinguished as a colourist and portrait painter.
Born at Cordova, 1640; died 1680.

ALFAYATES, al'-fa-ya'-tais, a fortified place of Portugal, 150 miles N.E. of Lisbon. Lat. 40° 27′ N. Lon. 6° 47′ W.

ALFECHIMO, al'-fe-che'-mo, one of the four districts of the island of Corfu, containing a considerable number of villages. Pop. about 15,000. (See CORFU.)

ALFELD, al'-felt, a walled town of Hanover, on the river Leine. Manf. Linen and yarn; and there are corn, oil, paper, and saw-mills. In the neighbourhood hops and flax are cultivated. Pop. 3,000.—A station on the Hanover and Cassel Railway.

ALFENUS VARUS, PUBLIUS, ăl-fé-nus vair'-us, a Roman jurist, who, from being a shoemaker, became an advocate, and at length consul. He wrote forty books of digests, and some collections, cited by Aulus Gellius. Horace mentions him in his third satire, and Virgil speaks of his conduct towards him with gratitude.
Born at Cremona, 1st century B.C.

ALFEZ, RABBI ISAAC, Jewish writer on the Talmud, of great reputation. His writings are considered second only to the Talmud in authority.
Born near Fez, Morocco, 1013; died at Alusina, Spain, 1103.

ALFIERI, VITTORIO, vee-tor'-e-o al'-fe-air'-e, a celebrated Italian dramatic poet, was born of a wealthy and noble Italian family. He lost his father when a child, and his mother having married again, he was placed under the guardianship of his uncle, and was sent at an early age to the Academy of Turin. At 14 he became master of his own income, entered the army, and at 17 commenced his travels under the escort of an English Roman Catholic tutor. He visited France, England (which he left hurriedly in consequence of an intrigue with a married lady of high rank), Holland, Spain, and Portugal, and then returned to Italy and took up his abode first at Siena, and then at Florence. Here he made the acquaintance of the wife of Charles Edward Stuart, known as the Young Pretender, and upon whom the affections of his heart were fixed for ever afterwards. On the death of that lady's husband, it is said that he privately married her, although she continued to retain the title of countess of Albany. (See ALBANY, Countess of.) With the exception of a brief interval, when he resided in France with the countess, he spent the remainder of his life in Florence, devoting nearly the whole of his time to study. He ended his life by suicide. The early years of Alfieri were given to dissipation, and not till 1773 did he commence writing with a view to public fame. By 1782 he had completed fourteen tragedies, which are wonderfully effective in operating upon the passions of an Italian audience. His "Saul" and his "Filipo" are considered the finest of his productions. He wrote also poems, satires, and historical and literary essays. He left behind him memoirs of a very interesting character.
Born at Asti, Piedmont, 1749; died at Florence, 1803.

ALFORD, ăl-ford, a market town in Lincolnshire, 24 miles from Boston. The town consists of three main streets and a large open market-place. There is a handsome church, St. Wilfrid's, lately restored, and the dissenting congregations have several chapels. There are a Corn Exchange and Mechanics Institute, and mill-works, dye-houses, breweries, tanneries, and rope-yards.—A station on the East Lincolnshire branch of the Great Northern Railway is near the town. Pop. 2,262.

ALFORD, a district and parish, 28 miles N.W. of Aberdeen, Scotland. The district contains four teen parishes, and is watered by the river Don, and surrounded by hills and mountains. Area of the parish, 8,000 acres. Pop. 1,300; of the district, 13,000. In 1645 a battle was fought in this parish between the Covenanting army under General Baillie, and the royalists under Montrose, in which the former was defeated.

ALFORD, HENRY, D.D., dean of Canterbury. He was the fifth of his family in regular succession who were clergymen of the Church of England. His mother died in giving him birth, and the father devoted himself to the education of his son, who exhibited remarkable precocity, commencing authorship when only six years old. He went afterwards to private schools at Charmouth, Hammersmith, and Ilminster. At the age of 17 he went to Cambridge, where he became a very popular tutor. Having taken orders he held several incumbencies, and in 1857 was appointed to the deanery of Canterbury. His edition of the Greek Testament is highly valued; he was a profound classical scholar and philologist, an admirable poet, and exhibited great talent as an amateur musician, painter, and mechanic. He was the first editor of the Contemporary Review, and an active contributor to periodical literature.

Born in London, 1810; died at Canterbury, 1871.

ALFORD, MICHAEL, Jesuit historian, author of "Ecclesiastical and Civil Annals of Britain."

Born 1587; died 1651.

ALFRED THE GREAT was the youngest son of Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons, and Osburga, daughter of Oslac the Goth, who inherited the blood of the sub-kings of the Isle of Wight. At the age of five he was sent to Rome, where Pope Leo IV. anointed him with the royal unction. Ethelwolf died in 858, leaving his dominions to Ethelbald and Ethelbert, and his personal estate to his younger sons, Ethelred and Alfred. Ethelbald did not long survive his father, and was succeeded by Ethelbert; but he dying in 866, left the throne to Ethelred, who made Alfred his prime minister and general of his armies. He greatly distinguished himself, especially at the battle of Ashdown, in Berkshire, where he gained a great victory over the Danes. The figure of a white horse cut on the hill side still commemorates the battle. Ethelred dying in 871, from a wound which he received from the Danes at the battle of Mertune,—probably Merton, near Reading,—Alfred found himself, at the age of 22, the monarch of a distracted kingdom. About a month afterwards he was defeated by the Danes at Wilton, but each party being exhausted by the long struggle, a treaty of peace was concluded, and the Danes withdrew to London. Alfred now turned his attention to subduing the Danish pirates who infested the English coast. In 875 he defeated seven Danish rovers, and that was the first naval victory gained by Englishmen. In 876 the Danes broke the treaty of peace and recommenced hostilities, possessing themselves of various places near the south coast. In the following year the Danes appeared in much greater force, overrunning the kingdom of Wessex. Being quite unable to resist them, Alfred retired to the little island of Athelney, formed by the confluence of the rivers Parret and Tone, in the marshes of Somersetshire, and with a few faithful adherents matured his plans for repelling the invasion. Popular tradition says that he disguised himself as a harper, and obtained admission to the Danish camp, where his skill was so much admired that he was retained a considerable time, and was admitted to play before King Gorm, or Guthrum, and his chiefs. Having gained a knowledge of the state of the camp, he directed his nobles to collect their vassals, and to meet him at Selwood, in Wiltshire, which was done so secretly that the Danes were surprised at Edington, or Ethandun, in Wiltshire, and completely defeated. This was in May, 878. After the victory Alfred behaved with great magnanimity to his foes, giving up the kingdom of the East Angles to those of the Danes who embraced the Christian religion. His success now enabled him to put his kingdom into a state of defence, and to increase his navy. Having recovered London, which had been taken by the Danes, the whole country seemed to acquire a new life under his vigorous administration. After the repose of a few years, an immense number of Danish forces landed in Kent in 885, but were defeated, and peace was maintained until 893, when a large Danish force, led by the famous Hastings, landed, but after a struggle which lasted four years, they were completely subdued. Thus by his energy, activity, bravery, and wisdom, did Alfred secure the peace of his dominions, and strike terror into the hearts of his enemies, leaving the country in a very different condition, as to its internal safety and prosperity, from that in which he found it. There is, perhaps, no prince who has had the surname of 'Great' given him with more universal consent than Alfred. He is said to have been engaged in 56 battles by sea and land, although his valour as a warrior has excited less admiration than his wisdom as a legislator. He composed a body of statutes, instituted the trial by jury, and divided the kingdom into shires and tithings. He was so vigorous in his government that robbery was unheard of, and valuable goods might be left on the high-road without danger. He also formed a parliament, which met in London twice a year. There was so little learning in his time, that from the Thames to the Humber hardly a man could be found who understood Latin. To remedy this state of things, he invited learned men from all parts, and endowed schools throughout his kingdom; and if indeed he was not the founder of the University of Oxford, he raised it to a reputation which it had never before enjoyed. Among other acts of munificence to that seat of learning, he founded University College. He was himself a learned prince, and composed several works, and translated others from the Latin, particularly "Boetius's Consolations of Philosophy," the "Ecclesiastical History" of Bede, and the "Universal History" of Orosius. He divided the twenty-four hours into three equal parts; one he devoted to the service of God, another to public affairs, and the third to rest and refreshment. To Alfred, also, England is indebted for the foundation of her naval establishment, and he was the first who sent out ships to make the discovery of a north-east passage. Alfred married Alswith, daughter of a Mercian nobleman, and left two sons and three daughters. In private life he was benevolent, pious, cheerful, and affable; and his deportment was both dignified and engaging. Several of the romantic incidents with which tradition has invested his eventful life have suggested subjects for the historical painter: one of the best known of these is his allowing the cakes to burn whilst making his arrows in the cottage of the herdsman, during his obscurity at Athelney. "You can eat the cakes fast enough, though you will not take the trouble to look after them," was the rebuke which the angry herdsman's wife gave on this occasion to the disguised monarch for his want of vigilance.

Born at Wantage, Berkshire, 849; died 901.

ALFRED, the son of Ethelred the Unready, by Emma, daughter of Richard I., duke of Normandy. The ravages of the Danes induced his father to send him with his brother, afterwards Edward the Confessor, to Normandy, where they were educated.

On the death of Canute, he landed in England with a chosen band of Normans, and would have succeeded in dethroning Harold, surnamed 'Harefoot,' if it had not been for the treachery of Earl Godwin. Alfred was taken prisoner, and his eyes were put out; after which he was confined in the monastery at Ely, where he died, or as some say, was murdered.

Born 1003; died about 1037.

ALFRED, PORT, formerly known as Port Francis, at the mouth of the Korvie river, Cape Colony, about 600 miles E. of Cape Town. There are Government harbour works.

ALFRETON, ăl-fre-ton, a market-town in Derbyshire, supposed to have derived its name from Alfred the Great. The inhabitants are occupied principally in the manufacture of brown earthenware and stockings, and in some iron works and collieries in the vicinity. The church, St. Martin's, has been recently enlarged. There are several chapels for dissenters. Pop. 3,680. A station on the Erewash branch of the Midland Railway.

ALFRIDE, or ELFRID, the illegitimate son of Oswy, king of Northumberland, on whose death he was violently persecuted by Egfrid, his brother. To avoid his violence he retired to Ireland, or, according to others, to Scotland, where he led a philosophical life. His brother, however, followed him with implacable malice, and waged war with those who granted him an asylum. In this contest Egfrid was slain, on which the Northumbrians elected Alfride to the vacant throne in 636.—This prince greatly endeared himself to his subjects, and was a liberal encourager of literature.

ALGARDI, ALESSANDRO, al-gar'-de, an Italian painter and sculptor, the son of a silk-mercer. He studied first in the school of the Carracci, but, preferring sculpture, became a pupil of the sculptor Carvente. He executed many fine works; amongst which may be mentioned the Attila, which is the largest alto-relievo in the world, and is in St. Peter's church of the Vatican at Rome. As a sculptor Algardi ranks among the first of the moderns. In infantile representation his excellence was great.

Born at Bologna, 1602; died at Rome, 1651.

ALGARINEJO, al'-gar-e-naish'-o, a well-built town of Andalusia, Spain, 26 miles from Grenada. Manf. Wove fabrics, brandy, soap, oil, &c. Sheep, goats, mules, and asses are reared, game in the vicinity is abundant, and the inhabitants cultivate much fruit and vegetables. Pop. 4,400.

ALGARKIRK, ăl-gar-kirk, a parish of Lincolnshire, 8 miles from Spalding. Area, 6,050 acres.—Here there is to be seen a statue of Edgar, earl of Mercia, who having, in 870, defeated the Danes in a battle in this part, was slain the next day.

ALGAROTTI, FRANCESCO, Count, al'-ga-rot'-e, a polite writer, who received a liberal education, and after visiting different countries, was made, by Frederick, king of Prussia, chevalier of the order of Merit, created a count, and appointed chamberlain. The king of Poland also highly esteemed him, and gave him the title of privy councellor of the affairs of war. His works were published in Italian at Leghorn, 1765, and afterwards translated into French. Algarotti was a man of lively, but superficial genius; and though his writings show a taste for the fine arts, they convey little information.

Born at Venice, 1712; died at Pisa, 1764.

ALGARVE, or ALGARVA. al-gar'-vai, (from an Arabic word signifying "a land lying to the west"), a southern maritime province of Portugal, bounded on the W and S. by the Atlantic, on the E. by Spain, and on the N. by Alentejo. The chief town is FARO. Ext. 85 miles in length, with an average breadth of about 20. Area, 1,865 square miles. Desc. Hilly, and intersected with numerous valleys, which are fertile, though so little cultivated that a sufficient quantity of corn is not raised to meet the wants of the population. Pro. Oil, almonds, figs, wine, and olives. These are all exported, and the herring and sardine fisheries are very productive. In the mountains numerous goats are pastured, and the oak is reared. Pop. 199,142. —At the S.W. extremity of this province is Cape St. Vincent, where Admiral Sir John Jervis, afterwards called, from this victory, Lord St. Vincent, defeated the Spanish fleet on the 14th February, 1797.

AL GAZALI, ABU HAMED MUHAMMED, Arabian philosopher and theologian. Head of a theological college at Bagdad; but, being unsatisfied as to the truth of the doctrines he taught, retired for ten years to Damascus. He then returned to Bagdad, and resumed teaching for fifteen years, the remaining years of his life being devoted to meditation. He wrote a treatise against the teaching of Aristotle, and against the orthodox Islamites. He has been called the Oriental Descartes. Mr. Lewes and M. Renan have given much attention to his writings.

Born at Tous, 1058; died there 1111.

ALGECIRAS, al'-jai-the'-ras, a seaport of Spain, in the province of Cadiz, 6 miles W. of Gibraltar, on the opposite side of the bay. The name, which means, in Arabic, "the island," is taken from a small island which forms one side of the harbour. There are an old fortress, a military hospital, and a very fine aqueduct supplying the town with water. The modern town was built about 1760. Manf. Course linen and cotton fabrics, gloves, brown and stained paper, sombrero hats, Morocco leather, earthenware, and copper utensils. Pop. about 14,000. Lat. 36° 8′ N. Lon. 5° 26′ W. —This town was built by the Moors, and, after a siege of twenty months, was, in 1344, taken from them by Alphonso X. It is memorable in British naval history, as the locality of a great victory gained by Admiral Saumarez over the combined French and Spanish fleets, on June 9, 1801.

ALGEMESI, or ALGEMESIA, al'-jai-mai'-se, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 18 miles S. of Valencia. Pro. Principally rice and silk. Pop. 4,500.

ALGER OF LIEGE, known also as Alger of Cluny and Algerus Magister, a learned French ecclesiastic, who ended his days in the monastery of Clugny. Author of several theological works.

Died about 1145.

ALGERIA, ăl-jeer'-e-a (Fr. L'ALGERIE, lal'-zhai-re), is the name given to a large district of Northern Africa, the chief of the colonial possessions of France. It is bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean Sea, on the E. by Tunis, on the S. by the Great Desert, and on the W. by Morocco. It extends 550 miles along the coast, with a varying breadth of from 320 to 380. The entire colony is about one-sixth larger than France. Desc. The interior of Algeria may be regarded as an extensive table-land running from east to west, and rapidly rising from the plains which skirt the Mediterranean coast, until it attains to an average height of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, when it gradually slopes towards the south, and loses itself in the Great Desert. Ranges of the Atlas system run parallel with the coast. The breadth of this tract varies considerably, and is beautifully adorned with rounded, insulated hills, overlooking rich valleys and ravines, but never attaining to the elevation of the limit of perpetual snow. These hills are for the greater part covered with fruit trees of every description, and of the very finest quality. Orange, lemon, fig, and vine trees abound; the palm is indigenous, and in the "country of dates," to the south of the Atlas mountains, that fruit is exceedingly plentiful. The timber-trees consist mostly of the elm, and a species of oak which produces a nutritious kind of acorn. The lotus, the cypress, and the chestnut are also abundant, whilst the plains are beautified by large plantations of white roses; whence is obtained the perfume known to us by the name of attar of roses. The coast is steep and rugged, with several lofty capes. The rich plains near the Mediterranean are known as the Tell.

Rivers and Lakes.—The chief rivers are the Shellif, rising on the borders of the Algerian Sahara, and after a course of 300 miles falling into the sea below Cape Ivy; —the Isser, the Zowar, the Wad-el-Kebeer, the Seiboos, the Sig, and the Tafna. These are on the N. of the Atlas. On the S. are the Wad-ad-jedee, which, after a course of 200 miles, loses itself in the marshes which border the Desert. Several other streams of no great size also fall into these marshes after tracing a meandering or tortuous course through the rugged defiles of the southern side of the Atlasian chain. There are lakes of considerable size in the northern part of the country near the coast, and much larger ones in the south, which, however, are generally dried up in the summer, leaving a thick stratum of salt.

Climate.— Temperate and healthy to the north of the Atlas, but disagreeable during the blowing of the south wind or Khamsin, as it is called. The rainy months are November and December. It is generally fine in January and February, and in April the fields are carpeted with the richest green. From July to September the country is scorched by the solar heat, the oleander alone preserving its verdant hue.

Produce.—Rice, wheat, millet, barley, dourra, Indian corn, cotton, and sugar. Minerals. So far as these are at present known, they consist of iron, copper, lead, silver, gypsum, marble, and limestone. Since the country was taken by the French, the copper-mines have been worked to a considerable extent. There are several warm mineral springs.

Animals.—In the mountain ranges are lions, panthers, and leopards, but no tigers, and the interior swarms with antelopes, boars, and porcupines. Serpents and venomous insects also abound, and the locust occasionally lays waste the harvest of whole districts in a few days. The Domestic Animals are cows, goats, asses, mules, horses, and camels. The horses are an excellent breed, and of the milk of the camel a good cheese is made. The flesh of the foals of horses is eaten, and from the countries of Morocco and Algeria come the Merino sheep.

Inhabitants.—Besides the Europeans, there are eight distinct races. The Arabs, Moors, Turks, Kooloolis, Jews, Berbers or Kabyles, Negroes, and the Mozabites, an African race, chiefly engaged in laborious occupations. The Arabs encamp on the plains, and are also known by the name of Bedouins. The Moors are a mixed race, who have grown out of the several nations which have successively conquered the country. Their numbers were much increased when they were forced from Spain. The Kooloolis are the offspring of Turks and Moorish women or Christian slaves. The Jews mostly came with the Moors from Spain or Portugal, the Kabyles are the aborigines, who were called so by the Moors, from the word "Kabileah," signifying a clan. Their chief stronghold is to the east of Algiers, in the highlands stretching for 200 miles along the Mediterranean, from Dellys to Bona, and designated Kabylia by the French. The Negroes were slaves who were kidnapped by the Bedouins, or brought from Soudan by the caravans. Of these races the religion is chiefly Mahometan.

Government.—A civil governor-general administers the government of the settled districts; but those portions of the colony which are chiefly inhabited by wandering tribes are under military rule. There are three provinces, Algiers, Constantine, and Oran, subdivided into twelve departments, at the head of each of which is a prefect. In important matters the governor-general is advised by a council appointed by the French Government.

Towns—The principal are ALGIERS, CONSTANTINE, Bona, Medeyah, Blidah, Mushgammin, Arzew, Oran, Tlemsen, and Mascara.

Manufactures.—Defective. Carpets, blankets, and other woollens; silks in the form of sashes and handkerchiefs. A considerable trade is carried on in salt, ostrich feathers, hides, wax, cattle, and sheep; and there are imported European manufactures and colonial produce. With the French African settlements of Senegal a profitable trade is carried on across the interior by means of caravans.

Population, about 3,000,000, of which upwards of 250,000 are Europeans; among them about 10,000 emigrants from Alsace and Lorraine, who left their homes after the forcible annexation of the provinces by Germany.

History.—This country embraces the ancient Numidia, the kingdoms of Massinissa, Syphax, and Jugurtha; the Mauritanian kingdom of Bocchus and Juba; and it has been successively conquered by the Romans, the Vandals, the Byzantine Greeks, and the Arabs, who, in the beginning of the 8th century, invaded North Africa, and established Islamism. Algeria was annexed to France in 1842. (See ABD-EL-KADER.)

ALGHERO, an Italian seaport in the Sardinian province of Sassari, standing on a large bay formed by capes Caccia and Marargin. Its streets are narrow, but clean and well paved. It is an episcopal see, and has a cathedral, erected in the 16th century. Many of the houses are very old. Near the town are some fine stalactite grottoes. Grain, wool, skins, anchovies, and tobacco are exported, Porte Conte, 9 miles to the N.W., being the port. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 40° 33′ 30″ N. Lon. 8° 19′ 15″ E.—This was the favourite retreat of Charles V. of Spain.

ALGIDUM, ăl'-je-dum, a town of Latium, near Tusculum, about 12 miles from Rome. There is a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood.

ALGIERS, ăl'-jeers, comes from the Arabic al Jezair, signifying 'the islands,' and is the capital of the French province of Algeria. It is built on the declivity of a mountain, in the form of an amphitheatre, next the harbour; and the houses appearing one above another of a resplendent whiteness, seem as if rising in successive layers of snow, and present a dazzling picture from the sea. There are two towns, the old and the new. The old town occupies the higher portion; the housetops are flat, and the inhabitants walk upon them in the evening to take the air: they are also covered with earth, and serve as small gardens. The streets are narrow, and there are several mosques, which exhibit nothing remarkable in their architecture, whilst the palace of the Dey, the Turkish for "uncle," was neither spacious nor extensive. The new town is on the lower part of the slope, and along the shore. The streets are wide and regular and the houses in the European style. The Place du Gouvernement is a large handsome square with a fountain, and planted with lime and orange trees. The town is surrounded by walls, and there are powerful seaward batteries. Among the principal buildings are a cathedral, several churches, synagogues, and mosques. Beyond the walls are two handsome suburbs. The Bab-Azzoun, the Bab-el-Oued, the Rue de la Marine, and the Boulevard de l'Impératrice, are fine streets. There is a public garden, the Jardin Marengo. The harbour was small, shallow, and insecure, and its entrance incommoded with numerous rocks; but the French have enlarged it so much that it is capable of containing 300 vessels of commerce and 30 ships of war. There are two docks, which can receive the largest vessels. The mole of the harbour extends from the continent to a small island, where there is a castle with a large battery of guns. The city is well supplied with markets. The salubrity of the climate has recently made Algiers a favourite winter residence for invalids.

Population.—About 70,000, of whom the half are Musulmans and Jews.

ALGOA BAY, ăl-go-a, an inlet about 20 miles broad, and about 500 miles E. of Cape Town, South Africa, and the principal bay on the S.E. coast of the colony. There are lighthouses on Cape Recife, on the western side of the bay, and on one of a group of islands in the bay. One of these islands, St. Croix, was the first land discovered by Bernal Diaz, when he rounded the Cape in 1486. PORT ELIZABETH is in the south-western angle of the bay. Lat. 33° 56′ S. Lon. 26° 53′ E.

ALGOOR, ăl′-goor, a place in Chinese Tartary, where the Russian count Mouravieff, in 1858, determined, with the representatives of the emperor of China, the frontier territory which divides the two empires, Russia and China, in this direction. (See AMOOR.)

ALHAMA, a city of Spain, in the province of Granada. It is very picturesquely situated, the streets rising on terraces. There are hot mineral springs in the neighbourhood, from the Arabic word for which the name of the city is derived. It was a place of great importance when the Moors were masters of Granada, and Moorish remains are numerous. Pop. about 7,000.

ALHAMA, a town in Spain, province of Murcia, famous for sulphur springs. Pop. about 6,500.

ALHAMBRA, al-ham′-bra, a town of Spain, in Aragon, 7 miles S. of Teruel.—There are several other small towns in Spain of this name, but none of them has a population above 1,000.

ALHAMBRA, the name assigned to the vestiges of a fortress, and palace, erected and occupied by the Mahometan sultans or kings of Granada, in Spain. They crown the summit of a lofty hill which overlooks the city of Granada, and which is cut off from another hill called the Cerro del Sol, on which stands the summer residence designated the Generalife. When in its perfect state, the interior of the Alhambra was deemed the most superb specimen of Moorish architecture and fanciful adornment that has ever existed, and the ruins may now be regarded as the most picturesque in Europe. The Alhambra was erected between 1248 and 1354; the name, an Arabic word meaning "the red," comes from the colour of the bricks used in the construction of the outer walls. The building was much damaged by an earthquake in 1821.

ALHANDRA, al-yan′-dra, a town in Estremadura, Portugal, on the Tagus, 15 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 2,000.—Another in Brazil, S. America, 15 miles from Paranahyba.

ALHAURIN EL GRANDE, ăl-grand-ai al-yaw′-reen, a town in the province of Granada, Spain, 22 miles from Malaga. Pop. 5,600.

AL-HAZEN, Arabic mathematician, famous for important discoveries in optics.
Born at Bassora: died at Cairo, 1038.

ALHUCEMAS, al-yoo-thaï′-mass, a small island and fortress belonging to Spain, off the coast of Morocco, in the Mediterranean. There is a town upon it, consisting of about thirty houses. Lat. 35° 15′ N. Lon. 4° 12′ E.

ALI, a′-le, an ancient town of Sicily, with sulphur-baths, 15 miles from Messina. Pop. 1,500.

ALI, the cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, whom he was to have succeeded; but being successfully opposed by Omar and Othman, he raised a sect of his own, and gained many followers. On the death of Othman he was declared caliph in 655, but was assassinated six years afterwards.—The dispute respecting his right to succeed Mahomet originated the great sects of the Sunnis and Shiahs which still divide the followers of Mahomet. The Turks belong to the former sect; the Persians to the latter. Ali was a man of considerable ability, and a collection of proverbs, verses, &c, attributed to him is extant, and has been translated into English.

ALIA, a′-le-a, a town in New Castile, Spain, 18 miles from Logrossan. Pop. 3,500.

ALI-ABAD, a′-le-a′-bad, a town of Persia, 85 miles from Kushan. It contains 500 houses. There is a residence built by Shah-Abbas in the neighbourhood.—There are several other towns and villages in Asia of this name.

ALI BEY, a′-le-beg (BOBROWSKI), a Pole, who became first dragoman or interpreter to the grand seignior of Turkey. He was taken prisoner by the Tartars when a child, and sold to the Turks, and was brought up in the Mahometan faith.—He understood English, and translated the catechism of the church of England, and all the Bible, into the Turkish language. His greatest work is a book on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, &c., translated into Latin by Dr. Smith.
Died 1675.

ALI BEY, a′-le-ba or bai, an adventurer, supposed to have been a native of the Caucasus, who when young was taken by robbers and conveyed to Cairo, where he was bought by Ibrahim, a lieutenant of the janissaries, who entered him among the Mamelukes. For his gallantry against the Arabs he was created a bey. In 1758 his patron was murdered by a party headed by a person also called Ibrahim, a Circassian. In 1763 Ali attained the dignity of sheikecbalad, which was the first in the republic, and soon after slew Ibrahim, to revenge the murder of his patron. This raised against him numerous enemies, who obliged him to fly to Acre, where he was protected by the sheik Daher. In 1766 he was recalled by the people, and, after revenging himself upon his enemies, he declared war against the Arabs, and by the success of his achievements encircled his name with renown. Having now risen to be the head of the government, Egypt under his rule began to revive; agriculture flourished, and the country seemed to bid fair to recover its former splendour. In 1768 war broke out between Russia and Turkey, and Ali sent 12,000 men to serve in the Ottoman army. His enemies reported at Constantinople that these troops were designed to assist the Russians; in consequence of which a capigi, and four attendants, were sent to take off his head. Ali being informed of this, seized these messengers of death and handed them over to the fate they designed for himself. He then declared war against the Porte, and for a time preserved his independence, and obtained several advantages. At last his principal commanders revolted with their troops, and in a battle which took place between Ali and the forces of one of his chief Mamelukes, he was taken prisoner, and died of his wounds.—The object of Ali was to re-establish the independence of Egypt and to re-suscitate some of the greatness of its long-gone grandeur.

Born 1728; died 1773.

ALI MUSJID, a'-le moos'-jid, a fort 2 miles from the eastern entrance of the celebrated Khyber pass, which during the Afghan war frequently changed hands.

ALI PASHA, a'-le pa-shaw', or pa'-sha, an Albanian chief, hereditary Bey of Tepelini, who in his fourteenth year was encouraged to recover the territories of which his father had been despoiled by neighbouring chiefs, by his mother, from whom he seems to have inherited the ferocity by which he was actuated in many of his deeds in winning his way to wealth and power. Born amongst a community of robbers, his early life was passed amid scenes of continual vicissitudes and the most daring and dangerous adventure; but whilst he was distinguishing himself by his bravery, he was, at the same time, accumulating riches and gathering power. He entered Tepelini in triumph, and his first act was to murder his brother; he then imprisoned his mother, and she soon afterwards died. At length he was enabled, by intriguing at Constantinople, to obtain the secret commission which enabled him to execute the firman of death against Selim, pasha of Delvino. He was then appointed lieutenant to the new Derwend pasha of Roumili, in which his conduct was marked by great rapacity, even among the Kleptis, or robbers, with whom he was leagued in spoliating all that came within his reach. The country now swarmed with marauders. His power grew with his increasing riches; but the Porte was dissatisfied, and the Derwend pasha was recalled and decapitated. Ali, although summoned to the capital, was too wary to be caught. He bribed the divan, remained where he was, and avoided the loss of his head. Ali soon afterwards managed to make his peace with the Porte, and successively became pasha of Tricali, in Thessaly, then Derwend pasha of Roumili, when he, from being a robber himself, raised a body of 4,000 Albanians, and gained additional favour with the Porte by clearing the country of the depredators by which it was infested. He next took Jannina, the capital of southern Albania, or Epirus, usurped its pashalic, got himself confirmed in it, and began vigorously to extend his territories. These finally embraced all Epirus, and extended into Acarnania and Ætolia, or Western Greece. He attacked and defeated the Suliotes, and exercised upon them the most dreadful vengeance for the bravery with which they had resisted his efforts to conquer them. He reduced many of the towns on the Gulf of Arta and the coast of the Adriatic; penetrated, on the north, Albania proper; intrigued for and obtained the pashalic of Berat; seized the government of Ochrida, in Upper Albania; attacked, by order of the Porte, the pasha of Scutari, or Skodra; defeated and then appropriated his territories. At all these daring acts the Porte was compelled to connive, and Ali was even appointed inspector of the principal division of the empire, with a residence at Monaster, and an army of 24,000 men. He subsequently became a vizier, and pasha with three tails, but by his intriguing and treacherous disposition he finally roused the ire of the sultan, who had him excommunicated, and commanded all the pashas of European Turkey to march against him. Ali was compelled to abandon his stronghold in Jannina, and on a promise of pardon surrendered himself to the Porte. The treachery by which so many of the deeds of his own life had been distinguished now fell upon himself. He was betrayed and murdered. His head was transported to Constantinople, where, upon the gate of the seraglio, it was stuck and exhibited to the gaze of the populace.—Ali had three sons, who shared his fate. Lord Byron, in the second canto of "Childe Harold," describes a visit paid to him. He ruled his own province with wisdom and moderation, and greatly improved the condition of the people; but he was relentlessly cruel in gratifying his revenge. At Gardiki, he murdered more than 700 male descendants of people who forty years before had insulted his family.

Born at Tepelini, 1741; died 1822.

ALICANTE, a-le-kan'-tai, a province of Spain, formed in 1834 of districts taken from the ancient provinces of Valencia and Murcia. Ext. 73 miles long and 68 broad. Area, 2,090 square miles. Desc. Rugged and barren in the north, but level and fertile in the south. Pro. Wheat, maize, barley, rye, sugar, hemp, flax, oranges, grapes, and other fruits. Minerals. Lead, iron, copper, and coal. There are about 20 lead and copper mines. Exp. Chiefly fruits, wine, and agricultural produce. Manf. Fine cloths, silk, cotton, woollen and linen fabrics, lace, paper, leather, and earthenware. There are numerous oil mills and brandy distilleries. Pop. about 440,000.

ALICANTE, (the Lucentum of the ancients), a maritime town of Spain, the capital of the province of the same name, standing on a sort of peninsula, in a bay of the Mediterranean, and at the bottom of a rocky mountain, on the summit of which is a castle. There are a cathedral and an episcopal palace, and a public library. The town is a place of considerable trade, especially in fruit, esparto, oil, and wine, and ranks as the third seaport in Spain. The harbour, protected by batteries, is at some distance from the town, and is one of the best in Valencia. Pop. about 32,000. Lat. 38° 20′ N. Lon. 0° 30′ W. The town is the terminus of the Madrid and Alicante Railway, 282 miles long. It was besieged by the Moors in 1331, and by the French in 1709.

ALICATA, a-le-ka'-ta, a fortified town on the south coast of Sicily, 30 miles from Girgenti, one of the important towns in Sicily. It is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Phintus, and there are extensive ruins in the vicinity. Pop. 16,000. —This place has a considerable trade in soda, sulphur, maccaroni, almonds, pistaccio nuts, and grain.

ALICE, al'-is, a town in a fertile district of the division of Victoria, E., Cape Colony, 40 miles from Graham's Town. Lat. 30° 48′ S. Lon. 26° 52′ E.

ALICUDI. (See LIPARI ISLANDS.)

ALIENUS CÆCINA, ai-le-é'-nus se-si'-na, a quæstor in Bœotia, appointed by Galba to the command of a legion in Germany. The emperor disgraced him for his bad conduct, and he then raised commotions in the empire, about the middle of the 1st century.

ALIFE, a-le'-fai, a Neapolitan town, 16 miles from Capua, remarkable for its salubrity; the ancient Alifa. Pop. 1,700.

ALIGARH, a district of British India, in the Meerut division. It occupies nearly a level plain between the Ganges and Jumna. Another river, the Kali Nadi, flows through the district. Area, 1,954 square miles. Pop., in 1872, 1,021,187. The principal town is Koel.

ALIMENTUS, al'-i-men'-tus, an historian of the second Punic war, who wrote in Greek an ac-sount of Hannibal, besides a treatise on military matters.

ALIPEE, al'-e-pe, a seaport of Hindostan, state of Travancore. Exp. Pepper, grain, and timber. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 9° 30′ N. Lon. 76° 24′ E.

ALIPHERIA, ăl-i-fer'-e-a, a town of Arcadia, situate on a lofty hill, about 8 miles S. of Heræa. The strength of its position made it valuable to the Eleans, who took possession of it when the inhabitants removed to Megalopolis, on the foundation of that city. It was, however, taken from them during the Social war, by Philip, king of Macedon.

ALIRROTHIUS, ăl-ir-ro'-the-us, a son of Neptune. Hearing that his father had been vanquished by Minerva, in their dispute about giving a name to Athens, he went to the citadel, and attempted to cut down the olive which had sprung from the ground and given the victory to Minerva; but he missed his aim in the stroke, and cut his own legs so severely than he instantly died.

ALISON, ARCHIBALD, ăl'-e-son, a clergyman, whose father was a magistrate of the city of Edinburgh, and educated him for the church. After receiving several preferments in England he finally became the senior clergyman of the episcopal chapel in the Cowgate of Edinburgh, the congregation of which subsequently removed to a new Gothic structure which they erected in York Place, where Mr. Alison continued to officiate, until increasing infirmity compelled him to relinquish his public duties. He is best known by his "Essays on Taste," which attained no great degree of popularity till the appearance of a second edition, when an elegant and able critique from the late Lord Jeffrey, in the "Edinburgh Review," brought them prominently into notice. They then enjoyed a brief popularity, but are now little read.

Born at Edinburgh, 1757; died at Colinton, near Edinburgh, 1839.

ALISON, SIR ARCHIBALD, BART., son of the above, was born in Shropshire, while his father officiated as vicar of Kenley, in that county. He studied at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1814 was called to the Scottish bar as an advocate. His literary predilections stimulated him to become a contributor to periodical publications; and although his first appearance in the world of letters was as a writer on the criminal law of Scotland, he achieved little notoriety until the appearance of his "History of Europe from the Commencement of the French Revolution in 1789 to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815," the first volume of which was published in 1839. This work has been continued until it has become one of the most voluminous productions of modern times; and although it has a strong party bias towards Conservative principles, still the comprehensive grasp which it shows, and the evident endeavour to preserve, as far as possible, views of impartiality, coupled with the fervour and animation which it displays in recounting many of the stirring scenes of the Revolution, have procured for it a high degree of popular favour. It has been translated into most of the European, and into some of the Eastern languages. A continuation of the history, including the period from 1815 to 1852, was published in 1856. In 1828 Mr. Alison was appointed sheriff of the shire of Lanark, and on the formation of the Derby ministry in 1852, was created a baronet. In 1845 he was chosen rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1851 he was elected lord-rector of the University of Glasgow, and in the following year had conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. by the Oxford University. Besides his "History," Sir Archibald wrote, in two volumes, a "Life of Marlborough," "Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous Essays," which originally appeared in "Blackwood's Magazine," "Lives of Lord Castlereagh and Sir C. Stewart," and "Principles of Population."

Born at Kenley, 1792; died at Glasgow, 1867.

ALIWAL, a'-le-wal, a village of Upper India, standing on the banks of the Sutlej, 20 miles from Loodiana. It was formerly a place of no note, but is now celebrated as being the scene of a battle, fought on January 28th, 1846, between the British, under Sir Harry Smith, and the Sikhs, commanded by Runjeet Sing. The British army consisted of 10,000 men and 32 guns; the Sikhs of 19,000 and 68 guns. They were defeated with a loss of nearly 6,000 men and the whole of their artillery.

ALIWAL, NORTH, a division of Cape Colony, South Africa, including the country between the Stormberg range and the Orange River. The country lies high, and is cold in winter. Area, 4,450 square miles. Pop. 22,000.—The chief town, on the Orange River, of the same name as the division, is 666 miles N. E. of Cape Town.

ALIWAL, SOUTH, a division of Cape Colony, including the country in the neighbourhood of Mossel Bay. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 4,300. The chief town is Mossel Bay, 270 miles E. of Cape Town, and the seat of a considerable trade.

ALJUBARROTA, al'-shoo-bar-o'-ta, a market-town of Portuguese Estremadura, 15 miles S. of Leiria. Pop. 1,600.—In the vicinity Alphonso I. defeated the Moors in 1139, and on the same field John I. of Portugal, surnamed the Great, gained a signal victory over John I., king of Castile, August 14, 1385, 12,000 Castilians being slain. The battle is known as that of Campo de Ourique, and is described by Camoens in the fourth canto of his "Lusiad." The anniversary of the day on which it was won is still celebrated by the Portuguese. (See ALPHONSO I.)

ALJUSTREL, al-shoos-trail, a small town of Portugal, in Alentejo, 77 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 1,700.

AL-KAISSERIA, al-kai-ser'-e-a, a town in the northern part of Morocco, not far from Al-kasar. It is rapidly falling into decay, although it still possesses some remains of having been a flourishing place. It trades principally in salt, obtained from the neighbouring hills. Pop. 8,000.

AL-KINDE, ABU YUSUF, Arabian philosopher. Is said to have written more than 200 separate works relating to all the sciences then known, but only some treatises on medicine and astrology remain. He was one of the earliest translators of Aristotle, whose philosophy he to a great extent adopted. Lived in the 10th century.

ALKMAAR. (See ALCKMAAR.)

ALKMAAR, HEINRIK VON, fon alk-mar, a German poet, who translated the celebrated satire called the "Fable of Reynard the Fox," which has been popularised in several languages. Flourished in the 15th century.

AL-KOSH, or EL-KOSH, al-kosh, the supposed birth-place and burial-place of the prophet Nahum, is a small Asiatic market-town on the river Tigris, 30 miles from Mosul. Pop. about 3,000.

ALLAHABAD, al-la-ha-bad', a division of the N.W. provinces of India. It comprises the six districts of Allahabad, Cawnpoor, Fathipoor, Hamirpoor, Banda, and Jaunpoor. Being watered by the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Goomtee, it is one of the most productive parts of India. Pro. Opium, sugar, indigo, cotton, grain, and fruit. Saltpetre and diamonds are found. Manf. The natives make a coarse kind of cotton cloth. Pop. about 5,800,000.

ALLAHABAD, a fertile district of the above province, producing large quantities of opium, cotton, and indigo. Rice is the principal crop; but wheat, tobacco, opium, and especially indigo, are also grown in large quantities. Stone-cutting is an important branch of industry. The principal towns are Allahabad, Manaima, and Chizwa. Pop. 1,474,106. nearly all Hindoos. Area, about 2,800 square miles.

ALLAHABAD ("the city of God"), an ancient city, and capital of the above division, and also of the North-Western provinces, situate at the junction of the Ganges and Jumna, and considered by the Brahmins as the most sacred site of all the confluences of the rivers in Hindostan. It is 53 miles from Benares, and 550 from Calcutta. At two miles distance stands the celebrated fortress of Allahabad, founded by the emperor Akbar, in the year 1583. The town is one of the most esteemed places of Hindoo worship and ablution, to which, every summer, multitudes of pilgrims resort from all parts of India. As many as 200,000 of them have been known to bathe themselves in the holy waters of this spot in the course of a single year. An annual fair is held on the occasion of the great bathing festival. The most noteworthy buildings are the Great Mosque and the Sultan Khossor's Caravanserai. The town, which is rapidly rising into great commercial importance, is the junction of the great railway system, which unites Bengal with Central India and Bombay. Pop. 148,547.—The town was taken by the British in 1765 from the Nabob of Oude, to whom it was restored in 1771, but ceded by him to the British in 1807. Lat. 25° 26′ N. Lon. 81° 55′ E.

ALLAH-SHEHR, or ALA-SHEHR, al'-a-sher, the 'city of God,' a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, standing on three or four hills, and exhibiting the remains of a wall. It is of considerable extent, but the houses are in general mean and dirty. It is situate on one of the principal roads to Smyrna, whither a caravan goes and returns regularly, and is greatly frequented by Armenian merchants. The coffee-houses and baths are much resorted to. Pop. 15,000. This city is the ancient Philadelphia, and was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. It stands about 80 miles to the E. of Smyrna.

ALLAMAND, JEAN NICOLAS SEBASTIAN, natural philosopher, professor of philosophy and natural history at Leyden for 38 years. He was the first to explain the phenomena of the Leyden jar, made a splendid collection of botanical and other natural history specimens, and translated Buffon's works. Member of the Royal Society of London and the Academy of Sciences at Haarlem.

Born at Lausanne, 1713; died at Leyden, 1787.

ALLAN, al'-lan, a river of Scotland, noted for the beauty of the scenery through which it flows for 18 miles, when it falls into the Frith of Forth, 2 miles from Stirling.

ALLAN, BRIDGE OF, a village of Scotland, situate on the above river, in Perthshire. It has become celebrated for a mineral spring in its neighbourhood, to which many resort. There are several hotels. Pop. 3,055.—A station on the North British and Caledonian Railway.

ALLAN, al'-long, a parish and village in France, in the Department of Drôme, celebrated for the excellence of its wine. Pop. 1,000.—Mulberry trees were here first planted in France.

ALLAN, DAVID, the son of a Scottish shoremaster in Alloa, has been called the "Scottish Hogarth," although far inferior to the distinguished Englishman in the paths of humorous and eccentric delineations of human characteristics. His genius was first remarked from his rude chalk-drawings upon the floor, whilst confined to the house from a burnt foot. The immediate cause, however of his being put to study for a painter arose from a caricature which he made of his schoolmaster inflicting punishment upon a boy. Whilst the ludicrous turn given to this sketch brought upon him his expulsion from school, it secured the countenance of a Mr. Stuart, the collector of the customs at Alloa, who had him sent to the academy of Messrs. Andrew and Robert Foulis, at Glasgow, to be educated for a painter. After spending nine years at this academy, he was patronized by Lord Cathcart, who introduced him to Erskine of Mar, who generously sent him to Rome to prosecute his studies. Here a painting of the Corinthian Maid who executed a profile of her lover's countenance round the shadow thrown by a lamp upon the wall, procured him a golden medal in the academy of St. Luke, and a proportionate amount of reputation. He was appointed director of the Academy of Arts at Edinburgh in 1786. He subsequently painted those humorous subjects by which he obtained considerable fame, and which, although deficient in sensibility, are yet replete with broad rustic fun. The most popular designs of Allan are his twelve illustrations of Ramsay's far-famed Scottish pastoral, "The Gentle Shepherd."

Born at Alloa, 1744; died at Edinburgh, 1796.

ALLAN, SIR WILLIAM, a distinguished Scottish artist, who, after passing through the High School of Edinburgh, was put to be a coach-painter, but who discovered so great a desire to improve in his art, that he was entered as a pupil in the Trustees' Academy, where he had Wilkie for a fellow-student and companion. After a certain period he became a student of the Royal Academy of London, but failing in attracting the notice to which he thought himself entitled, he set out for St. Petersburg, where he passed ten years, with the exception of the time necessary at various periods to visit Tartary, Turkey, the shores of the Black Sea, &c., where he enriched his portfolio with numerous objects and scenes of curious interest. On his return to Scotland in 1814, he publicly exhibited the fruits of his travels and labours; and for a large picture of "Circassian Captives," he received 1,000 guineas, which was subscribed for by a hundred gentlemen, at ten guineas each, and at the suggestion of Sir Walter Scott. This picture is now in the possession of the earl of Wemyss. Soon after this period he turned his attention to the production of native historical subjects, and the "Murder of Archbishop Sharpe," "Knox admonishing Mary, Queen of Scots," the "Parting of Prince Charles Stuart and Flora McDonald," and the "Murder of the Regent Murray," were the result. A disease having affected his eyes, he suspended his studies, and visited Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy. On returning, he produced his "Slave-market at Constantinople," which tended to enhance his reputation. Subsequently he produced the companion pictures of "Scott in his Study, Writing," and "Scott in his Study, Reading," both of which are well known. His most important pictures, however, are the "Battle of Waterloo," which Wellington approved and bought, the "Battle of Preston Pans," "Nelson boarding the San Nicolas," and the "Battle of Bannockburn," a large picture, upon which he was working when overtaken by death. In 1835 Allan became a member of the Royal Academy, and in 1838 was elected President of the Scottish Academy. On the death of Wilkie he received the appointment of her Majesty's limner for Scotland, and in 1842 was knighted. He is considered by his countrymen to stand at the head of Scottish art.

Born in Edinburgh, 1782; died 1850.

ALLATIUS, LEO, ăl-aī'-she-us, a Greek, educated first in Calabria, and then at Rome, where he taught the belles-lettres. He was appointed keeper of the Vatican library by Alexander VII. His learning was extensive, and he founded a college in the island of Chios.

ALLESTRY, or ALLESTREE, RICHARD, ăl'-es-tre, a divine, who, in 1641, took up arms, with many other young men of the university of Oxford, in favour of Charles I. After serving some time in a military capacity, he returned to his studies, but afterwards again entered the army. At the end of the civil war he took orders, and in 1659 visited Charles II. in Flanders, and on his return was seized at Dover, but found means to secure his despatches. At the Restoration he was made canon of Christchurch, and served one of the lectureships of Oxford, the salary of which he gave to the poor. In 1660 he took the degree of D.D., became chaplain to the king, and regius professor of divinity. In 1665 he was appointed provost of Eton. He was buried in the chapel of Eton College, where there is a monument to his memory. He erected at his own expense the West side of the outward court of Eton College and the grammar school in Christ Church College.

Born at Uppington, Shropshire, 1619; died at Eton, 1681.

ALLEYN, EDWARD, ăl-ain, founder of Dulwich College, in Surrey, who acquired great reputation as an actor, and became proprietor of a playhouse in Moorfields, and keeper of the royal bear-garden. He was a man of fine presence and an admirable elocutionist, and was generally considered the best actor of his time. He laid the foundation of his college in 1614, and completed it in 1617, at the expense of £10,000; he then endowed it with £300 per annum for the maintenance of one master and one warden (who must be unmarried, and always of the name of Alleyn or Allen), and four fellows, of whom three must be clergymen, and the fourth an organist; besides six poor men and six women, with twelve boys, who are to be educated till the age of fourteen or sixteen, when they are to be apprenticed to some trade. This building is called "The College of God's Gift." The value of the estate has enormously increased, and in 1857 an Act of Parliament reconstituted the college. Very extensive school buildings were opened by the Prince of Wales in 1870.

Born in London, 1566; died at Dulwich, 1626, and was buried in the chapel of the college which he founded.

He lived in the early part of the present century.—Allingham's best known productions are "Fortune's Frolic," and "The Weathercock."

ALLIX, PIERRE, divine of the French Reformed Church. Came to London after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and opened a church for French exiles. He received the degree of doctor of divinity from both the English universities, and in 1690 was made treasurer and canon of Salisbury cathedral. His works are chiefly of a controversial character.

Born at Alençon, 1641; died in London, 1717.

ALLOA, ăl-o-a, a seaport town, in the parish of the same name, and the shire of Clackmannan, Scotland. It is situate on the north side of the Frith of Forth, six miles below Stirling. The town is irregularly built; but it has an excellent harbour, and adjoining it dry and wet docks capable of receiving the largest vessels. To the west of the dock there is a ferry across the river Forth, with good piers projecting down to low water-mark. There are extensive collieries and distilleries in the neighbourhood; glass-houses, where ordinary green glass bottles are made; iron-works and woollen and shawl manufactories. The malt liquors brewed here are in much repute, "Alloa ale" being celebrated all over the world. Ship-building is also carried on. The parish church, a Gothic edifice, with a spire 200 feet high, was built in 1819. There are several other places of worship, a corn exchange, and other public buildings. Pop. 9,362. Lat. 56° 7′ N. Lon. 3° 44′ W.—Above Alloa there is a dam of water called Gartmorn, which is perhaps the largest collection of artificial water in Scotland. In the vicinity is an ancient tower, supposed to have been built in the 14th century, and to have belonged to the former earls of Mar, where some of the Scottish princes were educated. This town is supposed to be on the site of the Allana of Ptolemy. A station on the North British and Caledonian Railways.

It contains an ancient church and two hospitals. Pop. 6,500. Lat. 40° 43′ N. Lon. 6° 52′ W.—In 1808, after the convention of Cintra, this place was surrendered by the French, and for some time afterwards it remained in possession of the British. On the night of August 27, 1810, however, it was again taken by the French, under Massena; but in May, 1811, was retaken by the duke of Wellington and restored to Portugal.

ALMEIDA, DON FRANCISCO D', a Portuguese gentleman, who in 1505 was appointed by King Emanuel the first viceroy of the Portuguese possessions in India. He took the city of Quiloa, and made many other important conquests. A fleet loaded with spices, and dispatched by him from the coast of Malabar, was the first to discover the island of Madagascar. While he was engaged in extending the conquests of the Portuguese, Albuquerque received orders from Portugal to supersede him; but Almeida, being about to proceed to Dabul with a fleet, refused to resign his command, and imprisoned the new viceroy. In his expedition against Dabul he sullied his reputation by his cruelty. Afterwards, falling in with the fleet of the enemy, he defeated it, and effected a peace. On his passage to Europe he was slain at Saldanha Bay, South Africa, in a skirmish with the natives.

Born at Lisbon about 1470; died 1510.

ALMELO, al'-me-lo, a town of Holland, in the province of Overyssel, 20 miles from Deventer. It is a busy town, with an industrious population, employed principally in the preparation of cotton and yarn goods. Pop. 3,000.

ALMENDRALEJO, al'-main-dra-laish'-o, a town of Spanish Estremadura, 28 miles from Badajos. Pop. 6,000, chiefly agricultural, although some weaving and distilling are carried on. In the neighbourhood a considerable number of horses, mules, goats, and sheep are raised.

ALMERIA, al-mai'-re-a, a rich maritime province in Spain, once a portion of the kingdom of Granada. Area, 3,300 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, but presenting many beautiful valleys, teeming with fruitage and agricultural produce. The principal rivers are the Almanzora, the Adra, and the Almeria. On the south coast is a fine bay, the Gulf of Almeria, 25 miles wide at the entrance, and 10 miles deep. Pro. Maize, sugar, grapes, and all the southern fruits in great abundance. It also depastures large herds of cattle. Minerals. Iron, copper, silver, lead, and antimony; salt, nitre, marble, and jasper. The silver and lead mines are very productive, and the famous Macael marble is quarried on the western part of the province. Pop. about 357,570, principally engaged in mining and agriculture.

ALMERIA, the capital of the above province, stands on the gulf, and at the mouth of a river, of the same name. It is mostly surrounded with walls, and is defended on the side next the sea by two forts; the streets are narrow, but there are several handsome squares. There are a cathedral and theological seminaries. The town was a stronghold, and the principal port of the Moors in Spain, and the remains of Moorish architecture are numerous. Exp. Principally barilla, lead, and esparto. Imp. Cotton and silk fabrics. Pop. about 28,000.

ALMERIA, GULF OF, between Point Elena on the W. and Cape Gata on the E. It runs 10 miles inland, and is 25 miles wide at its entrance. Lat. 36° 50′ N. Lon. 2° 32′ W.

ALMERIA, a town of Mexico, in the province of Vera Cruz. Lat. 20° 18′ N. Lon. 97° 30′ W.

ALMO, ăl'-mo, a small river near Rome, falling into the Tiber, in which the statue of Cybele was annually washed on the 25th of March. It is now called Acqua Santa.

ALMODOVAR DEL CAMPO, al-mo-do'-var dail kam'-po, a beautiful town, with a castle, in Spain, province of New Castile, 18 miles from Ciudad Real. The male inhabitants are principally employed in agricultural pursuits, and the female in the manufacture of stuffs, blonde, and other wearing apparel. Pop. 3,000.

ALMOGIA, al-mosh'-e-a, a town in Granada, Spain. Hardware, soap, wax, and woollen fabrics manufactured. Pop. 4,000.

ALMOHADES, al-mo'-ha-dees, the name of a Mussulman dynasty, which flourished in Africa and Spain during the 12th and 13th centuries. (See MOHAMMED-IBN-ABDALLAH.) It comes from the word mowahedun, signifying Unitarians. (See ABDOLMUMEM.)

ALMON, JOHN, ăl'-mon, a political writer, who was educated at Warrington, and served his apprenticeship to a bookseller. In 1758 he settled in London, where he wrote several works of a political character. On the death of George II. he wrote a review of his majesty's reign, which passed through two editions, and in 1761 published a review of Mr. Pitt's administration, which was also well received, and procured for him the friendship of Lord Temple. He was also the zealous friend of Mr. Wilkes, whom he defended against Kidgell. In 1765 he began business as a bookseller in Piccadilly. He still, however, continued to exercise his pen in politics. Not long afterwards he was tried, and found guilty, for publishing Junius's letter to the king; for which he was fined, and obliged to give security for his good behaviour for three years. In 1774 he began the "Parliamentary Register," which was the first periodical journal of the kind. On the death of Lord Chatham, he published anecdotes of the life of that great statesman, and after a considerable interval, published biographical, literary, and political anecdotes of several of the most eminent persons of the age. He lost his fortune by undertaking the management of the General Advertiser, in addition to which he was imprisoned and sentenced to outlawry. He partially recovered his position, and in 1804 he gave to the world the "Life of Wilkes," which was succeeded by a collection of the poetical works of the author of the "Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers," and afterwards by a valuable edition of "Junius's Letters," illustrated by numerous biographical and explanatory notes, and preceded by a critical inquiry respecting their real author.

Born at Liverpool, 1738; died at Boxmoor, 1805.

ALMON, the eldest of the sons of Tyrrhius. He was the first Rutulian whom the Trojans killed; and from the combats before and after his death, arose the feuds which terminated in the fall of Turnus.

ALMOND, or ALMON, two rivers of Scotland, one of which enters the Frith of Forth at Cramond, 5 miles N.W. of Edinburgh; the other, rising in the Grampian hills, enters the Frith of Tay. Neither is of great extent.

ALMONDBURY, or ALMONBURY, a'-mon-ber-e, a town and parish of England, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, situate on the river Calder, near Huddersfield. The town has a good church and a free grammar-school, founded by James I. Area of parish 28,092. Manf. Chiefly cloths for waistcoatings, shawls, fancy goods, and broad and narrow woollen fabrics. Pop. of the town, 13,977.—This place is supposed to be the Camboduunum of the Romans, and to have been the residence of some of the Saxon kings.

ALMONTE, al-mon'-tai, a town in Seville, a fertile district of Spain, 21 miles from Huelva. Pop. 4,000.

ALMORA, al-mo'-ra, the chief town in the British district of Kumaon, the north-western provinces of India, built on a ridge of the Himalayas, 5,337 feet above the level of the sea, 85 miles from Bareilly. There are an old citadel and a modern British fort. Lat. 29° 35′ N. Lon. 79° 42′ E. Pop. 6,000.—The neighbourhood of the town was the scene of the British victory which ended the war with Nepaul in 1815.

ALMORAVIDES, ăl'-mo-rav'-e-dees, a powerful Arabian tribe, who, in the 7th century, came from the country of Himyar, and settled in Syria in the time of Abu-bekr, the first caliph. (See ABUBEKR.)

ALMQVIST, KARL JONAS LUDWIG, Swedish author. Educated at the university of Stockholm, and after trying to establish an agricultural colony, devoted himself to literature, writing romances, poetry, philosophical, theological, and mathematical treatises, rapidly obtaining great reputation in almost every department of literature. In 1851, having committed forgery and murder, he fled to America, where, under an assumed name, he became secretary to president Abraham Lincoln, after whose death he returned to Europe, to avoid the consequences of his malpractices.

Born at Stockholm, 1793; died at Bremen, 1866.

ALMUNECAR, al-moo-nai'-kar, a seaport town of Spain, 33 miles from Granada. It trades in cotton, fruit, and sugar. Pop. 5,400.—The fortifications of this place were erected by the emperor Charles V., and were destroyed by the British in 1812.

ALMUNECAR, a seaport of Spain, in the province of Granada. The trade is chiefly in sugar and fruit. Pop. 2,500.

ALMUNIA, al-moo'-ne-a, a town of Spain, province of Aragon, on the banks of the Grio, 25 miles from Saragossa. Pop. 2,500.

ALNEY, ăl'-nai, a small island in the river Severn, near Gloucester. Here Edmund Ironside and Canute the Dane fought a duel in presence of their two armies, in order to decide who should possess the kingdom. Canute was wounded, and an agreement was then made that he should have the northern, and Edmund the southern part of the realm.

ALNWICK, or ALNEWICK, ăn'-ik, the county town of Northumberland, situate on a declivity near the river Alne. There is a spacious square, in which a market is held weekly, and there is a large town-hall. Besides the parish church, and a new and handsome district church, St. Paul's, there are chapels for Dissenters and Roman Catholics. A new corn exchange was opened in 1862; and a handsome new cemetery has been formed about a mile from the town.—Alnwick was formerly fortified, and vestiges of its walls and gates still remain. At the north entrance to the town stands Alnwick Castle, now an elegant mansion belonging to the duke of Northumberland, supposed to have been a stronghold in the time of the Romans. In the grounds are the remains of two abbeys. Pop. 6,218.—There is a cross, called Malcolm's Cross, erected on the spot where Malcolm III. of Scotland is said to have received a mortal wound from a soldier, who came to offer to surrender to him the keys of the castle on the point of a spear. A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

ALOA, ă-lo'-a, festivals at Athens in honour of Bacchus and Ceres. The oblations were the fruits of the earth. Ceres has been called, from this, Aloas and Aloïs.

ALOADIN, a-lo'-a-din, a Mahometan sheik, better known by the appellation of the Old Man of the Mountain, was prince of the Arsacides, or Assassins. His residence was a castle between Antioch and Damascus, and he had a number of youthful followers, so devoted to his will as to engage in any of his attempts to assassinate the monarchs and princes with whom he was at enmity. Lived in the 13th century.

ALOEUS, ă-lo-ē'-us, a giant, son of Titan and Terra, married to Iphimedia, by whom Neptune had two sons, Othus and Ephialtus. Aloeus educated them as his own, and from that circumstance they have been called Aloides. They grew nine inches every month, and were only nine years old when they undertook a war against the gods, and were killed by Apollo and Diana. They built the town of Ascra, at the foot of Mount Helicon.

ALOMPRA, a-lom'-pra, a powerful chief, who, from being the head of a petty Asiatic village, became, by conquest and barbarity, the founder of the reigning dynasty of Burmah. He was a man of remarkable energy and ability, and made himself one of the most powerful monarchs of the East.
Born 1711; died, near Martaban, 1760.

ALOPE, ăl'-o-pe, daughter of Cercyon, king of Eleusis. She had a child by Neptune, whom she exposed in the woods, covered with a piece of her dress. The child was preserved, and carried to her father, who, knowing the garment, ordered his daughter to be put to death. Neptune, who could not save his mistress, changed her into a fountain. The child, called Hippothoon, was preserved by shepherds, and placed by Theseus on his grandfather's throne.—A town of Thessaly.—Another of Locris, in Greece.

ALOPECE, ă-lop'-e-se, an island in the Palus Mæotis.—Another in the Cimmerian Bosphorus.—Another in the Ægean Sea, opposite Smyrna.

ALOPECES, a-lop'-e-sees, a small village of Attica, where was the tomb of Anchimolius, whom the Spartans sent to deliver Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. It was the native place of Socrates and Aristides.

ALOPECONNESUS, ă-lop'-e-kon-ē'-sus, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus, taken by Philip, king of Macedon, towards the commencement of his wars with the Romans.

ALOPIUS, ă-lo'-pe-us, a son of Hercules and Antiope.

ALORA, a-lo'-ra, a town in Andalusia, Spain, remarkable for the ruins of an ancient castle. It is 20 miles from Malaga. Pop. about 7,000.

ALOS, or HALOS, ai'-los, a town of Phthiotis, in Thessaly, on the river Amphrysus. It contained a temple sacred to Jupiter Laphystius.

ALOST, or AALST, a'-lost, a town of Belgium, on the Dender, 15 miles from Brussels. The church of Martin (containing some of Rubens's finest pictures) and the Town Hall, dating from the early part of the 13th century, are the chief public buildings. Manf. Linen, lace, and cotton; and it has iron factories. Pop. 22,143. It was the capital of imperial Flanders, and was taken and dismantled in 1667 by Marshal Turenne, but abandoned after the battle of Ramilies in 1706. It is a station on the Brussels and Ostend Railway.

ALP ARSLAN, or AXAN, alp ars'-lan, second sultan of the dynasty of Seljuk, in Persia, succeeded his uncle Togrul Beg in 1063. He defeated Romanus Diogenes, emperor of the Greeks, in 1068. He invaded Turkestan, but was stabbed by Yussuf Rothual, the governor of a fort on the Oxus, whom he had taken prisoner and sentenced to death.
Born 1029; died 1072.

ALPES, the name of three departments in the south of France. (See BASSES ALPES, HAUTES ALPES, and ALPES MARITIMES.)

ALPES MARITIMES, a department in the south of France, formed in 1860 from the territory of Nice, ceded to France, together with Mentone and Roccabruna, purchased from the prince of Monaco. The surface of the country is mountainous. The mildness of the climate makes that part on the shore of the Mediterranean a favourite resort for invalids. The chief towns are NICE, MENTONE, Villafranche, Cannes, Grasse, Antibes, and Puget Theniers. The department is divided into 3 arrondissements, 25 cantons, and 156 communes. Area, 1,517 square miles. Manf. Dried fruits, olive oil, silk, soap, and paper. A considerable trade is done also in sardines and anchovies. Pop. 226,621.

ALPHEGE, ST., archbishop of Canterbury, 1006; captured by the Danes 1011; martyred 1012.

ALPHEIA, ăl-fe-ī'-a, a surname of Diana in Elis. Also a surname of the nymph Arethusa, because loved by the river Alpheus.

ALPHEN, al'-pen, a town of Holland, on the Rhine, 7 miles from Leyden. Manf. Principally linens. Pop. 3,000.

ALPHEN, DANIEL VAN, professor of jurisprudence in the university of Leyden. In addition to legal treatises, he wrote a history and description of the city of Leyden.
Born 1713; died 1797.

ALPHEN, HIERONYMUS SIMONS VAN, Protestant theologian, professor of theology at the university of Utrecht for 27 years. He was a scholar of great attainments, and author of many theological works in Latin.
Born at Neuhanau, Hesse Cassel, 1665; died 1742.

ALPHEN, HIERONYMUS VAN, theologian, son of the preceding. Wrote several learned works.
Born 1700; died at Amsterdam, 1758.

ALPHEN, HIERONYMUS VAN, poet, son of the preceding. Held some important political positions. Gave great attention to German literature, from which he made many translations.
Born at Gouda, 1746; died at the Hague, 1803.

ALPHERY, NICEPHORUS, al-fer'-e, a Russian prince, who, when that country was rent in pieces by civil dissensions, at the end of the 16th century, was sent with two of his brothers to England, to the care of a Russian merchant, by whom they were placed in the university of Oxford, where two of them died of the small-pox. Nicephorus entered into orders, and in 1618 obtained the rectory of Warley, in Huntingdonshire, whence he was ejected in the civil war, and cruelly treated by the republican party. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his living; but, being old and infirm, he committed the care of it to a curate, and retired to Hammersmith, where he died. Lived in the 17th century.

ALPHESIBŒA, ăl-fe-si-bē'-a, daughter of the river Phlegeus, married Alcmæon, son of Amphiaraus, who had fled to her father's court after the murder of his mother. (See ALCMÆON.)

ALPHEUS, ăl-fē'-us, a famous river of Peloponnesus, now called Morea, rising in Arcadia, and, after passing through Elis and Achaia, falling into the Ionian Sea. In some parts the course is subterranean. The god of this river fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, and pursued her till she was changed into a fountain by Diana.

ALPHIUS, AVITUS, ăl'-fe-us, a Roman poet, who wrote the lives of eminent persons, and the history of the Carthaginian war, in verse. Flourished in the 3rd century.

ALPHONSO, or ALFONSO, the name of monarchs of Portugal, Spain and Naples, mentioned below.

PORTUGAL.

ALPHONSO I., ăl-fon'-so, was the son of Henry, count of Portugal, by Teresa, daughter of Alphonso, king of Leon and Castile. When he came of age he made Portugal independent of the crown of Leon, defeating the forces of his mother and taking her prisoner, and of Alphonso of Castile. In 1139, his territories being invaded by the Moors, he attacked them with greatly inferior numbers, and obtained a signal victory on the plains of Ourique. This event caused the government to be changed into a monarchy, and he was proclaimed king on the field of battle. In 1167 he was taken prisoner in a battle with the Spaniards, and was compelled to surrender a considerable amount of territory. He was a man of gigantic stature.

Born at Guimaraens, 1094; died at Coimbra, 1185.

ALPHONSO II., "the Fat," passed his reign in comparative peace, save in disputing with the Church respecting its enormous revenue, for which he was excommunicated by Pope Honorius III. Succeeded his father, 1211.

Born 1185; died 1223.

ALPHONSO III., son of the preceding, was engaged in a war with the Moors, from whom he made a few conquests.

Born 1210; died 1279.

ALPHONSO IV. succeeded his father Denis in 1325. He obtained some successes over the Moors and Castilians, and was in some respects a liberal and enlightened ruler; but is for ever infamous for consenting to the murder of his son's wife, the unfortunate Inez de Castro.

Born 1290; died 1357.

ALPHONSO V., "the African," succeeded his father Edward when he was but six years old. He invaded Africa several times, and took Alcazar, Seguer, and Tangier.—He was a beneficent prince, and an encourager of learning. In his latter days he gave way to a deep melancholy and retired to a monastery.

Born 1432; died at Cintra, 1481.

ALPHONSO VI., the second king of the house of Braganza. His vices were so great, that he was compelled to abdicate the throne in 1667, after a reign of eleven years, and he was banished to the island of Terceira.

Born 1643; died at Cintra, 1675.

ASTURIAS, LEON, AND CASTILE.

ALPHONSO I., chosen king of the Asturias in 739, extended his dominions over nearly the fourth part of Spain, and took Leon, Galicia, and Castile from the Moors. His zeal for the Church gained him the same of "the Catholic."

Born 693; die. at Cangas, 757.

ALPHONSO II., surnamed the Chaste, was continually engaged either in suppressing insurrections among his subjects, or fighting against the Moors. He was twice dethroned and twice restored.

Born 758; died at Oviedo, 843.

ALPHONSO III., THE GREAT, ascended the throne in 866. He was successful in his wars with the Moors, but in the decline of life his peace was disturbed by insurrections. In 908 he resigned his crown to his son Garcias, who engaging, soon after, in a war with the Moors, Alphonso headed the army, and obtained a great victory.—He wrote a chronicle of Spanish affairs.—He was the last monarch styled king of Asturias, his successor taking the title of king of Leon, from the new capital of the kingdom.

Born 848; died at Zamora, 901.

ALPHONSO IV., surnamed "the Monk," ascended the throne, 924; abdicated in favour of his brother Ramiro, and retired to the monastery of Sahagun; but attempted to resume the crown. He was unsuccessful, and was confined in the monastery of St. Julien, where he died.

Died 931.

ALPHONSO V. ascended the throne of Leon in 999; but being only in his fifth year, the government was administered by a regent. During his reign Cordova was conquered and Leon rebuilt. Killed at the siege of Viseu.

Born 994; died 1028.

ALPHONSO VI., "the Valiant," was crowned in 1066. During the reign of this sovereign, Asturias, Leon, Castile, and Galicia, were held under his authority. He was a successful warrior, and had Spain not been invaded by the Almoravides with a powerful army, he would have succeeded in driving the Moors from the peninsula.—It was in the reign of this monarch that Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar, surnamed the Cid, achieved the poetical celebrity with which his name has been surrounded by the Spanish romance-writers.

Born 1030; died at Toledo, 1109.

ALPHONSO VII. became Alphonso I. of Aragon.

ALPHONSO VIII., called the Emperor, fought vigorously against the Moors. In the early part of his reign he was constantly engaged in dynastic quarrels.—The military order of Alcantara was instituted at the close of this reign.

Born 1106; died at Tremada, 1157.

ALPHONSO IX., like his predecessor, was engaged against the Moors. He was involved in quarrels with the Pope, who twice prohibited his marriage.

Died at Villaneuva de Sarria, in 1230.

ALPHONSO X., surnamed "the Wise," king of Leon and Castile, succeeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252. His reign was unprosperous, but he acquired a great reputation as a man of learning and science. The Alphonsine Tables were drawn up under his direction, and at his expense.—He wrote on the motions of the stars, and a History of Spain, besides some poems, and compiled a code of laws. To him is attributed the saying that, if he had been consulted at the creation, he could have given some hints for improving the universe.

Born 1221; died 1284.

ALPHONSO XI., in 1312, when an infant, succeeded his father Ferdinand IV. During a long minority, his kingdom was rent by convulsions In 1340 he defeated the kings of Morocco and Granada at the Solado. The name "Avenger" was given to him on account of his stern determination to put down the turbulence and brigandage of the nobility. He took Algeciras and Tarifa from the Moors, but died of the plague while besieging Gibraltar.

Born 1310; died 1350.

SPAIN.

ALPHONSO XII., son of the dethroned queen Isabella; proclaimed king during his mother's life, Dec. 31, 1874. The attractive appearance of his young person, his admirable treatment of public affairs, his virtuous life and solicitude for human happiness, rendered him an especial favourite. During an epidemic of cholera in Spain, he persisted in personally inspecting infected districts, fell a victim to his enthusiasm, and thus died, greatly admired and deeply lamented, Nov. 25, 1885.

Born 1854; died 1885.

ALPHONSO XIII., posthumous son of the preceding, was born a king, thirty minutes after the noon of May 17, 1886, when there were in attendance in the palace at Madrid, the members of the Spanish cabinet, the diplomatic representatives of foreign countries and other distinguished personages. The birth was formally announced in the Cortes the same afternoon, and was a subject of world-wide remark. The infant king was christened with great ceremony in the presence of a crowded assemblage in the chapel royal at Madrid on May 22, when he was named Alphonso Leon Fernando Maria Santiago Isidro Pascual. His mother being the Queen Regent, widow of the late king, the birth had no immediate political effect, as her office continued without interruption.

Born 1886.

CASTILE.

ALPHONSO III., "the Noble," the only king of Castile of the name who was not also king of Leon. Succeeded to the throne when only three years old.

Born 1155; died at Garci Munos, 1214.

ARAGON.

ALPHONSO I., surnamed "the Fighter," king of Navarre and Aragon, who by marriage with the daughter of the king of Leon and Castile was associated with her in the government of those kingdoms, and assumed the title of emperor of Spain. He soon separated from his wife, queen Urraca, and maintained a contest with her until her death, about twelve years afterwards. During the greater part of his reign he was engaged in contests with the Moors, and was killed at the siege of Fragos.

Died 1134.

ALPHONSO II. succeeded to the throne 1163. A patron of the troubadours, and author of some poems.

Born 1152; died 1196.

ALPHONSO III. succeeded his father, Pedro II., 1285. Granted some important privileges to his subjects.

Born 1265; died 1291.

ALPHONSO IV. succeeded his father, Jayme II., 1327. His reign was chiefly occupied with war with the Genoese about the possession of Corsica and Sardinia.

Born 1299; died 1336.

ALPHONSO V., succeeded his father Ferdinand the Just in 1416. Soon after his accession, a confederacy was formed against him, but he frustrated its object and pardoned the conspirators. He conquered Naples in 1442. He left his Neapolitan dominions to his natural son Ferdinand, and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily, to his brother Juan, king of Navarre. Besides being a learned prince and a patron of men of letters, he was valiant and liberal, and greatly beloved by his subjects.

Born 1385; died at Naples 1458.

NAPLES.

ALPHONSO I. (See ALPHONSO V. of Aragon.)

ALPHONSO II., king of Naples, succeeded his father Ferdinand in 1494. He was of so cruel and tyrannical a disposition, that his subjects invited Charles VIII. of France to invade the country. That prince took Naples; and Alphonso, after abdicating the throne, retired to a monastery in Sicily, where he died. Born 1448; died 1495.

ALPHONSUS, or ALPHONSO DE CARTAGENA, Spanish historian, Bishop of Burgos, and was conspicuous for his learning at the Council of Basle. He wrote a history of Spain

Born at Carthagena, 1390; died 1450.

ALPHTEGIN, alp-teg'-in, a Turk, who, from being a slave, rose to be governor of Khorasan and sovereign of Guzna. He reigned 16 years, leaving the throne to his son-in-law, Sebek Teghin, whose son Mahmoud founded the dynasty of the Gaznevids.

ALPINI, PROSPERO, al-pē'-ne, a Venetian physician and botanist, though at first a soldier. He was the first who discovered the sexes and generation of plants.

Born at Marostica, 1553; died at Padua, 1617.

ALPINUS, CORNELIUS, ăl-pī'-nus, a contemptible poet, whom Horace ridicules for the awkward manner in which he introduced the death of Memnon in a tragedy, and the pitiful style in which he described the Rhine, in an epic poem.

ALPNACH, alp'-nak, a town of Switzerland, 8 miles from Lucerne. Pop. about 1,600.—A remarkable wooden railway, called the slide of Alpnach, was here constructed. It was made for slipping timber down to Lake Lucerne from Mount Pilate.

ALPS, ălps, the greatest mountain system in Europe, running in an unbroken line from the Mediterranean round the N.W. of Italy to the eastern side of the Adriatic. The geographical position of the main mass is nearly midway between the north pole and the equator. They divide Italy from all its northern neighbours,—France, Switzerland, and Germany, and stretch in the form of a crescent from near Nice through Provence, Dauphiny, Savoy, Switzerland, the Tyrol, Suabia, Carinthia, Carniola, and the head of the Adriatic Sea. The entire length of the Alpine system from east to west is about 790 miles, and the breadth in some places 200 miles. The summits of several of the principal peaks are more than 15,000 feet above the sea level; and in the entire system there are about 260 peaks which have an altitude of over 10,000 feet; and altogether about 340 peaks are enumerated and named, not one of which is less than 5,000 feet in height, or about half as high again as Snowdon, or 1,000 feet higher than Ben Nevis, the highest mountain in the British Islands. The highest peak of the entire system is Mont Blanc, 15,781 feet, an altitude nearly rivalled by three or four other mountains. The loftiest peaks are on the western portion of the system, the altitude diminishing, as the region occupied by the mountains becomes wider towards the east. They rise more abruptly from the southern, or Italian side, than in the north, where the subsidence towards the great plain of Central Europe is more gradual. The mountain pasturages, where dairy-farming is extensively carried on, are mostly at an elevation of from 6,000 to 9,000 feet. There are about 300 known passes in the different ranges, at elevations varying from 3,000 to about 14,000 feet. Many of these, however, are merely bridle, or even footpaths; but there are 60 carriage roads and three lines of railway. The principal roads, some of them being constructed with immense labour and great expense, are over Mount Cenis, now also pierced by a tunnel, opened in 1872, and crossed by a railway completed in 1868, from Savoy to Piedmont; over the Simplon, from Valais to Piedmont, about 36 miles long, passing through excavated galleries and over bridges; over Mount Genevre, on the frontier of France and Piedmont; over Mount St. Gothard, a steep and dangerous route, travelled chiefly by mules and packhorses; over the great St. Bernard, from the Lake of Geneva to Italy, also unfit for carriages, crossed by Napoleon and his army in 1802; the main road from Innspruck to Italy, over the Brenner. Nearly all the loftiest peaks are perpetually capped with snow, but the snow-line varies considerably in various parts of the system. In some places 8,000 feet above the sea may be said to mark the limit, but in other parts the elevation is at least 1,500 feet more. The great glaciers, or moving fields of ice, formed by the accumulation of snow drifting from the loftiest peaks, are a magnificent and exceedingly interesting feature of this mountain system. The origin of the name Alps has not been satisfactorily ascertained. In Celtic the word "alp" or "alb" means height; and "alp" in South Germany ("alpa" in old High German) is applied to mountain pastures.

Divisions into Groups.—Old geographers divided the Alps into nine distinct groups, named Maritime, Cottian, Graian, Pennine, Lepontine, Rhætian, Noric, Carnic, and Julian; but modern geographers generally adopt a division into West, Middle, and East Alps, with sixteen subdivisions, with distinct designations, which it may be most convenient to adopt:—

1. Maritime Alps. Extending from a point near Monte Viso, on the south-west of France, and skirting the shore of the Mediterranean till they are merged in the Apennines, the mountain range of Italy. The highest peak is Aiguille de Chambeyron, 12,155 feet.

2. Cottian Alps. Farther north, separating Piedmont from the French department of Hautes Alpes; highest peak, Monte Viso, 12,605 feet.

3. Dauphiné Alps. To the west of the Cottian Alps, from which they are separated by the broad valley of the Durance; highest peak Pic des Ecrins, 13,462 feet.

4. Graian (a name given by the early Roman geographers, and probably of Celtic origin). A lofty group between the plains of Piedmont and Mont Blanc. Mont Cenis is at the southern extremity of the group, and extending into the French department of Isère. They were considered as part of the boundary between Piedmont and Savoy; highest peak, Mont Iseran, 13,272 feet.

5. Pennine. This group includes the mountains of greatest elevation in all the Alpine system. It extends from the Simplon pass in the north-east to the south-west of Mont Blanc, between the plains of Lombardy and the valley of the Rhone. Highest point, Mont Blanc, the loftiest mountain of Europe, 15,781 feet; Monte Rosa and the Matterhorn being little inferior in elevation.

6. Bernese. This group, for grandeur and beauty of scenery, rivals the Pennine Alps. The main chain forms the boundary between the Swiss Cantons of Berne and Valais, and extends parallel to the course of the Rhone for about 70 miles, and a branch is between the upper course of the Aar and the head of the Lake of Geneva. Highest summit, Finsteraarhorn, 14,026 feet; the famous Jungfrau, (13,671), Wetterhorn (12,166), and Monch (13,438), are included in this group.

7. North Swiss Alps. An eastward extension of the main chain of the Bernese; highest peak, Todi, 11,887 feet.

8. Lepontine. Sometimes named the Helvetian Alps, occupy the greater portion of Nether Switzerland, extending from the Simplon Pass eastward to Monte Rosa, on both sides of the Rhone, and forming the boundary between Lombardy and Switzerland. Highest peak, Monte Leone, 11,696 feet.

9. Rhætian. A mountain region of Switzerland, east of the valley of the Rhine, and extending to the upper valley of the Adige. The group is divided into two nearly equal portions by the upper Valley of the Inn, or Engadine. Highest peak, Piz Bernina, 13,294 feet; and there are several others of nearly similar altitude.

10. Lombard. Between the Lake of Como on the west and the Adige on the east, extending for about 90 miles, and sloping to the plains of Lombardy. Highest summit, Monte Adamillo, 11,832 feet; Alnor de Nardes has only a few feet lower elevation.

11. Bavarian, North Tyrol or Suabian. The region lying north of the valley of the Mar, between the river and Lake Constance. Some geographers propose to name the group the Vindelician Alps, the district having belonged to the tribe of the Vindelici, before they were conquered by the Romans. The northern portion of this group is in Bavaria; other parts are in the Austrian provinces of Tyrol and Voraslberg. Highest peak, Zugspitz, 9716 feet.

12. Noric. Between the plains of the Drave and the Danube, the mountains subsiding toward the plains of the latter river. Dachstein, 9845 feet, is the highest summit.

13. Central Tyrol. Extending from the valley of the upper Adige, through Tyrol to Carinthia. The Brenner Pass, which affords the easiest access from Central Europe to Northern Italy, is in this group. Highest point, Gross Glockner, 12,405 feet.

14. Styrian. This group is considered as the eastern limit of the Alpine system. It is to the north of the valley of the Drave, and includes a large portion of Carinthia and a small part of the province of Salzburg. The Hafnereck, 7044 feet, is the highest point.

15. South Tyrol and Venetian. Remarkable for the beauty of the scenery, and the isolated peaks; sometimes described as the Dolomite Alps, from the enormous quantity of limestone in the district. The district lies between the valley of the Adige and the sources of the Drave and Piave; in the northern part the inhabitants are mostly of German origin; farther south towards Venice, they are thoroughly Italian. Highest point, Cimon della Pala, 11,000 feet.

16. South Eastern Alps. Frequently described as the Carnic and Julian Alps, extending from the valley of the Drave to the Adriatic Sea. Terglou, 9,371 feet, is the loftiest summit.

Glaciers.—Of these there are about 400, lying between Mont Blanc and the Tyrol. Several of them are 20 miles long, with, perhaps, an average width of a mile or a mile and a half. They are supposed in the aggregate to cover a space of upwards of 1,000 square miles.

Rivers and Lakes.—Some of the most important rivers of Europe have their origin in the Alps, the melted snow flowing through numerous valleys, and finding its way to the North Sea, the Black Sea, and the Mediterranean. The chief river systems are the Rhine rising in the north-eastern part of Switzerland, expanding into the Lake of Constance, and receiving as tributaries the Thur and the Nar, the latter flowing through Lakes Brienz and Thun, and receiving, with smaller streams, the Reuss and the Limmat. The Tram, the Eur, the Drave, the Raab, the Save, the Inn, the Lech, the Illar, and the Isar, flow into the Danube, and very materially increase the volume of that great river. The Rhone, the principal river of Southern France, rises among the glaciers, passes through the Lake of Geneva, and receives the Arve, the Isère, the Durance, and other Alpine streams. The Italian river Po receives several streams from the slopes of the Italian Alps, the most important being the Sesia, the Theino (from Lake Maggiore), the Dora Baltea, the Adige, and the Mincio, from Lake Garda. The Piave and the Tagliamento flow into the Adriatic, and the Var into the Mediterranean, near the Gulf of Genoa.

Vegetation.—Travelling from the base of the Alps upwards, beautiful vineyards, and the forests common to Europe, are passed through, until an elevation of 2,030 feet is attained, when the vine is no longer found. The chestnut disappears at 1,000 feet higher, and by the time that another thousand feet are climbed, the oak, hardy as we are accustomed to call it, is not to be found in a flourishing condition. At 5,000 feet no deciduous trees are to be seen, and at 6,000 the spruce fir alone appears. At this height the mountains become covered with the Rhododendron ferrugineum, which, in its turn, succumbs to the change of soil and climate, to be succeeded by a few still more hardy plants, which exist until they are lost in the mosses and lichens which fringe the line of perpetual snow.

Animals.—On the higher parts the ibex, chamois, and the white hare; in the upper wooded regions, bears, marmots, and moles; and lower down, lynxes, foxes wolves, and wild cats. Besides the lammergeyer, or great vulture, of the Alps, there are numerous eagles and other birds of prey. Immediately below the line of perpetual snow (8,000 feet), the white partridge is found, and further down amongst the pine-forests, bustards are abundant. Quails and partridges are plentiful in the lower regions, and the lakes are frequented by numbers of palmipedes. Insects are represented in almost every variety, as far as vegetation ascends the mountain. Of domestic animals, goats, cows, and oxen are the most numerous. Sheep and horses are few, and especially in the south. Asses and mules are used as beasts of burden

Minera ls.—Gold, silver, copper, lead, and iron are found in the various districts, the eastern portion of the system being, as a rule, the richest. Near St. Gothard rock crystals of very fine quality are abundant, and at Carniola quicksilver is found. There is some coal. The whole region is rich in salt, and there are a vast number of mineral springs, hot and cold.

Political Divisions.—The greater portion of the system chiefly belongs to France and Italy. Nearly the whole of the Central Alps belong to Switzerland. Bavaria claims a small part. The ranges in Tyrol, Illyria, and Styria belong to Austria.

Inhabitants.—It is difficult to estimate the population, as in official documents the people of towns and populous districts, not strictly belonging to the mountain region, are generally included. 6,000,000 would probably be a fair estimate. The Celto-Gallic races occupy the French and Savoy Alps, between Switzerland and some of the Piedmontese valleys; the Teutonic element is very conspicuous in the Swiss and German Alps; further east, the people are of Sclavonic descent; and the Italian race appear in the valley on the Italian side of the system, and the Swiss cantons of Tessin and Grisons, and on that part of the Alps sometimes described as the Italian Tyrol.

ALPUJARRAS, al-poosh-ar'-ass, a mountainous region in the south of Spain. (See ALMEIRA and GRANADA.)

ALRESFORD, NEW, ăl-res-ford, a market town of Hampshire, seven miles from Winchester, formerly possessing a manufactory of linseys. A station on the London and South-Western Railway. Pop. 1,623.

ALREWAS, or ALDERWAS, ăl-ru-ăs, a village and parish of Staffordshire, 5 miles from Lichfield. Area, 4,350 acres. Pop. 1,700.—A station on the South Staffordshire Railway.

ALS, PEDER, Dutch historical and portrait painter.

Born at Copenhagen, 1725; died 1755.

ALSACE, al-sas', one of the old German provinces forming the two French departments of the Upper and Lower Rhine until 1871, when the victorious Germans annexed it to their empire, in consequence of which about 45,000 of the inhabitants left the province, preferring to remain French citizens. Pop. 1,566,670.

ALSEN, al'-sen, an island in the Baltic, between the island of Funen and the E. coast of Sleswick. It formerly belonged to Denmark, but after the war of 1864, was ceded to Germany. Area, 105 square miles. The island is pleasant, and, with the exception of wheat, it produces most kinds of grain. Aniseed is greatly cultivated as a condiment much used by the Danes. Towns. The principal are Nordborg and Sonderborg, the latter, the capital, with a population of 5,500, has a good harbour. Pop. 23,000. Lat. between 54° 51′ and 55° 5′ N. Lon. between 9° 37′ and 10° 7′ E.

ALSFELD, als'-felt, a town of Hessen-Darmstadt, 26 miles from Giessen, 50 miles N.E. of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. Manf. Cotton, linen, and woollen goods. Pop. about 4,000.

ALSH, LOCH, lok alsh, a picturesque maritime inlet in Ross-shire, Scotland, the shores of which are rendered romantic by the ruins of several feudal castles. It is nearly opposite the south end of the isle of Skye.

ALSOP, VINCENT, Nonconformist divine. Educated at Cambridge, ejected from the living of Wilby, in Northamptonshire, by the Act of Uniformity in 1662, after which he was imprisoned for six months for praying with a sick person. Afterwards preached in a chapel at Westminster. Famous for his vigorous and witty controversies with Sherlock and Stillingfleet. Towards the end of his life he took an active part in ecclesiastical politics.

Died 1703.

ALSTED, JOHANN HEINRICH, German divine. Professor of Philosophy and Divinity at Herburn and Weissenburg, and a very voluminous and learned writer.

Born 1588; died 1638.

ALSTON, CHARLES, M.D., botanical and medical writer and lecturer. One of the founders of the Edinburgh school of medicine, and author of "Lectures on Materia Medica."

Born 1683; died 1760.

ALSTON, or ALSTON MOOR, a town in Cumberland. The terminus of the Alston and Haltwhistle Railway. (See ALDSTONE.)

ALSTONFIELD, al'-ston-feeld, a parish of Staffordshire, 7 miles from Longnor. Area, 21,860 acres. Pop. about 5,000, chiefly employed in silk-mills and button-factories.

ALSTROEMER, JOHN, al-stro'-mer, an eminent patriotic Swede, who, after visiting England, returned to his own country, and became remarkable for the great improvements he there introduced into arts and manufactures. For his great efforts he was made a knight of the Polar Star, chancellor of Commerce, and a member of the Academy of Sciences. There is a statue to his honour in the exchange at Stockholm.

Born at Alengsoes, 1685; died 1761.

ALT, alt, a river of England, which rises in Lancashire, and falls into the Irish Sea.

ALTAI MOUNTAINS, al-ti or al-tă'-e, ("gold mountains"), a vast mountain system of Asia, extending from Lon. 85° E. to the Sea of Okhotsk, about 5,000 miles, and forming the natural boundary-line which separates the empires of Russia and China. This mountain system comprises several collateral branches, and their mean elevation may be regarded as ranging between 4,000 and 5,000 feet. The highest known peak, or that portion of the system known as the Russian Altai, attains an elevation of nearly 11,000 feet. Their summits generally do not taper away into peaks like those of the Alps, but swell into rounded masses of granite, or spread into level plains of considerable extent. There are two chief roads over the Altai. One is from Irkutsk by Lake Baikal to Kiakhta, by which the trade between Russia and China is principally carried on; the other is from Udinsk, on the Seleuga, to the mining district of Nertchinsk, on the Shilker, an affluent of the Amoor. The great Siberian rivers, the Obi, Irtish, and Genesi, take their rise in the mountains.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, lead, iron, and copper; and the cornelian, the amethyst, the onyx, the topaz, and other gems are found. Mineral wealth seems to be unfailing so far as regards the more valuable metals.

Wild Animals.—Altai is the native abode of the wild sheep, which, like the chamois and the baquetin, lives in the most inaccessible places; deer herd on the slopes of the hills, and the marmot has its habitat near the snow-line.

Vegetation.—The forests consist of the aspen, alder, acacia, larch, birch, fir, and willow, besides the Siberian cedar. This last is found at 7,000 feet high, and at 6,000 attains to the circumference of 14 feet. The birch reaches nearly 5,000 feet, and the dwarf willow nearly 6,000. The snow-line has not been accurately determined, but is supposed to be at about 8,000 feet.

ALTAMURA, al'-ta-moo'-ra, a cathedral town in the south of Italy, province of Terra di Bari, at the foot of the Apennines. Supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Lupatra. Pop. 19,865.

ALTDORFER, ALBRECHT, alt-dor'-fer, a distinguished German engraver and painter, who employed himself on sacred, profane, historical, and mythological subjects.

Born at Regensburg, about 1480; died at Ratisbon, 1538.

ALTEA, al-tai'-a, a maritime town of Spain, province of Valencia, 30 miles from Alicante. Pop. 4,000.

ALTENA, al-tai'-na, a town in the district of Arensburg, Prussia. Manf. Principally steel and iron wares. Pop. 6,200.

ALTENAU, al'-ten-ow, a mining town of Hanover, in the middle of the Hartz Mountains. Pop. 2,100.

ALTENBRUCK, al'-ten-brook, a well-built town of Hanover, 27 miles from Stade. Pop. 2,500, trading chiefly in cattle, grain, and fruit.

ALTENBURG, al'-ten-boorg, the capital of the duchy of SAXE-ALTENBURG, 24 miles south of Leipsic. It is well built, has a castle, cathedral, several churches, a library, picture gallery, and school of art. The book trade is extensive, there is a large trade in grain and cattle, and a well-attended horse fair twice a year. Manf. Chiefly woollens, ribbons, and brushes. Pop. 18,000. It is a station on the Saxon Bavarian Railway.

ALTENBURG, a town of Hungary, at the influx of the Leitha into the Danube, 40 miles from Vienna. Pop. 3,100.—The name of several small towns in Germany.

ALTENGAARD, or ALTEN, al'-ten-gord, a Norwegian seaport, 53 miles from Hammerfest, having a harbour and considerable trade. It is the most northern point at which the cultivation of grain is possible. Pop. about 1,000. Lat. 69° 55′ N. Lon. 23° 4′ E.

ALTEN-OTTING, a town in Bavaria, near the Inn, much frequented as a place of pilgrimage by Roman Catholics on account of an image of the Virgin. It was formerly a royal residence. The great general Tilly is buried there, and in the chapel, where are his remains, many princes and princesses of Bavaria have had their hearts interred.

ALTER, FRANCIS CHARLES, German Jesuit and theologian. Author of 250 volumes of dissertations.

Died 1804.

ALTHÆA, al-thé'-a, daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, married Œneus, king of Calydon, by whom she had many children, among whom was Meleager.

ALTHÆMENES, ăl-thé'-me-nees, a son of Creteus, king of Crete. Hearing that either he or his brothers were to be their father's murderer, he fled to Rhodes, where he made a settlement, to avoid becoming a parricide. After the death of all his other sons, Creteus went after his son Althæmenes. When he landed in Rhodes, the inhabitants attacked him, supposing him to be an enemy, and he was killed by the hand of his own son. When Althæmenes knew that he had killed his father, he entreated the gods to remove him, and the earth immediately opened, and swallowed him up.

ALTHEN, GHAN, or JEAN, alt'-hen, a Persian, who was the first to introduce madder (for dyeing) to France. He was the son of the governor of a Persian province, but with the exception of himself, all his family were massacred when the Persian empire was overthrown by the usurper Thamas-Kouli-Khan. Althen, during his life, was treated ungratefully, but, by way of atonement, after his death, a tablet was, in 1821, erected to his memory in the museum of Avignon.

Born 1711; died at Caumont, in France, 1774.

ALTHORP, second title of Earl Spencer.

ALTING, HEINRICH, German divine, Professor of Theology at Heidelberg, from which town he was driven when Count Tilly took the city. In 1627 appointed Professor of Divinity at Groningen. A writer of great ability and learning.

Born at Embden, 1583; died at Groningen, 1644.

ALTING, JACOB, son of the above. Admitted in England to clerical orders, but became Professor of Hebrew at Groningen. A great Hebraist and Talmudical scholar.

Born at Heidelberg, 1618; died 1679.

ALTIS, ăl'-tis, a sacred grove round Jupiter's temple at Olympia.

ALTKIRCH, alt'-keerch, a town of France, department of the Upper Rhine. Pop. 3,100. A station on the Eastern Railway of France.

ALTMOOR, alt'-moor, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone.

ALTMUHL, alt-mool, a river of Bavaria, which falls into the Danube at Kelheim. From Dietfurt to Bamberg-on-the-Regnitiz, there is a canal, called the Maine and Danube, or Ludwig's Canal, which connects the Black Sea with the German Ocean. The first boat passed through it in August, 1836.

ALTON, al'-ton, a market-town and parish in Hampshire, on the river Wey, and 16 miles from Winchester. There are paper manufactories and an iron foundry, noted ale breweries, and large fairs and markets for cattle and sheep, corn and hops are held. The church St. Laurence, the scene of a desperate struggle between the Royalists and Parliamentarians, in 1643, is a fine building, restored in 1867. A station on the South-Western Railway. Pop. 4,092.

ALTON, a town in Madison county, Illinois, near the junction of the Mississippi with the Missouri. It carries on large export trade, and is the junction station of the two great railway lines from Chicago and Indianapolis. There are a Roman Catholic cathedral and about ten other churches. Pop. 8,700.

ALTONA, or ALTENA, al'-to-na, a large town in the Prussian province of Schleswig-Holstein, nearly joining Hamburg, on the Elbe. Both the inland and foreign commerce here are considerable. Ship-building is an important branch of employment. Manf. Velvet, silk stuffs, calico, stockings, leather, gloves, tobacco, vinegar, starch, wax, and looking-glasses, with sugar refineries and brandy. The principal public establishments are an academy, a library, several churches, two synagogues, a house of correction, an orphan-house, and an observatory. Pop. 104,457. Lat. 53° 32′ N. Lon. 9° 56′ E. It is the terminus of the Altona (Hamburg) and Kiel Railway.

ALTOONA, a town in Blair county, Pennsylvania, United States, near the eastern base of the Alleghanies. There are extensive locomotive and railway carriage manufactories. Pop. 19,710.

ALTORF, or ALTDORF, al'-torf, a small but well-built town in Switzerland, capital of the canton of Uri, near the southern extremity of Lake Lucerne. It contains the oldest Capuchin monastery in Switzerland, and there is a tower which indicates the spot where (according to the historical tradition) Tell stood when he shot the apple off the head of his son, and the small village of Burglen, in the neighbourhood, is pointed out as being his birthplace.

ALTRINGHAM, or ALTRINCHAM, al'-tring-ham, a market-town in Cheshire, 8 miles from Manchester. Manf. Cloths, cottons, and yarns. The Bridgwater canal passes through the town, and there are wharves, timber yards, an iron foundry, and chemical manure works; the neighbourhood supplies a great quantity of vegetables and fruit for the Manchester market. A fine cruciform church, St. John's, was erected in 1857; the spire is 141 feet high; and there are several other places of worship. Pop. 11,249. It is a station on the Manchester, South Junction, and Altringham Railway.

ALUNNO, NICCOLO a-loo'-no, an Italian painter of considerable merit. There are few of his works extant, but what there are entitle him to praise.

Died about 1492.

ALURED, or ALREDUS, a-lu'-red, of Beverley, an ancient English historian. He was canon and treasurer of the church of St. John, in Beverley, and wrote a chronicle of the English kings, which was published by Hearne in 1716.

Died 1128.

ALVA, al'-va, a village and parish of Scotland, in Stirlingshire, 6 miles from Stirling. Here the Devon Iron Company have their works, which are very extensive, and yarn spinning and the manufacture of shawls and tweeds are extensively carried on. A station on the North British Railway. Pop. 4,096.

ALVA, or ALBA, FERNANDO ALVAREZ DE TOLEDO, DUKE OF, al'-va, a distinguished soldier, and descended from one of the most ancient families in Spain. He made his first campaign at the age of 17, and was present at the battle of Pavia. He was a great favourite of the emperor Charles V., who made him a general; but though he distinguished himself by the high order of his military talents, he became equally noted for the cruelty of his disposition. After the battle of Muhlberg, in which John Frederick of Saxony was taken prisoner, Alva presided at the court-martial which sentenced him to death. At the siege of Metz he performed prodigies of valour; but the place was so well defended that he was obliged to raise the siege. In the campaign against Pope Paul IV., in 1556, Alva was completely successful, and obliged the pontiff to sue for peace, after which he repaired to Rome, by command of the Emperor, but very much against his own will, to ask pardon for having opposed his holiness in the war. In 1567 Philip II. sent him into the Low Countries, to reduce the Netherlands to the Spanish yoke, from which they were about to revolt. Here he established a council composed of twelve judges, whom he denominated Judges of the Tumults; but the tribunal over which they presided was called by its victims the "Court of Blood." His tyranny was now as intolerable as his power was extraordinary. Thirty thousand persons fled their country and sought refuge in other parts. He filled the United Provinces with terror and scenes of carnage, for which his memory is held in detestation to this day. He hastily tried and beheaded Counts Egmont and Horn, two patriots and friends of the prince of Orange, who had defeated a body of Spaniards at Groningen. He fortified Antwerp, and when the works were completed he caused a statue of himself to be cast in brass and erected in the middle of the fortress. At his feet was an allegorical representation of the nobility and the people, in the shape of a double-headed monster. Insult upon insult he heaped upon those he had subjected to his dominion, until even his friends became disgusted with him; and his inhumanity to the inhabitants of Haarlem brought his unpopularity to a climax. On the surrender of that city, he caused two thousand of its brave inhabitants to be executed. In 1573 he left the country he had ruled with a rod of iron, followed by the curses of the people. It is affirmed that he boasted that, during his administration in the Netherlands, he had caused to be executed eighteen thousand human beings, independent of those who fell in the various battles and sieges. For a time he was in high favour at court, but, having assisted in the escape of his son, who had been arrested for seducing one of the ladies of the court, he was disgraced and banished to his castle of Uzeda. But his military abilities were so conspicuous that, in 1581, he was afterwards employed against Portugal, where he greatly added to his military renown by driving Don Antonio from the throne. He permitted his troops to commit such enormities, and to plunder Lisbon and the suburbs to such an extent, and so enriched himself with plunder, that the king threatened an investigation; but the haughty duke sent this reply, "If the king asks me for an account, I will make him a statement of kingdoms preserved and conquered, of signal victories, of successful sieges, and of sixty years' service," and the king asked no more questions. Alva was an able general, and had a great strategic genius in the art of war. He never fought if he could gain his object otherwise. When at Cologne he was urged to engage the Dutch by the archbishop, who was struck by his efforts to avoid a conflict. "The object of a general," said he on that occasion, "is not to fight, but to conquer: he fights enough who obtains the victory." He is said never to have lost a battle. The character of this willing servant of the despotism of Charles V. and Philip II. is ably drawn, and his deeds faithfully narrated, in Mr. Motley's History,—"The Rise of the Dutch Republic."

Born 1508; died 1583.

ALVARADO, PEDRO DE, al'-va-ra'-do, a distinguished companion of Hernando Cortes in the conquest of Mexico. He was engaged in every battle till the final reduction of that kingdom. Alvarado was some time governor of Guatemala, to which was added the province of Honduras, which from being in a state of continual internal warfare, seems to have enjoyed some degree of repose under his administration.

Born at Badajoz, about 1495; died at Guatemala, 1541.

ALVARADO, a large river of Mexico, which runs into the Gulf of Mexico, about 36 miles from Vera Cruz.—A town and port at the mouth of the Alvarado river. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 18° 45′ N. Lon. 95° 43′ W.

ALVAREZ, FRANCISCO, al-va'-rais, a Portuguese divine, sent by Manuel, king of Portugal, on an embassy to Abyssinia, where he remained six years, and on his return a narrative of his mission was published.

Born at Coimbra, about 1460; died about 1540.

ALVAREZ DE LUNA, or ALVARO, was the favourite of John II., king of Castile. He was the natural son of Don Alvaro de Luna, and in 1408 was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to the king; but the courtiers taking a dislike to him, forced him to retire from court. He was afterwards recalled by the king, who at his request banished his enemies. After enjoying the splendour of royal favour for forty-five years, he fell into disgrace, and was beheaded for high treason.

Born 1388; died 1453.

ALVAREZ, DON JOSÉ, an eminent Spanish sculptor and artist. A statue of Ganymede, which he executed in 1804, whilst studying at Paris, placed him in the first rank of modern sculptors. His studio was twice visited by Napoleon I., who presented him with a gold medal valued at 500 francs. The conduct of Napoleon towards Spain, however, excited the disgust of Alvarez, who took such an aversion to the French emperor, that he would never model his bust. Subsequently he chiefly resided at Rome, and became court sculptor to Ferdinand VII. of Spain, for whom, in 1818, he executed his famous group of Antilochus and Memnon. He enjoyed a pension from the Spanish crown.

Born at Priego, Cordova, 1768; died at Madrid, 1827.

ALVAREZ, DON MANUEL, another eminent Spanish sculptor, who followed classical models so closely that he was known as "the Greek."

Born at Salamanca, 1727; died 1797.

ALVECHURCH, ăl-ve-church, a town and parish of Worcestershire, on the Worcester canal, and 4½ miles from Bromsgrove. Area, 6,820 acres. Pop. 1,800. Reached by the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway.

ALVERSLEBEN, PHILIPP KARL VON, Prussian minister of state, son of the Hanoverian minister of war. For many years he had great influence in Prussian politics.

Born at Hanover, 1745; died at Berlin, 1802.

ALVIANO, BARTOLOMMEO, al-ve-a'-no, a Venetian general who obtained signal advantages over the emperor Maximilian, for which he received triumphal honours. The state of Venice gave him a magnificent burial, and pensioned his family.

Died at the siege of Brescia, 1515.

ALVINEZ, al-ve'-naiz, an Austrian town in Transylvania, 6 miles from Karlsburg. Pop. 3,500, mostly Bulgarians and Magyars.

ALVINZI, BARON D', al-veen'-ze, a field-marshal in the service of Austria. Being defeated by Napoleon I. both at Rivoli and Arcola, in 1797, he was superseded in the command of the army of Italy. In 1798 he became commander-general in Hungary, where he was greatly beloved.

Born 1735; died in Hungary, 1810.

ALWUR, or MACHERY, al-wur, a state of Rajpootana, under the control of the Governor-General's agent for the states of that province. Ext. 80 miles in length, running north and south, and 60 in breadth. Area, 3,000 square miles. Desc. Hilly, but interspersed with rich, beautiful valleys. Pop. 682,926, of whom nearly two-thirds are Hindoos. Lat. between 27° 14′ and 28° 13′ N. Lon. between 76° 14′ and 77° 15′ E.

ALWUR, the capital of the above state, estimated to stand on an eminence 1,200 feet above the surrounding country. It is an ill-built town encompassed by a mud wall defended by bastions. It was formerly the residence of the rajah. Pop. 53,000. Lat. 27° 34′ N. Lon. 76° 40′ E.

ALYATTES, ă-li-ăt'-es, a king of Lydia, who was engaged in perpetual wars with the Cimmerians and the Medes, and took Smyrna. Near Lake Gygæa, a few miles north of Sardis, in Asia Minor, an enormous conical mound of earth, raised to his memory, is still to be seen.

Died about 562 B.C.

ALYCÆUS, ăl-i-se'-us, son of Sciron, who was killed by Theseus. A place in Megara was named after him.

ALYMON, ă-li'-mon, the husband of Circe.

ALYPIUS, ă-lip'-e-us, a geographer, known as Alypius of Antioch, who was employed by the emperor Julian, first in Britain as deputy-governor, and next in Jerusalem in rebuilding the temple. At the close of life he was banished, but for what cause is not known. Lived in the 4th century. A geographical description of the world by him was printed in 4to at Geneva, in 1628.

ALYPIUS, an eminent Greek writer in music, who is supposed to have lived before Euclid and Ptolemy.

ALYSSUS, ă-lis'-us, a fountain of Arcadia, the waters of which were said to cure hydrophobia.

ALYTH, ă'-lith, a town and parish of Scotland, in Perthshire, 13 miles from Forfar. It is well built, with a handsome parish church. Manf. Yarn and brown linens. Pop. 2,134.—A station on the Caledonian Railway.

ALZEY, alt'-se, a walled-town of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the Salzbach, 19 miles from Mainz. Has a trade chiefly in leather. Pop. 5,250.

AM, am, a frontier stronghold of Afghanistan, 50 miles N. of Attock.

AMACURA, a-ma-ku'-ra, a river falling into the south mouth of the Orinoco, South America. In the lower part of its course it forms the boundary between British and Columbian Guiana.

AMADEDDULAT, a-ma-ded'-u-la, the founder of a Persian dynasty, was the son of a fisherman. He and his two brothers took Persia proper, Persian Irak, and Caramania, which they divided between them. He settled at Schiraz, in Persia proper, in 933.

Died 949.

AMADEUS V., a-ma-de'-us, "the Great," count of Savoy, began his government in 1285. He immortalized his name by his defence of Rhodes against the Turks, on which occasion he added to his arms the cross of the order of St. John of Jerusalem.

Born at Bourget, 1249; died at Avignon, 1323.

AMADEUS VI., count of Savoy, was one of the most warlike princes of his age. He assisted John, king of France, against Edward, king of England, and in 1366 passed into Greece to the assistance of the emperor John Paleologus. On his return he presented the patriarch of Constantinople, who accompanied him, to Pope Urban V. at Viterbo.

Born 1334; died 1383.

AMADEUS VIII., count and first duke of Savoy, entered upon the sovereignty in 1391. In 1416 Savoy was created a duchy, and not long afterwards the duke, who had added Piedmont and other provinces to his dominions, retired to a monastery, where he instituted an order of knighthood, by the name of the Annunciata, without, however, actually relinquishing his dukedom. The knights, however, lived in a luxurious style, without any of the severities of monachism. In 1439 he caused himself to be elected pope by the council of Basel, on which he took the name of Felix V., but he was dispossessed of his title, and in 1449 made a formal abdication in favour of Nicholas V., who gave him a cardinalship, four bishoprics, and made him dean of the Sacred College, besides allowing him special privileges.

Born 1386; died 1451.

AMADEUS IX., duke of Savoy, was a very charitable prince, and so beloved by his subjects, that they called him the "blessed Amadeus."—There were nine rulers in Savoy of this name, but the above are the only remarkable men.

Born 1435; died 1472.

AMADIAH, or AMADIEH, a-ma'-de-a, a fortified town of Asiatic Turkey, Kurdistan, on a tributary of the Tigris, 65 miles from Mosul.

AMAK, or AMAGER, a'-mak, a-ma'-ger, a Danish island to the S. of Copenhagen, on which its suburb Christianshavn is built. Pop. about 9,000.

AMAK, or ABULNAGIE AL BOKHARI, a'-mak, a Persian poet, entertained at the court of the sultan Khedar Khan, who instituted an academy of poets, of which he made Amak president. Flourished in the 5th century, and lived to a great age.—His chief poem is the "History of the Loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah."

AMAKUTAN, a-ma-ku'-tan, an island of the Pacific. (See KURILE ISLANDS.)

AMAL, a'-mal, a town of Sweden, 50 miles from Weversborg. Its harbour is in Lake Wever, and its trade principally consists of deals, iron, and steel. Pop. 11,500.

AMALARIC, or AMAURY, ă-măl'-a-rik, king of the Visigoths, was the son of Alaric II. He succeeded his grandfather Theodoric in 526. He married Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis, king of France, whom he used barbarously to make her embrace Arianism. At length she complained to her brother Childebert, king of Paris, who, in 531, marched against him and defeated him in a battle fought in Catalonia. He fled to a church where he was slain.

Born 502; died 531.

AMALASONTHA, daughter of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and after his death regent of the kingdom for her son, who died at an early age. She married a second time her cousin Theodatus, who a few months afterwards caused her to be murdered.

Born about 498; died 535.

AMALEK, the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. Some have supposed him to be the father of the Amalekites, but they are mentioned as a powerful people long before his birth.

AMALEKITES, ă-mal-e-kites, one of the most fierce and warlike of the Canaanitish nations, of uncertain origin and residence. They are called the first of all the nations, and they were the first who attacked the Israelites. For this they became the object of God's most terrible wrath.

AMALFI, a-mal'-fe, a seaport city and an archbishop's see, the Italian province of Principato Citerione, situated on the north side of the Gulf of Salerno.—In the 11th century the inhabitants of this city took an active part in the crusades, and founded the order of the Knights of Malta. It was then a place of great commercial importance and an independent republic. In 1135 the town was plundered by the Pisans, and soon afterwards was annexed to the dominions of Naples. A large portion of the town was destroyed by a storm in 1343. There is an ancient cathedral, dedicated to St. Andrew, and the manufacture of macaroni, silk and paper is carried on. Pop. 6,500. Masaniello the fisherman, and a short time ruler of Naples, was born here, as was Flavio Gioia, the improver of the mariner's compass.

AMALIA or AMELIA, ANNA, a-ma-lie, princess of Prussia, daughter of Frederick William I., and sister of Frederick the Great. This princess was greatly distinguished by her musical talents, to the cultivation of which she devoted nearly all her time. At the age of 21 she became princess-abbess of Quedlinburg.

Born 1723; died 1787.

AMALIA, the wife of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, who, at an early age, lost her husband, but managed during the minority of her son to preserve her little state intact during some of the most troublous times of the continental wars. She resided in the city of Weimar, and invited the most distinguished men of letters to her capital. Wieland, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe settled here, and enjoyed her patronage as well as her company. She resigned the government to her son in 1775. The battle of Jena is said to have broken her heart.

Born 1739; died 1807.

AMALRIC, or ARNAULD, a-mal'-reek, a Spanish military churchman, who distinguished himself by his cruelties against the Albigenses. In 1209 he laid siege to Beziers, and commanded 60,000 of the inhabitants to be slaughtered after the town had surrendered. "How are we to distinguish the Catholics from the heretics?" inquired one of his officers. "Kill them all—God knows his own," replied Amalric.

Died 1225.

AMALRIC, or AMAURI, of BENA, founder of a school of Pantheists. He lectured at Paris about 1200; but the university condemned his doctrines, and Pope Innocent III. ordered him to recant his errors, which he did, but shortly afterwards died from humiliation and grief. Ten of his followers were burnt, and his body was exhumed and burnt. The Lateran Council of 1215 formally condemned his doctrines.

Died 1209.

AMALTEO, POMPONEO, a-mal'-tay-o, an eminent painter of the Venetian school.

Born at San Vito, in Friuli, 1505. The year of his death is not known.

AMALTHÆA, ă-măl-thé'-a, a daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, who fed Jupiter with goat's milk. Hence she has been called a goat, and some have maintained that Jupiter, to reward her kindness, placed her in heaven as a constellation, and presented one of her horns to the nymphs who had superintended his infant years. This horn was called the Cornucopia, or horn of plenty, and had the power of giving the nymphs whatever they desired.

AMALTHEA, the Cumean Sibyl, who offered Tarquin nine books on the fate of Rome, for which she demanded 300 crowns. He refused to make the purchase, when she burnt three of them, and demanded the same sum for the remainder. Tarquin still refusing, she burnt three more, and required as much for those which were left. The king, astonished, consulted the priests, and by their advice made the purchase of the remaining three, which were committed to the care of two magistrates, who were to consult them on extraordinary occasions. They are known as the Sibylline oracles.

AMAMA, SIXTINUS, a-ma'-ma, a learned Dutchman, who became eminent for his knowledge of the Oriental languages. He was at Oxford in 1613, and taught Hebrew in Exeter College. After residing there some years, he returned to Franeker, and became Hebrew professor. His greatest work is a censure of the Vulgate.
Born 1593; died 1629.

AMAN, JOHANN, a'-man, an eminent German architect, who was employed in various public buildings by several princes of Germany, and by the emperor of Austria.
Born 1765; died 1834.

AMANA, or AMANUS, ăm'-a-na, now Amaldag, a branch of Mount Taurus, which separates Syria from Cilicia.

AMAND, MARK ANTHONY GERARD, SIEUR DE SAINT, a'-mang, a French poet, whose father was a commander in the English navy, and was three years confined in the Black Tower at Constantinople. The poems of Amand, which are chiefly comic, were published in 8 vols. 1649, Paris.
Born at Rouen, 1594; died 1661.

AMAND, ST., sant a'-mang, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Cher, on which river it is situate, 26 miles from Bourges. Commerce. Chiefly carried on in leather, iron, wood, wool, corn, and wine. Pop. upwards of 8,000.—There are several other towns in France of this name, but none of them has a population over 3,000.

AMANTEA, a-man'-tai-a, a fortified seaport town of Italy, on the coast of Calabria Citra, 15 miles from Cosenza. Pop. 3,000.

AMAPALLA, a-ma-pal'-a, a town of Central America, province of Nicaragua. This town gives name to a large gulf of the same name, 220 leagues S.E. of Guatemala.

AMARA, WELL OF, a-mar'-a, a caravan-station of Arabia, on the east coast of the Gulf of Suez. Lat. 29° 35′ N. Lon. 32° 55′ E.—It is thought to be the Marah of Holy Writ, the waters of which were rendered wholesome in answer to the prayer of Moses.

AMARAL, ANDRES DO, am'-a-ral, a Portuguese knight of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, beheaded for secretly inviting the Turks to invade the island of Rhodes. The result of this invasion was the surrender of Rhodes to Sultan Solyman, on the Christmas-day of 1522.
Died 1522.

AMARANTE, a-ma-ran'-tai, a town of Portugal, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, on the river Tamega, 36 miles from Oporto. Pop. 4,000.—The possession of this town was frequently contested during the peninsular war of 1809.

AMARAPURA, or UMMERAPOORA, a'-ma-ra-poo'-ra, "the City of the Gods," and former capital of the Burmese dominions, 6 miles from Ava on the Irawadi river. In 1819, the seat of government being transferred to Ava, this town began to decline. It has suffered greatly from fires and earthquakes, and is now almost deserted, Mandalay, a few miles distant, being the royal residence and capital. The most remarkable edifice is a temple containing a colossal bronze statue of Buddha. Near it is the temple with the bronze statue of Guadama, taken and brought here from Aracan in 1784, when it was conquered by the Burmese. Lat. 21° 57′ N. Lon. 73° 4′ E.

AMARI, MICHELE, am'-ar-e, an Italian historian of marked progressive tendencies in his political opinions, and devoted to literary pursuits. He translated the "Marmion" of Scott into Italian, and wrote a history of the Sicilian Vespers, which brought him into immediate notice. With a view to the production of a history of Sicily under the Musulman rule, he is generally believed to have applied himself successfully to the study of Arabic. After the Sicilian insurrection of 1848 he resided in Paris, but returned to Italy in 1860, and two years afterwards was appointed Minister of Instruction.
Born at Palermo, 1806.

AMARI SINHA, a Sanscrit grammarian and poet. Author of the "Amara-Kosha" (Treasury of Amari), which has been several times translated. Lived in the 15th century B.C.

AMASA, ă-mai'-sa, a son of Jetha, who is elsewhere called Ithra. He was pardoned by David though he fought against him in the army of Absalom.

AMASAI, ă-măs'-a-i, a Levite, and one of the sons of Elkanah, who assisted David against Saul.

AMASIA, or AMASIAYAH, a-mai'-se-a, a town of Asiatic Turkey, intersected by the river Yeshil-Irmak (the ancient Iris), winding at the bottom of the hills whereon it is built. The town is embosomed in an amphitheatre of mountains, and is commanded by a fort, situate on a sharp-pointed rock. Although an extensive and populous place, the streets are narrow and dirty. Most of the houses are built of wood, but many are built of stone, and are covered with tiles. There is only one mosque, a fine edifice, erected by the Sultan Bajazet II., in 1490, with two lofty minarets of hewn stone; of which material the numerous baths are also constructed. It stands on both banks of the river, and is connected by a stone bridge. The Acropolis is built on a lofty rock overhanging the town. Strabo, the geographer, is said to have been born in this city, and also King Mithridates. It was anciently the capital of the kings of Pontus. Exp. Salt, silk, wheat, wine and cotton. A very large quantity of silk is produced in the neighbourhood. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 40° 38′ N. Lon. 36° 15′ E.

AMASIS, a-mai'-sis, king of Egypt; he was prime minister to Apries, king of that country, on whose deposition he mounted the throne, B.C. 569, and immediately put Apries to death. Egypt flourished greatly in his reign, and he adorned it with numerous and splendid buildings.
Died 525 B.C.

AMASREH, AMASERAH, or AMASTRA, a-mas'-rai, a fortified town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, on a cape in the Black Sea, 60 miles from Erekli. Pop. 1,000.—In its neighbourhood are the remains of a temple of Neptune.

AMASTRIS, ă-măs'-tris, the wife of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily. She was sister to the Persian king Darius, whom Alexander conquered.—Also the wife of Xerxes, king of Persia. (See AMESTRIS.)—Another, a friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla in the Rutulian war.

AMAT, FELIX, Spanish ecclesiastical historian. Archbishop of Palmyra and abbot of St. Ildefonso. Author of an Ecclesiastical History, condemned, on political grounds, by the Inquisition. He was of gigantic stature, more than seven feet in height.
Born at Sabadell, 1750; died 1824.

AMATA, a-ma'-ta, the wife of King Latinus. She had betrothed her daughter Lavinia to Turnus, whose interest she favoured, before the arrival of Æneas in Italy; and when her daughter was given in marriage to Æneas, she hung herself to avoid the sight of her son-in-law.

AMATHUS, ă-ma'-thus, or ăm'-a-thus, a city on the southern side of the island of Cyprus, especially dedicated to Venus. The island is sometimes called Amathusia. Amathus is now named Limmesol, or Limmesol antica.

AMATI, a-ma'-te, an Italian family, eminent as violin-makers. Their instruments are called Cremonas, from their having their residence and carrying on their business in that town. They lived in the 16th and 17th centuries.

AMATITLAN, a-ma-tit-lan', a town of Central America, 15 miles from Guatemala. A large lake and hot springs are in the vicinity. Lat. 14° 30′ N. Lon. 90° 17′ W. Pop. about 10,000.

AMATO, JOAM RODRIGUEZ, a-ma'-to, a distinguished Jewish physician, who had the honour of being called from Ancona to Rome to attend Pope Julius III.
Born at Castle Branco, Beira, Portugal, 1511; died 1568.

AMATO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO D', one of the best of the Neapolitan painters. He possessed the venerative faculty in a high degree, and carried his sentiments of propriety so far as to consider it wrong to paint a woman in a state of even partial nudity.
Born at Naples, 1475; died 1555.

AMATOLA MOUNTAINS. (See AFRICA and KAFFRARIA.)

AMATRICI, a-ma-tre'-che, a town of Naples, 22 miles from Aquila. Pop. 5,000, chiefly engaged in the manufacture of woollens.

AMAURI I., a-maw'-re, king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother Baldwin III. in 1165. He was a courageous and enterprising prince; but these qualities were sullied by avarice and cruelty.
Died 1173.

AMAURI II., king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother Guy de Lusignan in 1194. His title was contested by Isabella, second daughter of Amauri I.; but on her becoming a widow, he married her, and was crowned. The Saracens having taken his capital, he applied for assistance to the European princes; but before the succours arrived, he died.
Died 1205.

AMAXICHI, a'-maks-e'-che, a seaport town and capital of Santa Maura, or Leucadia, one of the Ionian islands. It is separated from the castle of Santa Maura by a lagoon a mile wide. Here a Greek archbishop resides. Lat. 38° 50′ N. Lon. 20° 40′ E. Pop. 6,000.

AMAZIAH, ă-mă-zi'-a, king of Judah, succeeded his father Joash at the age of 25. He blended idolatry with the worship of God. With the assistance of the Israelites, he defeated the Edomites in the Valley of Salt; but afterwards commenced war on his allies, by whom he was taken prisoner. Slain by his own subjects, 810 B.C.

AMAZON, MARANON, ORELLANA, or SOLIMOENS, ă'-ma-zon, the largest river in the world, rising in the Andes, South America, traversing the entire breadth of the continent, from west to east, and falling into the North Atlantic Ocean under the equator, and at about Lon. 50° W. The head streams are the Ucayle, or Apurimac, rising in Peru, and the Maranon, about 6° farther north. They unite near the boundary of Peru and Ecuador. It has a length, including windings, of nearly 4,000 miles, draining an area, according to the best authorities, of two millions and a half of square miles. The principal mouth of the river is about 50 miles wide, but the whole delta has a breadth of about 200 miles. The influence of the tide is felt 400 miles up the river. It is navigable for 2,200 miles from the sea, forms during its course many islands in itself, receives nearly 200 other rivers, some of which are from 1,000 to 2,000 miles long, and are nearly all navigable for the greater part of the course, and, in pouring itself into the ocean, repels the waters of the sea to the distance of 300 miles from the land.—The mouth of the Amazon was discovered in 1500, by Viscount Yanez Pinçon, a companion of Columbus. The first European who made the descent of its stream was Francis d'Orellana, a Spaniard, who, in 1539, sailed from the Rio Naopo to its mouth. It has been generally supposed that the name of the river originated in stories told to the first discoverers of tribes of warlike women who inhabited the region; but the name is that given by the natives to the lower portion of the river, amassona, or "boat destroyer," from the dangerous "bore," or sudden swelling of the river, three days before the new and full moon, when the sea, instead of occupying six hours to reach its flood, swells to its highest limit in one or two minutes.

AMAZUMA, a large town in Africa, on the banks of the Niger. Lat. 5° 10′ N. Lon. 6° 10′ E.

AMBALA, or UMBALLA, a division of India, under the jurisdiction of the lieutenant-governor of the Punjaub. The division comprises the districts of Ambala and Loodhiana in the plains, and Simla in the Himalayas. Pop., in 1881, 1,729,043. The Ambala district stretches N.E. and S.W. along the lower face of the Himalayas. It consists almost entirely of an alluvial plain between the rivers Jumna and Sutlej. The Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway passes through the centre of the district. Area, 2,628 square miles. Pop. nearly 1,040,000, of whom about 690,000 are Hindoos, and 287,000 Mahometans.

AMBALA, the capital of the above district. A large town, with an important railway station. Pop. 67,463.

AMBALAGA, am-ba'-la-ga, a town in the island of Madura, Indian Archipelago. Pop. 4,000.

AMBATIKI, am'-ba-te-ke, an island in the South Pacific, of the Feejee group. Pop. 500. Lat. 17° 47′ S. Lon. 179° 11′ W.—It attains an elevation of 750 feet, in the form of a dome.

AMBELAKIA, am-be-la'-ke-a, a large town of Thessaly, situate in the vale of Salympria, the ancient Peneus. It carries on a flourishing trade in dyeing red Turkish yarn. Pop. 3,000.

AMBERG, am'-berg, a walled city of Bavaria, and formerly the capital of the Upper Palatinate. It stands on the river Vilz, which runs through its centre, dividing it into the upper and lower towns. The houses are mostly of wood, but well built, and the streets broad and clean. In the principal square are the town-house, an old Gothic building, the magnificent church of St. Martin, adorned with valuable paintings, monuments, and other curiosities. The town has an academy and lyceum; also a well-endowed hospital, and several religious houses. The other public buildings are the Castle, Arsenal, government buildings, and the Mint, which is considered one of the finest buildings of the kind in Germany. Manf. Firearms, earthenware, tobacco, iron, and woollen and linen fabrics. In the neighbourhood are iron and coal mines. It has also some breweries, besides a great repository for salt. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 49° 25′ N. Lon. 11° 50′ E.—Near Amberg the Austrians defeated the French in 1796.

AMBERGER, CHRISTOPH, am-bair'-ger, a distinguished German painter, some of whose copies pass for originals of Holbein.

Born at Nurnberg, 1490.

AMBERGRIS KEY, ăm'-ber-gris, an island in the Bay of Honduras, 30 miles from Belize. It is about 20 miles long and 3 broad. Lat. 18° 50′ N. Lon. 87° 48′ W.

AMBERT, am'-bair, a town of France, on the Dore, in the department of the Puy-de-Dôme, and 36 miles from Clermont. Manf. Woollen stuffs, ribbons, lace, linens, needles, pins, and playing-cards. From 50 to 60 mills are employed in making fine printing-paper, and the principal market for Auvergne cheeses is held in this town. Pop. about 4,000.

AMBHUR, a town in Jeypoor, British India. Once a magnificent city, but now ruinous and nearly depopulated. Lat. 26° 57′ N. Lon. 72° 20′ E.

AMBIORIX, ăm-bi'-o-rix, a king of the Eburones, in Gaul. He was a great enemy to Rome, and was killed in a battle with Cæsar, in which 60,000 of his countrymen were slain.

AMBLESIDE, ăm'-bel-side, an old and irregularly built market-town and chapelry of Westmoreland. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 1,988. —This town is beautifully situate at the northern extremity of Lake Windermere, and many Roman remains have, from time to time, been found in it.

AMBLETEUSE, am'-bel-tu(r)z, a small maritime town of France, 6 miles from Boulogne-sur-mer, in the department Pas-de-Calais. Pop. 700. —It was here that James II. landed when he fled from England in 1689. It was here also that Napoleon I. collected his flat-bottomed boats for the invasion of England, in 1804, and near the town is the column he erected to the grand army.

AMBOISE, am'-bwase, a town of France, in the department of Indre-et-Loire, on the left bank of the Loire, 15 miles from Tours. It stands at the foot of a hill on the summit of which there is an ancient fortress, once a seat of the French kings, and the place of confinement of Abd-el-Kader. The castle is that in which the Huguenots implicated in what is known as the conspiracy of Amboise met their doom. It was here too, some say, that the Calvinists, in 1568, were first called Huguenots, a term which, though applied to them contemptuously, signifies only confederates.—It is a station on the Orleans Railway. Manf. Woollens, druggets, bombazines, steel, rasps, and files. Its commerce is considerable in vinegar, brandy, and wine. Pop. 4,200.

AMBOISE, GEORGES D', a cardinal, who became successively bishop of Montauban, archbishop of Narbonne, and lastly of Rouen. Louis XII. made him prime-minister, and he soon acquired great popularity, by taking off the taxes which had usually been levied on the people at the accession of every new monarch. Subsequently to this he was appointed the pope's legate in France, with the dignity of cardinal, and in that capacity, effected a considerable reform among the religious orders.—D'Amboise was one of the wisest statesmen France ever had. He reformed the church, purified the courts of justice, remitted the burdens of the people, and conscientiously laboured to promote the public happiness.

Born at Chaumont, 1460; died at Lyons, 1510.

AMBOISE, FRANCES D', the wife of Peter II., duke of Brittany, who treated her with great brutality, which she bore with meekness. She distinguished herself by effecting a reformation in the manners of the Bretons. On the death of the duke, in 1457, she was solicited in marriage by the prince of Savoy, but refused the offer, and retired into a monastery.

Died 1485.

AMBOOR, am'-boor, a town and district of Hindostan, in the territory of Arcot, 108 miles from Madras. Lat. 12° 49′ N. Lon. 78° 46′ E.

AMBOYNA, ăm-boi'-na, an island in the Eastern seas, the chief of the Moluccas, the others being dependent on its jurisdiction. It is 32 miles long and 10 broad at its widest part, but generally it is not more than 5 or 6 miles broad. The area is 280 square miles.

Description.—This island is composed of two peninsulas, called Hittoo and Leitimor, joined by the narrow isthmus Bagoovala, which is not more than 2 miles across. It is generally hilly, but the verdure is rich and the vegetation vigorous. Water is plentiful, although the streams are small.

Products.—The great production of Amboyna is the clove-tree, which has been carefully cultivated for centuries. The cloves are collected twice a year; the average quantity produced in the island annually exceeds 600,000 lbs.; in some years it amounts to a million. Coffee is plentiful, and the soil and climate are well adapted for the culture of indigo, which is produced of a very fine quality. The sago-tree flourishes, and supplies the inhabitants with a wholesome article of diet. Cotton and cinnamon are also successfully cultivated.

Animals.—Deer and wild boars are found in the woods. There are few sheep, and still fewer black cattle, scarcely enough being reared to supply the European part of the population. Buffaloes, horses, and goats are kept; but of the domesticated animals none, except hogs, are indigenous to the country. Birds, though not numerous in point of species, are abundant, whilst insects of the most brilliant hues are everywhere to be seen.

Climate. Healthy, and more agreeable than the generality of intertropical situations.

Population. About 50,000; comprising the aboriginal Malay race, Chinese, and Europeans.

Lat. 3° 41′ S. Lon. 128° 19′ E.

History.—In 1515 this island was discovered by the Portuguese, who, in 1564, took possession of it, and introduced the Roman Catholic religion. In 1605 the Dutch expelled the Portuguese, and introduced Protestantism, and in 1615 the English made an unsuccessful attempt to share in their conquest. They contrived, however, to keep a factory here until 1623, when the Dutch governor, by unexampled treachery, got the whole members of it into his power, and put them to death by the most cruel tortures. Cromwell compelled the Dutch government to give £300,000, and a small island to the descendants of those who suffered. Amboyna, after having enjoyed a long period of undisturbed repose, was conquered by a British force under Admiral Rainier in 1796. It was restored on the Peace of Amiens, in 1801, and, in February, 1810, was recaptured, during the war, but in 1814, again ceded to Holland by the treaty of Paris.

AMBOYNA, the capital of the above island, and also of the Dutch Moluccas, is situate in the peninsula of Leitimor, in a deep bay, which, at the site of the town, is 2 miles across, with deep water. Pop. about 13,000. Lat. 3° 41′ 7″ S. Lon. 128° 10′ E.

AMBOZES, ăm-bo′-zes, three small islands on the coast of Benin. Lat. 4° 15′ N.

AMBRACIA, ăm-brai′-she-a, a city of Epirus, near the Acheron, the residence of King Pyrrhus about 295 B.C. The site of the modern Arta.

AMBRACIUS SINUS, ăm-brai′-she-us si-nus, a bay of the Ionian Sea, near Ambracia, about 35 miles long, narrow at the entrance, but, within, about 12 miles in breadth.

AMBRONES, ăm-bro′-nes, certain nations of Gaul, who subsisted by rapine and plunder. They were conquered by Marius.

AMBROSE, ST., ăm′-brose, the son of a prefect of Gaul, who became consular prefect of Liguria and Æmilia, and afterwards bishop of Milan. In 383 he was deputed by the emperor Valentinian to prevail upon the tyrant Maximus not to enter Italy, and was successful in his mission. Subsequently, however, Maximus entered Italy, made himself master of the Western empire, and entered Milan in triumph. Valentinian sought refuge with Theodosius, who defeated Maximus, and restored the fugitive monarch to his throne. While Theodosius was in Italy, an insurrection arose in Thessalonica, in which the emperor's lieutenant was slain. Theodosius in revenge put to death a vast number of persons in cold blood. Soon after this massacre, he came to Milan, and was about to enter the great church, when he was met on its threshold by Ambrose, who refused him admittance as a homicide; and it was not till a year afterwards, and his showing tokens of repentance, that the prelate would admit him to Christian communion. The Ambrosian library, at Milan, was so named in honour of Ambrose.

Born at Milan, 340; died 397.

AMBROSE OF ALEXANDRIA, converted to the Christian faith by Origen, and stated to have died a martyr. Lived in the beginning of the third century.

AMBROSE, ISAAC, a nonconformist divine, who, on the breaking out of the civil wars, quitted the Church of England, took the Covenant, and became a presbyterian preacher, first at Garstang, and afterwards at Preston. His works are much esteemed by the Calvinists, particularly one entitled "Looking unto Jesus."

Born 1591; died 1664.

AMBROSIUS AURELIANUS, ăm-bro′-se-us aw-re′-le-ai′-nus, king of the Britons. About A.D. 457 he came from Armorica, to assist in expelling the Saxons, who had been invited over by Vortigern. On the death of that monarch, the sovereignty was vested in him, and he maintained the dignity with credit. The famous king Arthur was brought up under him.

Died at Winchester 508.

AMBRYSSUS, ăm-bris′-us, a city of Phocis, also called from a hero of the same name. It was situate in a country which abounded in a plant producing a scarlet dye, by means of an insect which was found in its berries. This city was destroyed by the Amphictyons, and rebuilt and fortified by the Thebans before the battle of Chæronea. It was taken by Quintius Flaminius in the Macedonian war, and its ruins may be seen near the village of Dystomo.

AMEILHON, HUBERT PASCAL, a′-mail-hawng, a Frenchman, who was the means of saving many valuable libraries, amounting in all to 800,000 volumes, during the revolutionary triumph of the populace of Paris. He was also a considerable contributor to periodical literature, and wrote a work entitled "The History of the Commerce and Navigation of the Egyptians under the Ptolemies."

Born 1730; died 1811.

AMELIA, ă-me′-le-a, a county of Virginia, U.S. Pop. 10,000. At the court-house is a post village, 58 miles S.W. of Richmond.

AMELIA, an island in the Atlantic, on the coast of East Florida, 7 leagues N. of St. Augustine, at the mouth of St. Mary's river. Lat. 30° 28′ N. It is 13 miles long and 2 broad. Its chief town is Fernandina.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE, ABRAHAM NICHOLAS, French political writer. He wrote a history of the Government of Venice, and translated "The Prince" of Machiavelli, Socrates, and other authors.

Born at Orleans, 1634, died at Paris, 1706.

AMELOTTE, DENYS, a French ecclesiastic, and prominent opponent of the Jansenists. He translated the New Testament into French.

Born at Saintes, 1606; died at Paris, 1678.

AMERBACH, JOHANN, a′-mer-bak, a Swiss printer of Basel, who was the first to make use of the Roman type instead of the Gothic and Italian.

Died 1515.

AMERCATE, or OMERKOTE, a′-mer-kat, a celebrated fortress in the desert of Scinde, India, where the emperor Akbar was born in 1542. It formerly contained treasure of the ameers of Scinde, who, in 1813, took it from the rajah of Joudpoor. Lat. 25° 22′ N. Lon. 69° 47′ E.

AMERIA, ă-mer′-e-a, an ancient town of Umbria, S.W. of Spoletum, the birthplace of Sextus Roscius. Its low and moist valleys were famous for willow-trees.

AMERICA, ă-mer′-e-ka, one of the great divisions of the earth. With its dependent islands, it is four times as large as Europe, one-third larger than Africa, somewhat less than Asia, and nearly five times as large as Australia. It is bounded on the E. by the North and South Atlantic Ocean, which separates it from Africa and Europe; and on the W. by the North and South Pacific Ocean, which separates it from Asia and Australia. From Asia, however, it is divided only by Behring's Straits, not more than 48 miles wide at their narrowest part. This vast continent consists of two peninsulas and a central part, named, respectively, NORTH, SOUTH, and CENTRAL AMERICA; and as Africa is joined to Asia by a narrow neck of land, called the Isthmus of Suez, so the two great divisions N. and S. of this continent, are connected by the Isthmus of Panama or Darien, which, at its narrowest part, is only 28 miles in width. Its average width, however, is about 40 miles. The islands to the north extend beyond the 82nd degree of north latitude, and the most southerly point of the islands is in 56° S. latitude. This gives an extreme length of about 9,600 miles. The mainland extends from Boothia Felix, in the north, and Cape Froward, in the south, about 8,757 miles. The greatest breadth S. of the equator is between Cape St. Roque, in Brazil, and Cape Parina in Peru, where it is over 3,250 miles. Its greatest breadth N. of the equator is between Cape Canso, in Nova Scotia, and Cape Lookout, where it is more than 3,100 miles. The extent, including the islands, is as follows:—

North America	7,897,741
Central America	174,861
South America	7,241,000
West Indies	89,730

The coast line is, with the exception of Europe, the most extended of any of the great divisions of the globe. In America, nature appears on the grandest scale of magnificence and sublimity. Whether we regard her mountains, cataracts, rivers, lakes, forests, or plains, she is distinguished by a vastness almost unrivalled in any other part of the globe. Out of the 270 active volcanoes, the estimated number on the face of the earth, 190 are on the shores and islands of America; and although, in height, some of the peaks of the Asiatic Himalayas surpass those of the Andes, in extent the range of the former is inferior to that of the latter. AMERICA NORTH, CENTRAL, and SOUTH, are particularly described under the several headings.

Pop. about 85,000,000, of whom, according to the best estimates, 10,000,000 represent the indigenous population. About one-half of the entire population are of Anglo-Saxon descent.

Islands.—In the Arctic Ocean, the principal are, Cockburn, Southampton, Melville, Bathurst, and Cornwallis. In the Atlantic, Newfoundland, Prince Edward's, Cape Breton; the West Indies, composed of the Catoomas, the Bermudas, the Great Antilles (consisting of Cuba, Hayti or St. Domingo, Jamaica, and Porto Rica; the Lesser Antilles, comprehending the Leeward and Windward Islands. (See WEST INDIES.) In the Pacific, the Patagonian archipelago, of which Wellington is the largest; Chiloe, Juan Fernandez, Galapagos, Vancouver's, Queen Charlotte's, Prince of Wales, Sitka, and the Aleutian Islands. In the Antarctic Ocean, Terra del Fuego (the land of fire), Staten, Desolation; S. Georgia, S. Orkneys, S. Shetlands, Graham Land, and Trinity Land. The islands of the Arctic and Antarctic oceans are uninhabited. The S. Shetlands have the lowest known volcano, it being not more than 80 feet high, and the West India Islands are the most volcanic and mountainous.

Prehistoric America.—It is now established that as early as the 10th century, Scandinavian voyagers had landed on the North American continent, and penetrated so far south as the present state of Massachusetts; and there is a tradition that in the 12th century Madoc, a Welsh prince, after a voyage of several weeks' duration in a westerly direction, reached a strange land, which could only have been America, and most probably a portion of Virginia. But the real discovery of America by navigators of the eastern world must date from the end of the 15th century, when the genius and enterprise of Columbus and his followers revealed the New World to the Old. The Spanish adventurers found there powerful kingdoms and numerous populations, and to the accounts they were able to collect from oral testimony and tradition, the evidence supplied by subsequent, and in most cases recent researches, and the vast ruins and traces of extinct peoples, we are indebted for all that is known of the inhabitants of America in the prehistoric ages. The early races of North America preserve vague traditions of more powerful nations who preceded them, and Mexican and Peruvian legends indicate the probability that at some remote period strangers from the Old World, in some unexplained manner, reached and settled on American shores. Some of the native tribes of South America have customs resembling those of the savages of the Indian Archipelago, of the Andaman Islands, and of Australia. Some writers on ethnology, indeed, have expressed a strong opinion that America was first peopled by emigrants from the opposite shores of Africa, Western Europe, Eastern Asia, and Polynesia. In North America, throughout the entire length of the valley of the Mississippi, are many thousand remains of earthworks and fortifications of great size and strength, sometimes enclosing considerable areas, and occasionally arranged so as to represent grotesquely huge men and animals. The ramparts vary in thickness, and are in some places thirty feet high. It is utterly unknown who raised these extensive works. Farther south, in Central America, are enormous pyramids and temples, now almost overgrown with vegetation, reared in all probability by the Great Aztec people, and which are described under the headings HONDURAS, MEXICO, PALENQUE, and YUCATAN. The Spanish discoverers found the great empire of Mexico, including the provinces now known as Mexico, Puebla, Oaxaca, Vera Cruz, and part of Valladolid, occupying an area of 130,000 square miles. The annals of the country, preserved in picture writing, and the authenticity of which must not be too readily accepted, trace back the history to about a thousand years before the time when Cortes visited the country, Montezuma, the reigning monarch being the eighth of the dynasty. Peru, the other great American empire discovered by the Spaniards, was larger than Mexico, having an area of about 500,000 square miles. It was, in some respects, more advanced in civilization than the more northern state; but there were no records, and the national legends can not be relied upon for historical information.

Existing Aboriginal Races.—The name Indian is frequently but incorrectly given to all the aboriginal races inhabiting the vast continent. It originated in the idea that Columbus, on his first voyage, had reached India by a western route. From the same erroneous supposition is derived the name of the West Indies. The races differ greatly in stature, but there is in many respects a great similarity. Long black hair is a characteristic of all the American tribes, and the beard is either very scanty or entirely wanting. As a rule the skin is of a brown or rather cinnamon colour, and does not appear to be the effect of climate; but there are many remarkable variations in individuals. The figure is generally muscular and well-proportioned, and the stature tall. The small-sized Esquimaux of the extreme north appear to have an affinity with the Mongolian races of North Asia and Europe. The inhabitants of Terra del Fuego, in the extreme south, who are estimated to number about 2,000, are of low stature and ill-shaped, with large heads, and an extremely repulsive aspect, forming a remarkable contrast to the very tall and finely-formed Patagonians, a few degrees farther north. Ethnologists differ greatly in attempting a classification of the American races; but the division into groups adopted by Dr. Morton is perhaps the most satisfactory. He distinguishes the groups as the Appalachian, including all the natives of North America, except the Mexicans (described as Toltecan); the Brazilian, including the people of Brazil and Paraguay; the Patagonian, including the natives of the mountains of Chili, and the country south of the Plata as far as the Straits of Magalhaens; and the Fuegans, whom we have already noticed. This widely-spread aboriginal people are divided into innumerable tribes; but, like most indigenous populations of inferior mental capacity, are rapidly diminishing before the advance of more highly organised and civilised races. The number of native American languages is estimated at 450. The Esquimaux inhabit the north coast of the continent, and live entirely by fishing. On the north-west coast, from Cook's Inlet to Lat. 48° N., are tribes of a distinct character, one of them being distinguished by complexions of European fairness and reddish hair. The "Red Indians," as they are frequently named, were once spread over the whole length of North America, between the Mississippi valley and the eastern coast. They may be described as consisting of three great nations, (each subdivided into many independent or semi-independent tribes)—the Delawares, the Iroquois, and the Florida Indians. The northern tribes generally possess some definite religious ideas, recognizing a Supreme Power, or Great Spirit, and an evil influence which they try to propitiate; but the South American aborigines have little conception of any religious truths whatever. Of the more highly organized races, to which the name of Toltecan has been given, including the Mexicans, Aztecs, and Peruvians, very little can now be identified. Oppression, slavery, and intermarriages with European traces have almost entirely obliterated all traces of a once great people.

Political Divisions.—There are in America, including its islands, one empire, nineteen independent republics, and possessions and colonies of six European states.

Empire—Brazil.

Republics—United States, Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chili, the Argentine Republic, Uruguay, Paraguay, Costa Rica, Mosquitea, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, San Salvador, Hayti, and San Domingo.

European Possessions and Colonies—British North America, British Honduras, British Guiana, and British West Indies. France has settlements in French Guiana; St Pierre and Mequelon, near Newfoundland; and the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe. Denmark has colonies at Santa Cruz, St. Thomas and St. John, in the West Indies. Holland has small dependencies in the West Indies. Spain owns Cuba and Porto Rico. Sweden possesses the island of St. Bartholomew in the West Indies.

Geographical Discoveries.—	A.D.
Lief and Bjorn, Icelanders, reached Rhode Island, and established a colony	1001
Columbus reached and took possession of one of the Bahama Islands, which he named San Salvador	1492
Second voyage of Columbus, in which he discovered the Caribbee Islands and Jamaica	1493-6
John Cabot (sent out by Henry VII. of England) discovered Labrador on the coast of North America	1497
Columbus, on his third voyage, reached the mainland	1498
Ojeda discovers Surinam and the Gulf of Venezuela	1499
Cabral, a Portuguese, reached Brazil and the mouth of the Amazon	1500
Columbus made a fourth voyage, and explored the coast of the isthmus of Darien	1502
Coast of Florida discovered by Ponce de Leon	1512
Vasco de Balboa crossed the isthmus of Darien and first saw the Pacific ocean	1513
Mexico discovered by Fernando de Cordova	1517
Magellan passed through the straits named after him	1520
Pizarro discovered the coast of Quito	1526
Pizarro conquered Peru	1531-2
Jacques Cartier, a Frenchman, discovered the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and sailed up the river as far as Montreal	1545
California discovered by Grijalva	1535
Buenos Ayres founded by Mendoza	1535
De Soto, a Frenchman, explored the Mississippi	1542
New Albion, on the north-west coast, discovered by Sir Francis Drake	1575
John Davis discovered the straits which bear his name	1587
Hudson's Bay discovered by him	1610
Passage round Cape Horn, discovered by Schouten, a Dutch navigator	1610
Baffin explored the bay named after him	1618

AMERICA, NORTH.—This division, although, on the whole, exhibiting a greater degree of irregularity in its form than that of the South, is more uniform in its width, and consequently has a larger surface. The area is 7,897,741 square miles. The whole coast-line of North America on the eastern and western shores, and northern shores (the last of no practical value, being in the frost-bound Arctic Region), may be computed at about 22,800 miles. Such an immense extent of coast renders this division favourable for commerce, whilst the irregularity of its form produces the peninsulas of Alaska and California on the W., and Yucatan, Florida, Nova Scotia, and Labrador on the E. The principal capes are Point Barrow, the most northern; Bathurst, Farewell, Chudleigh, Charles, Breton, Race, Sable, Cod, Hatteras, Tancha or Sable, Catoche, Gracias à Dios, and St. Antonio, on the N. and E.; on the W. Corrientes, St. Lucas, Mendocino, and Prince of Wales, which is the most western point. The chief straits are Davis's, Barrow's, Hudson's, Belleisle, Bahama Channel, Windward Passage, Mona Passage, on the N. and W.; and Behring's Sraits, which separate N. America from Asia. The more important bays, gulfs, seas, and inlets, are Baffin's Bay, Hudson's Bay, with James's Bay and Chesterfield Inlet; the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Bay of Fundy, Delaware Bay, Chesapeake Bay, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Bay of Campeachy; the Carribean Sea, the Bay of Honduras, on the N. and E.; on the W. the Bay of Panama, the Gulf of California, Queen Charlotte's Sound, and Behring's Sea, or Sea of Kamchatka. On account of nearly all the seas of this division being on the E. side, and their tidal currents travelling west, they are much higher than the inland seas of the Old World, such as the Baltic and Mediterranean, which open to the W. In the Bay of Fundy the tide rises 70 feet, which is higher than any other known. North America may be regarded as a vast central valley, bounded on the N. by an extensive system of lakes, on the S. by the Gulf of Mexico, on the W. by the Rocky Mountains, and on the E. by the Alleghanies, and drained by the mighty Mississippi. In this valley the most luxuriant vegetation is to be found, stretching from the shores of the Gulf of Mexico on the S. to the banks of the great lakes and the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the N.; whilst towards the bases of the western boundary are vast steppes, or plains, destitute of trees, and desolate, dreary, and uninviting by their very immensity. During the summer heats these are burned to a melancholy brown; vegetation is scorched and shrivelled up as a thin piece of leather touched with fire; whilst during the winter they are swept by the winds of the Rocky Mountains to such a degree as to render their atmosphere so intensely cold as scarcely to be borne. Along the base of these mountains a series of sandy deserts, with an average breadth of from 400 to 600 miles, stretch to the 41st degree of N. latitude. Towards the mouth of the Mississippi there are marshes covering a space of 35,000 square miles. In the valley itself occur extensive elevated prairies or savannahs, as treeless as they are boundless to the view—in some places waving with long grass in the spring, and painted with beautiful flowers, exhaling charming perfumes; in others destitute of vegetation, stricken with a hideous sterility; so that they may be traversed for days without a shrub being seen, except on the banks of the wandering streams by which they are watered. Notwithstanding the advances which civilization has made in this valley, immense tracts are still covered with primeval woods; with all these drawbacks, however, millions of acres of the richest and most fertile land still remain waiting the culture of man to yield him subsistence. Geographers generally recognize five regions, distinct in their special characteristics.—The Mississippi valley, just noticed; the eastern slope of the Alleghanies, with large forests and a rich soil; the elevated part between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific; the plateau of Mexico, and the great northern sterile plain north of Lat. 50° N.

Mountains.—The Rocky Mountains, the Alleghany or Appalachian, the Cordilleras of Mexico and Guatemala, the Ozark, and the Californian or Maritime range. The Rocky Mountains stretch along the west coast, at a distance varying from 50 to 300 miles from the sea, and terminate at the Frozen Ocean, on the west side of the Mackenzie river; the whole length being not less than 8,700 miles. The most elevated peaks are Holy Cross, 17,000 feet; Bythorn, 15,000; and Mount Lincoln, 14,300. The Alleghany range stretches along the east coast, with a mean elevation of 2,500 feet, and in four separate groups, traversing the country generally from a northeast to a south-west direction. The several ridges are known by different names, as Blue Ridge, Alleghany Ridge, North Jackson's, also Laurel, Cumberland and (in New Hampshire) White Mountains. In the latter group Mount Washington attains the height of 6,428 feet, which is, however, exceeded by Mount Guyot, in N. Carolina, the loftiest point of the entire system. This range is about 1,200 miles in length, beginning at about the 34th degree N. lat., and terminating at the banks of the St. Lawrence. The Ozark Mountains are a branch of the Rocky Mountains, crossing the Arkansas, and appearing, under that name, in the state of Missouri. Their general direction is parallel to that of the Alleghanies, on the west side of the continent. The Californian or Maritime chain lies to the west of the Rocky Mountains, and is connected with them by a remarkable table-land, named by its explorers the Great Basin. It is the land of salt lakes, the largest of which lies at an elevation of 4,220 feet above the level of the sea, and the territory occupies 130,000 square miles. This saline solitude is almost entirely uninhabited, and not one of the rivers by which it is watered finds its way to the sea. This is the character of the plateau which, with transverse ridges, amongst which are the Snowy Mountains, connects the Rocky Mountains with the Californian Maritime Alps, wherein Mounts Hood, Fairweather, and St. Elias, lift their heads respectively to the heights of 12,000, 14,700, and 17,900 feet above the level of the sea. The general height of this range exceeds that of the Rocky Mountains. Mount Elias is the culminating point of North America, and is situate in Aliaska, formerly Russian America, in the 60th degree of N. latitude. The Mexican and Guatemala Cordilleras may be regarded as a continuation of the Andes of South America, and in Orizaba and Popocatepetl attain respectively the elevation of 17,373 and 17,884 feet above the sea level. The Mexican Cordillera divides into three parts near the Tropic of Cancer. One runs for about 100 miles parallel to the eastern coast; another runs in a north-western direction, towards the Gulf of California; and the third divides the source of the Rio Gila from the Rio Bravo del Norte.

Volcanoes.—In no part of the globe are these terrific phenomena so appalling as in the New World. In the mountains of Guatemala there are 38 volcanoes, in Mexico 6, in Aliaska 4, in the Aleuttian islands 32. With the exception of Java, there is no more powerful volcanic agency in the world than that which is found in the Aleutian islands and Mexico. They generally eject scoriæ and ashes, in place of lava, which probably, from their great height, becomes partially solid before it reaches the mouths of their craters. Some of these volcanoes attain an elevation of 17,000 feet.

Rivers.—The Mississippi (great river), and its tributaries the Missouri (mud river), which receives the Yellow-stone and the Platte; the Arkansas, which receives the Red River; and the Illinois and Ohio, which receives the Tennessee. These drain the great plain or valley of the Mississippi, and the accumulated waters are discharged into the Gulf of Mexico. The Mackenzie, a very large river, draining an area of at least 550,000 square miles, and its tributaries, Peace River and Athabasca, the Coppermine and the Back, run north into the Arctic Ocean. The St. Lawrence, and its tributary the Ottawa; the Nelson, with its tributary the Saskatchewan; and the Churchill, with its tributary the Beaver, run east to the Atlantic. The St. John, the Hudson, the Delaware, and the Susquehanna drain the country east of the Alleghanies; the Rio del Norte (river of the north) drains the country east of the Mexican mountains; the Oregon or Columbia, with its tributary the Snake, and the Colorado (coloured), and the Sacramento, the country west of the Rocky Mountains, discharging into the Pacific, as does the Fraser, which takes its course through British Columbia. The Mississippi, united with the Missouri, is the second largest river in the world. The basin comprises about 1,350,000 square miles, and its delta is little more than an immense marsh or swamp, covered with reeds and infested with alligators. The length from the source of the Missouri to the point of discharge is 4,300 miles. It is navigable to nearly 3,000 miles from the sea, and, including the numerous tributaries, some of them important streams, there are 35,000 miles of navigable waters. (See MISSISSIPPI.) The St. Lawrence, at Montreal, has a breadth of 3 or 4 miles, and its length from the lower extremity of Lake Ontario to the sea is about 1,700 miles. For ships of the line it is navigable as far as Quebec, and for vessels of 600 tons as far as Montreal. It has been estimated that the basin of this river, including the lakes from whence it flows, contains more than the half of the fresh water on the earth. The length of water communication through the lakes is 2,200 miles, with 4,000 miles of navigable waters, and the area of drainage is 600,000 square miles.

Lakes.—The largest in the world. The principal are Superior, Huron, Michigan, Erie, Great Slave Lake, Winnipeg, Great Bear Lake, Ontario, Lake Champlain, Little Winnipeg, Deer Lake, Athabasca, Lake of the Woods, and the Great Salt Lake. Lakes Superior, Huron, and Michigan may be considered to form, in fact, but one lake, as they are all connected, and include by far the largest body of fresh water on the globe. Between lakes Ontario and Erie are the celebrated Niagara Falls. (See NIAGARA.) The following are the dimensions of the principal lakes :—

	Area. Sq. miles.	Average depth. Feet.	Height above sea. Feet.
Superior	43,000	988	641
Huron	25,000	300	595
Michigan	25,000	900	595
Erie	11,000	200	565
Ontario	10,000	500	231
Great Slave Lake	12,000
Winnipeg	9,000
Great Bear Lake	8,000
Chapala (Mexico)	1,300

Forests.—The most extensive on the globe, some of them covering an area of 60,000 square miles, distinguished by the height and variety of the trees of which they are composed, and in some cases by the dazzling beauty of the flowers with which they are adorned. Within the tropics, palms and tree-ferns spread out their sheltering foliage, where the mahogany, logwood, and other dye-trees attain perfection. In the United States, the sycamore, black walnut, chestnut, maple, hickory, white cedar, red birch, wild cherry, locust-tree, oak, and ash abound; whilst the tulip-tree, the pride of the American forest, attains the highest perfection. The woods of Canada consist principally of pines and birches, oaks and ashes, the red beech, the hickory, and the tall Canadian poplar. Penetrating the Arctic regions, the flora of America, like that of other high latitudes, becomes less and less abundant, more stinted in growth, until almost every trace of vegetation is buried beneath a sheet of perpetual snow. Not a single heath is indigenous to America, whilst the cactus is peculiar to it.

Zoology.—Wild Animals. These consist of polar and grizzly bears, the puma, wolf, fox, beaver, racoon, and other fur animals; the elk, the bison, musk-ox, moose-deer, and rein-deer; the big-horned sheep, and the goat of the Rocky Mountains. The grizzly bear (Ursus ferox) is the most formidable of all the animals of N. America, ranging from Mexico as far north as the 61st degree of latitude. The bison, or American buffalo, is the largest native quadruped of the New World, and may be considered as the monarch of the prairie lands of the Rocky Mountains, where his species is to be seen in immense herds, but they are diminishing in numbers. The musk-ox roams over the sterile tracts which lie N. of the 60th parallel, and several species of deer browse among the barren valleys and brown hills of the mountain districts. The Rocky Mountain goat, like the chamois of the Alps, inhabits the most inaccessible heights of its native region, and the Rocky Mountain sheep is much larger than the largest varieties of the domestic breeds. The wolf of America is a fierce animal, running down and devouring deer, and if severely pressed with hunger, even breaking into huts and devouring the dogs. The prairie wolf hunts in packs, and is an animal of great speed. The dogs of America are now domesticated, and the most remarkable among them are the Newfoundland and the Mackenzie River dog, a small, slight, and affectionate animal. All the other kinds are both big and fierce. Foxes abound, and the American red fox supplies England annually with a large number of skins. Beavers, otters, racoons, hares, marmots, squirrels, opossums, musk-rats, and porcupines are all to be found, and are more or less sought after by the inhabitants as objects of pleasure or profit. With the exception of bears, the beasts of prey are neither many nor formidable. Birds. These are extremely numerous. There are in N. America nearly 700 species of birds, and of these nearly 400 are peculiar to the country. Eagles, hawks, and owls are plentiful; turkeys abound in the woods, and the passenger pigeon flies in such flocks as to darken the country over which they pass. Reptiles. Numerous, especially in the United States, and some of them dangerous. The most noted is the rattle-snake, the bite of which is fatal to man and beast, unless a remedy is immediately applied. The hog is the only animal which is not injured by the bite of this reptile, and which feeds upon them. The pike-muzzled cayman is a native of the southern states, and haunts the Mississippi, and frogs and toads, measuring from 6 to 15 inches long, are abundant. Insects. In the tropical regions especially, almost every description of these appear in myriads. The mosquitoes are such intolerable pests, that they greatly interfere with the happiness of the natives. In the back-woods of N. America, however, they are turned to some profitable account. The Indians set fire to the woods, and the bisons, knowing that mosquitoes will not follow them where there is smoke, take shelter among the burning forests, where they become an easy prey to the huntsman, who is lying in wait for them. Fish. Every description abounds along the coasts and in the rivers. In no part of the world are there to be found so many cod as to the E. of Cape Breton, and on the banks of Newfoundland. Domestic Animals. The same as in Europe. At the discovery of America there were no domestic animals except the lama; but since then the different varieties of the European kinds have been introduced, and are now common.

Climate.—Healthy and variable, according to latitude and locality. On account of the severity of the climate N. of 50°, the greater part of America is barren; but in other parts the temperature is generally lower than in corresponding latitudes in the Old World. Every variety of temperature, however, is to be found, in accordance with the difference of latitude and elevation. The temperate zone is often marked by sudden and violent changes, and the torrid by the extremes of wet and drought.

Productions.—Maize, or Indian corn, is the only important farinaceous plant peculiar to America, and it is extensively cultivated. All the European cerealia are largely produced; and millet, pimento, cocoa, vanilla, copaiba, sassafras, nux vomica, jalap, tobacco, and the cochineal plant and the potato, are indigenous. The native fruits are mostly of the nut kind; but apples, oranges, lemons, and peaches arrive at a high state of perfection. The vine and the tea-plant do not succeed, whilst cotton, sugar, and coffee are amongst the staple productions. The pine-apple is grown largely in fields, as we grow turnips, and great quantities of it are now regularly shipped to England.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, tin, copper, lead, iron, coal, and salt. Gold is produced in large quantities in Mexico and California, and in 1857 was discovered at the Fraser river, in British Columbia. Silver and precious stones are found in Mexico; copper in Mexico, Cuba, and the United States; lead, iron, and coal, in the United States and the British possessions. The united area of all the known coal-fields is about 200,000 square miles, twenty times the extent of the coal-fields of Europe. Salt is found in nearly all parts of the continent.

Inhabitants.—The aborigines, the Indian, or copper-coloured; the settlers, Circassian, from Europe; the Negro, from Africa; and the Esquimaux. The British and their descendants are found principally in the United States, Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and some of the West India Islands; the Spanish in Mexico; the French, in Lower Canada, and along the banks of the lower Mississippi; the Negroes, in the southern states and the West Indies. A large portion of N. America is still occupied by the aboriginal tribes, comprising the N.W. parts of British America; the W. parts of the United States, and the N. parts of Spanish America. They are estimated to number about 300,000, and upwards of 300,000 of them are within the boundaries of the United States.

AMERICA CENTRAL, connects the two continents of N. and S. America, but its limits have not been exactly defined. It is 800 or 900 miles long, with a breadth varying from between 20 and 30 miles to 340 to 400. The area is stated to be 174,861 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and volcanic. Its whole length is traversed by a chain of mountains, which is connected with the Andes of S. and the Rocky Mountains of N. America. This chain divides itself into three groups; the Costa Rica, the Honduras and Nicaragua, and the Guatemala groups. The first traverses the Isthmus of Panama; the second is detached from the other by Lake Nicaragua and the river San Juan; and the third is remarkable as containing the largest number of active volcanoes to be found anywhere within the same space, with the exception of the island of Java.

Rivers.—These, though numerous, are in general small, from the narrowness of the territory in which they flow, and their courses rarely exceed 250 miles, and many of them are under 50. The Usumasinta, falling into the Gulf of Campeachy, is the largest.

Lakes.—The principal are Nicaragua, 100 miles long and 50 broad, the Leon or Managua, Golfo Doce, Golfete, Atitlan, Peten, Amatitlan, Guija, and Cojutepeque.

Forests.—Extensive and valuable. The woods of Panama are composed of 100 different kinds of trees, luxuriating in a hot, moist climate, destructive to animal life. Here grow the mahogany-tree, the lignum vitæ, and logwood; and here are obtained sarsaparilla, pimento, black or Peruvian balsam, vanilla, and various other drugs and gums of great value in a commercial point of view.

Zoology.—The animals differ but little from those of some other parts of America. The manati, found at the mouth of the Rio Juan, and the winged squirrel are peculiar to it; and the most remarkable of the feathered tribes are its humming-birds. The quezel and the great macaw spread out their magnificent plumage of green and gold, and seem, beneath the rays of a tropical sun, as if they were created only to dazzle by the variety of their splendours. Serpents and insects abound, whilst along the coasts, and in the rivers and lakes, fish are plentiful.

Climate.—Owing to the inequality of the surface this is exceedingly various. The dry season lasts from October to May, and the rest of the year is called the wet season, although it rains only during the night.

Produce.—In the higher table lands all the European cereals, as well as fruits and vegetables, besides plantations of aloe, whence a spirituous liquor is distilled. In the warmer regions maize, sugar-cane, mandioca, bananas, and all the kinds of tropical fruits. Indigo, tobacco, cotton, and cochineal are produced, and the sweet potato is cultivated to a considerable extent.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, iron, lead, and mercury are found. Jasper and marble are quarried in Honduras, and brimstone is collected near a volcano called Quezaltenango. Salt is obtained in large quantities on the shores of the Pacific.

Political Divisions.—Central America was formerly composed of one federal state, but it is now divided into five republics, and a British territory. The republics are GUATEMALA, SAN SALVADOR, HONDURAS, NICARAGUA, and COSTA RICA; the territory is BRITISH HONDURAS.

Population.—About 3,000,000, composed of Whites and Creoles, Mestizoes, or the offspring of Whites and Indians, and the aborigines.

Lat., extending from about 7° to 18° N.

AMERICA, SOUTH, may be viewed as an irregular triangle, with its apex pointing to the south. The area is about 7,241,000 square miles. On the side of the Caribbean Sea and that of the Atlantic Ocean, the coast line has been roughly estimated at 10,000 miles, and on that of the Pacific at 5,800. Thus its line of coast as a whole may be taken at about 16,000 miles. The principal capes are Del Norte, St. Roque, Branco, which is the most eastern point; Frio, St. Antonio, Corrientes, and Froward, the most southern on the continent; Horn and Pilares, in Terra del Fuego, and Blanco, on the west. The land stretches both farther north and south in the New World than it does in the Old. Point Barrow is 72° N. and Cape Froward is 20° farther south than Cape Agulhas, in Africa. The straits are Magellan's and the straits of Le Maire. The gulfs of Darien, Maracaybo, and Para, on the E.; the Bay of Panama on the W. are the chief bays. The country may be generally described as mountainous in the west, wonderfully fertile in the basin of the Amazon, but barren towards the extreme south. In N. America, the treeless plains called prairies or savannahs, exhibit, in some parts, a boundless extent of grass, waving like a sea, and rising to the height of several feet. In the south these are called Llanos, and in Orinoco are alternately dry and wet, now baked by the sun as hard almost as burned bricks, and now covered with a luxuriant carpet of verdure vivified by the rains. At the 34th degree down to the 40th, they are called the Pampas of Buenos Ayres, and in more southern latitudes the Pampas of Patagonia. They have all the same or similar characteristics.

Mountains.—The Andes, the Guiana or Guayana, and the Brazilian, of which the principal chain is the Sierra do Espinhazo. The Andes extend from Cape Pilares, in the Straits of Magellan, where the high land begins to appear, northwards to the Isthmus of Panama or Darien, a distance of 4,180 miles in a straight line. The width of the range varies from 20 to nearly 400 miles; and in elevation they rank next to the Himalayas of Asia. Their mean height has been estimated at 12,000 feet; there are mountain passes at from 11,000 to 15,000 feet above the sea level. The entire range is geographically divided into the Patagonian, Chilian, Peruvian, Ecuador, and New Granada Andes. The loftiest peaks are—

	Feet.
Aconcagua (Chilian Andes)	22,296
Gualtieri (Bolivian)	22,000
Chimborazo (Ecuador)	21,420
Sorata (Bolivian)	21,290
Illimani (Bolivian)	21,150
Chuquibamba (Bolivian)	21,000
Arequipa (Peruvian)	20,320

These elevations are inferior only to the loftiest peaks of the Asiatic Himalayas. Besides the mountain ranges, the following extensive table lands are at a great elevation:—Assuay, 15,520 feet; Titicaca, 12,703 feet; Pasco, 11,000 feet; Quito, 9,540 feet; Bogota, 8,958 feet; Cuzco, 8,300 feet. Three extensive transverse chains pass eastward across the continent, marking the limits of the basin of the Orinoco, Amazon, and La Plata rivers. The average elevation of these chains, the "Cordilleras," is about 7,000 feet, but in some parts a much greater elevation is attained. These ranges are more particularly described under their proper headings.

Volcanoes.—There are 30 of these in S. America, all belonging to the Andes, and consisting of three separate and distinct series,—of Chili, of Quito, and of Peru and Bolivia.

Rivers.—The AMAZON, with its affluents the Yavari, Purus, Madeira, Topajos, Xingu, and Tocantin, which receives the Araguay. All these flow into the right side of the stream. The Yapura and the Negro flow into the left, and they all take an eastern direction. (See AMAZON.) The Rio de la Plata is formed by the Parana and the Uruguay; it is 2,400 miles long, drains about 1,200,000 square miles, and has 20,000 miles of navigable waters. The Parana has a tributary in the Paraguay, which again receives the Vermejo and the Pilcomayo, the Salado and the Colorado. All these have a south direction. The Orinoco, with its tributary the Casiquiare, the Magdalena, with its tributary the Canca, and the San Francisco, drain the vast portion of country lying to the north of the Great Plain. The Orinoco has a length of 1,800 miles, the area of the basin is 400,000 square miles, and there are 8,000 miles of navigable waters.

Lakes.—Titicaca and Maracaybo may be considered as the only large lakes proper in S. America, the rest being rather swamps or morasses, instead of that clear body of water to which the name of lake is usually applied. Indeed, Maracaybo can hardly be called a lake, being rather an inlet from the Caribbean Sea. Titicaca, however, covers an area of 4,000 square miles, and lies at an elevation of 12,846 feet above the level of the sea, to which it has no outlet. It is situate on the N. W. frontier of Upper Peru. Besides these there are various collections of water in the elevated valleys of the Andes, but none very large; and where the Paraguay overflows, between the 15th and 20th degrees S., a body of water of some thousands of square miles is collected, and is called Lake Xarayes.

Forests.—Nearly two-thirds of the continent are covered by dense forests. Regarding the woods generally of S. America, Humboldt observes, that they are so thick and uninterrupted in the plains between the Orinoco and the Amazon, that were it not for intervening rivers, the monkeys, almost the only inhabitants, might pass along the tops of the trees for several hundred miles, without touching the earth.

Zoology.—The most remarkable are the jaguar, or American tiger, which in size and ferocity is little inferior to the Asiatic tiger; the cougar, which is not so thick and strong as the jaguar, but equally ferocious; the tapir, the puma, or American lion, which is smaller than the lion of Africa; the spectacled bear, and the chinchilla, the panther, the leopard, the ounce, the llama, which is about four feet high, and five or six feet long, the neck like that of the camel, to which the animal itself bears a strong resemblance, excepting the hunch on the back. The alpaca, or vicunha, as it is sometimes named, belongs to the same family, and is highly valuable for the textile quality of its coat. Both the llama and the vicunha inhabit the most mountainous districts, and seem to be most vigorous and thriving where the climate is coldest. In addition to these there are the horse, armadillo, sloth, ant-eater, tiger-cat, lynx, and monkeys in immense numbers, but generally smaller than the quadrumana of Asia and Africa. Some of them are the most highly-developed tree-climbers known. The absence of cheek-pouches is a characteristic of American monkeys. The immense herds of wild horses and cattle which browse upon the Pampas and Llanos of S. America are the descendants of tame animals introduced by the Spaniards. Both were unknown there in the time of Columbus. Birds. More than 2,300 species are known. The condor, harpy eagle, nandu or American ostrich, toucans, parrots, and humming-birds. The condor usually frequents the higher Andes, and for size and strength, combined with rapidity of flight and rapacity, takes pre-eminence over all the feathered creation. According to Humboldt, the size of this bird across the wings is 9 feet, and its extreme length 3½ feet. Many of the birds which inhabit both the northern and southern parts of America are merely simple varieties of species that are found in Europe. Of this number are the geese, ducks, divers, plovers, herons, kites, falcons, blackbirds, pigeons, crows, partridges, and domestic fowls. Carrion vultures are very common, and fly in large flocks. They feed upon the numerous carcases of cattle slaughtered for the sake of their hides. They are also found extremely useful in devouring snakes and other vermin. Of eagles there are various sorts. The nandu, which is found in the Pampas, has a long neck, small head, and the bill flattened like that of the ostrich; but in other respects it more resembles the cassowary. It runs with such swiftness, that the fleetest dogs are thrown out in its pursuit. In the tropical regions of America it is impossible to enumerate the different species of birds, far less to give a distinct account of each, particularly of the beauty of their various plumages. Reptiles. The alligator, boa-constrictor, lizards, and turtles. Owing to the uncleared state of the country, America abounds in a variety of disagreeable reptiles. In the tropical regions this pest is most severely felt. Serpents of various kinds abound, particularly snakes. Of these, the most common, and, at the same time, the most poisonous, are the corales, or coral snakes, and the cascabeles, or rattlesnakes. There are also serpents of a larger species, similar to the boa-constrictor. Insects. South America swarms with monstrous centipedes, spiders of an enormous size, scorpions, chigoes, a species of insect which insinuates itself into the legs, the soles of the feet, or toes, and pierces the skin with such subtlety that it is not perceptible until it has made its way into the flesh; flies of various sorts, mountain maggots, and other annoying vermin. Great varieties of butterflies, vieing with each other in the richness of their colours, people the air; and the mosquito, which is a source of continual torment, abounds in most parts. There are many species of wild bees. Fish. The rivers are well stored with fish of every different species. The lakes of the Caraccas and Venezuela are inhabited by the electric eel, possessing the singular power of stunning its prey by an electric discharge.

Climate.—Variable. In Peru, rain scarcely ever falls, and along the low parts of the tropical countries it is exceedingly unhealthy. On the coast of the Caribbean Sea yellow fever prevails, and frightful hurricanes sweep over the Pampas. The south of South America is both cold and dry, but as two-thirds of the peninsula lie within the tropics, it has a higher temperature than North America.

Productions.—Maize, rice, bread-fruit, plantain, yam, manioc, sugar-cane, cotton, cocoa, coffee, all-spice, pepper, arrow-root, tapioca, Peruvian bark, jalap, indigo, vanilla, and ipecacuanha. Of these, rice, bread-fruit, and sugar-cane were introduced by Europeans; but from America the Old World has received maize, tobacco, all-spice, and the potato, with numerous trees and flowers, as the rhododendron, the American aloe, magnolias, dahlias, fuchsias, nasturtiums, cacti, the Victoria Regia lily, and the passion flower.

Minerals.—Gold, diamonds, and precious stones, from Brazil, Columbia, Chili, Peru, and Bolivia; silver from Bolivia, Chili, and La Plata; tin and mercury from Peru; and copper from Chili and Peru. Brazil supplies more diamonds than any other country in the world; but gold is now less plentiful than it is in California and Australia.

Political Divisions.—ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION, BOLIVIA, BRAZIL, CHILI, COLOMBIA, ECUADOR, PARAGUAY, PERU, URUGUAY, VENEZUELA. For foreign possessions, see AMERICA. See also PATAGONIA.

Inhabitants.—The aborigines, European and mixed races, and Negroes. The Spanish prevail in Columbia, Bolivia, Chili, Peru, and La Plata; the Portuguese and the Negroes mostly in Brazil.

AMERSFOORT, a'-mers-fort, a Dutch town in the province of Utrecht, on the Eem, 12 miles E.N.E. from Utrecht. It was once fortified, but the fortifications have been converted into public promenades, the gates remaining. The old church of St. Joris was built in the 13th century. Manf. Dimities, woollen goods, brandy, and glass and other wares. It has a corn, tobacco, and herring trade. Pop. about 13,000.

AMERSHAM, ăm'-er-sham, a town of Buckingham, near the river Colne, and 32 miles from Buckingham. The town consists of one long street, crossed by another of smaller dimensions. There are a handsome church and a town hall, built in 1642. Manf. The principal are cotton, straw plait, wooden chairs, sacking, and lace. Pop. 3,259.—In this parish the poet Waller was born.

AMES, FISHER, an American statesman and political writer, distinguished as a speaker and supporter of Washington. He was one of the members of the Massachusetts convention for ratifying the constitution.

Born at Dedham, Massachusetts, 1758; died 1808.

AMES, JOSEPH, secretary to the Society of Antiquaries, was originally a ship-chandler in Wapping. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, in which he acquired great eminence. —He published a work entitled "Typographical Antiquities; being an Historical Account of Printing in England, &c."

Born 1689; died 1759.

AMES, WILLIAM, a Puritan divine. He was educated at the grammar school of Ipswich and Christ's College, Cambridge, and afterwards went to Franeker, in Holland, and was chosen professor of divinity. He afterwards settled at Rotterdam as associate with Hugh Peters, who had gathered a congregation of Brownists in that city. He was accounted one of the foremost theologians of his time, and, under the Latinized form of his name, "Amasius," gained a great influence by his learned writings.

AMESBURY, or AMBRESBURY, ames'-ber-e, a town in the county of Wilts, on the Avon, 8 miles from Salisbury. Pop. 1,138.—It is now an inconsiderable place, but noted for a very beautiful mansion, built for the duke of Queensberry by Inigo Jones, for the vicinity of Stonehenge and Milston, the birthplace of Addisen. Near it is an ancient camp.

AMESTRATUS, ă-mes'-trā-tus, a town of Sicily, near the Halesus. It held out against the Romans seven months; but was obliged to yield after a third siege, when the inhabitants were sold for slaves. It is now Mistretta, in the Val de Demona.

AMESTRIS, ă-mes'-tris, queen of Persia, and wife of Xerxes. She cruelly treated the mother of Artiante, her husband's mistress, and also buried alive fourteen noble Persian youths, to appease the deities under the earth.

AMETHIE, a'-me-thē', a town in the district of Partabgurh, Oude. Pop. 10,000. Here is a small fort, the rajah of which surrendered to Lord Clyde at the commencement of the winter campaign of 1858 against the mutineers. Lat. 26° 8′. Lon. 82° 2′.

AMGA, am'-ga, a river of Siberia, rising in the mountains of Yablonoi Krebet; and after a course of 466 miles falling into the Aldan in Lon. 135° E.

AMHARA, am-ha'-ra, formerly a province, but now an independent kingdom of Abyssinia. Lat. between 10° and 14° N. Lon. between 35° 10′ and 38° 30′ E. The capital of this kingdom is Gondar. (See ABYSSINIA and GONDAR.)

AMHERST, a district of the Tenasserim division of British Burmah. It is a narrow patch of land between Siam and the Indian Ocean, consisting of fertile valleys and rich alluvial districts. The chief town is MOULMEIN, the second city in British Burmah. Pop. about 250,000, chiefly Buddhists.

AMHERST, a town and seaport in the above district. There is a large harbour. The town was founded in 1826, and named after the governor-general of India. Teak timber is largely exported. Pop 4,000. Lat. 16° 4′ N. Lon. 97° 33′ E.

AMHERST, JEFFREY, LORD, a distinguished British general, who was descended from an ancient Kentish family. He entered the army 1731, and in 1741 was aide-de-camp to General Ligonier, under whom he served at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux. In 1756 he was appointed colonel of the 15th regiment of foot; and in 1758 was made major-general, and went to America, commanding at the siege of Louisburg. Forts Duquesne, Ticonderoga, Crown Point, and Niagara, were afterwards reduced, and the British prestige, which had suffered considerably in Canada, was entirely restored. In 1763 he returned to England, having been previously made a Knight of the Bath, received the thanks of Parliament, and was appointed governor of Virginia. He subsequently was appointed to the governorship of Guernsey, and in 1776 was created Baron Amherst of Holmesdale. In 1778 he was made commander-in-chief of the army in England, and was active, but humane, in suppressing the London riots of 1780. A change of the ministry occurring, he lost his military appointments, but received them again, to voluntarily resign them in 1795, and a year afterwards he was made a field-marshal.

Born at Sevenoaks, 1717; died 1797.

AMHERST, WILLIAM PITT AMHERST, EARL, nephew of the above, who, having no child, procured the reversion of his barony for this gentleman. He was a pensioned politician and diplomatist of the Pitt administration, and in 1816 was sent out to Pekin to effect a treaty of commerce with the emperor of China; but as he would not prostrate himself before that sovereign, nothing was effected. On his return home he was wrecked in the Indian Seas, and suffered considerable hardships. He was governor-general of India from 1823 to 1828, and created an earl in 1826.

Born 1773; died 1857.

AMHERST, a county in Virginia, U.S., on the James river, 130 miles from Richmond. Area, 418 square miles. Pop. 18,709.

AMHERST, a post township of Hampshire county, Massachusetts, U.S. It is the seat of one of the best colleges in America, founded in 1821, chiefly for the purpose of educating for the ministry. There are about 260 students. The town is intersected by the Connecticut river, the water power of which is available for several factories. Pop. about 5,000.

AMHERST, a town in the colony of Victoria, Australia, formerly known as Daisy Hill, 30 miles N.W. of Ballarat. The town is well built and pleasantly situated. There are several places of worship, a hospital, and good hotels. There are remunerative gold diggings in the locality. Pop. about 800. Lat. 42° 7′ N. Lon. 63° 9′ W.

AMHERSTBURG, ăm'-herst-berg, a town of West Canada, North America, 3 miles above the entrance of the river Detroit into Lake Erie. There is a good harbour resorted to by numerous steamers. Pop. about 2,000.

AMHERST ISLES, a group lying N. and S. of the extremity of the Korean peninsula, and about 60 miles distant. Lat. 4° 25′ N. Lon. 126° E.

AMHURST, NICHOLAS, ăm'-herst, a political and satirical writer, first educated at Merchant Taylors' School, whence he was removed to St. John's College, Oxford, but expelled thence for irregularity, without taking a degree. In consequence of this disgrace, he wrote several satires against the university, under the title of "Terræ Filius," 2 vols. 12mo, 1726, and settled in London as a writer by profession.—His most celebrated undertaking was "The Craftsman," which was carried on for several years with great success. In this publication he was assisted by Lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pulteney, by whom he was neglected when they got into place.

Born at Marden, Kent, 1706; died at Twickenham, 1742.

AMICI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, constructor of optical instruments. His microscopes have a great reputation. Professor of mathematics at Modena, and superintendent of the observatory at Florence.

Born at Modena, 1786; died 1863.

AMICUS, ANTONIUS, ă-mī'-kus, a Sicilian priest, who distinguished himself by some works in history and antiquities. Philip IV. of Spain conferred on him the title of historiographer royal.

Died 1641.

AMIDA, ă-mī'-da, a city of Mesopotamia, taken by Sapor, king of Persia. It was called Constantia, in honour of the emperor Constantius, who fortified it. It is now named Diarbekr, or Cara-Amid.

AMIENS, a'-me-ens, formerly the chief town of Picardy, now the capital of the department of the Somme. It is the centre of a large general trade, and stands on the banks of the Somme, at a distance of about 40 miles from the English Channel. The town is agreeably situate, and the streets of the new part are straight, broad, and well-built; but the older portion of the town is closely built, and cut up by numerous canals. It contains a Hôtel de Ville, with beautiful painted arcades, a large public library with 60,000 volumes, a museum, a theatre, a corn-hall, and cavalry barracks; is a bishop's see, and has a royal court, a royal college, an academy of sciences, a university, a school of design, a botanical garden, a court of assize, and commercial tribunals. Amiens was once a place of considerable strength, and played an important part in the wars of the middle ages. Its most celebrated building is a magnificent Gothic cathedral, which is one of the finest in Europe. It was commenced in 1220, and finished in 1288; it has recently been restored. Its exterior exhibits one of the grandest spectacles which architectural skill has ever produced; whilst the mind is deeply impressed by the exquisite proportions, the great height, and the noble simplicity which everywhere meet the eye. Its length is 442 feet, and the vault is 140 feet high, which is half as high again as that of Westminster. The spire has an elevation of 420 feet. There are very fine boulevards, squares, and promenades. The town was the birthplace of Peter the Hermit, Gabrielle d'Estrées, Ducange, and the astronomer Delambre, and is a principal station on the Northern Railway of France.

Manufactures.—Cotton velvets, kerseymeres, woollen and linen cloths, flax, beetroot sugar, soap, leather, and paper.

Population.—74,170.

History.—The town occupies the site of the ancient Samarobriva, chief town of the Ambiani, from whom the name of the town is probably derived.

Taken by the Spanish and retaken by the French	1597
Treaty of peace between Great Britain, Holland, France, and Spain signed here	1801
Taken by the Germans, after a severe conflict	1870

AMIGONI, JACOPI, a-mi-gō'-ne, decorative and portrait painter. Executed important works at Venice, Munich, and in London, where he stayed ten years, and assisted in the decoration of Covent Garden Theatre. Afterwards painter to the king of Spain.

Born at Venice, 1675; died at Madrid, 1752.

AMILCAR. (See HAMILCAR.)

AMILCAR, a son of Hanno, defeated in Sicily by Gelon, the same day that Xerxes was defeated at Salamis by Themistocles. He burnt himself, that his body might not be found among the slain. Sacrifices were offered to him.

AMIMONE, or AMYMONE, ă-mim'-o-ne, a daughter of Danaus, changed into a fountain near Argos, which flows into Lake Lerna.

AMMONIUS SACCAS, săk'-kas, (or "the sack carrier," from having originally been a market porter), a Christian philosopher, and the founder of the Eclectic sect. He instituted an academy at Alexandria to reconcile the principles of Plato and Aristotle; and among other eminent disciples he had the two Origens, Plotinus and Longinus.

Died at Alexandria, 241.

AMMOTHEA, ăm-o-the-a, one of the Nereides.

AMNON, ăm'-non, the eldest son of David. He outraged his sister Tamar, for which he was killed by Absalom.

AMO, ANTONY WILLIAM, a'mo, a negro, who in 1703, was brought an infant to Europe, and subsequently was made councillor of state by the court of Berlin. He afterwards returned to Guinea, where he was born; and little more is known of him.

AMOL or AMUL, a-mol, a city of Persia, on the river Heraz, 12 miles from the Caspian Sea. Lat. 36° 30′ N. Lon. 52° 23′ E. Pop. estimated at 40,000. In the suburbs are the ruins of a mausoleum of Seyed Quam-u-deen, king of Amol, who died in 1378, a palace, which belonged to Shah Abbas, and three towers supposed to have been temples of the ancient fire-worshippers. There is a bridge of twelve arches over the Heraz. There are iron forges and cannon foundries.

AMOND, a'-mond, a river of Wales, in the county of Caermarthen. It falls into the Loughen.

AMONTONS, GUILLAUME, a-mon'-towng, a French philosopher, inventor of a system of telegraphing, who, on becoming deaf, applied himself to the study of mechanics and practical mathematics. In 1687 he presented to the Academy of Sciences a new hygroscope, which was approved. In the following year he became a member of the Academy. In 1695 Amontons published a book on the construction of barometers, thermometers, &c., which is the only production of his in print, except some papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. In 1699, on account of the merit of his discoveries, he was admitted a member of that learned body. He invented a method of telegraphing by signals.

Born at Paris, 1663; died 1705.

AMOO, a'-moo, a name of the river Oxus. (See OXUS.)

AMOOR, AMUR or SAGHALIN, a'-moor, a large river of Eastern Asia, formed by the union of the Shilka and Argun at Ust Strelkoi, in Lat. 53° 19′ N, and Lon. 121° 50′ E.; the first rising in the Russian government of Irkutsk, and the second near Ourga, in Mongolia, and thence for about 400 miles forming the boundary-line between the Chinese and Russian empires. The Amoor traverses the centre of Mantchooria, entering the Gulf of Saghalin, opposite the island of the same name. The entire course of this river, when taken from the head of either the Shilka or the Argun, is estimated at 2,500 miles. (See ASIA and MANTCHOORIA.

AMORGOS, a-mor'-gos, an island in the Greek Archipelago, in the Government of Thera, belonging to Greece, and 18 miles from Naxos. Ext. 13 miles long and 6 broad. Desc. Mountainous, and producing excellent oil. Pop. 2,500.—The chief town of this island is of the same name, and is situate, with the port of St. Anna, on the N.E. shore. It was the birthplace of Simonides. Lat. 36° 52′ N. Lon. 25° 56′ E.

AMORY, THOMAS, a'-mor-e, a dissenting divine, who, in 1772, was chosen one of the committee appointed by the dissenters to procure an extension of the Act of Toleration.

Born at Taunton, 1700; died in London, 1774.

AMORY, THOMAS, an extraordinary writer, and the son of Counsellor Amory, who was appointed by King William, secretary for the forfeited estates in Ireland. He appears to have been intended for the medical profession, but never practised that or any other. He led a very recluse life in his house in Westminster, shunning society, and never stirring out till the evening. He wrote "Memoirs, containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain." This singular work is in the form of a novel, and is made the vehicle of his own Unitarianism, as also is his next publication, "The Life of John Buncle, Esq.," in 4 vols., 12mo.

Born 1691; died 1788.

AMOS, a'-mos, the fourth of the minor prophets, a shepherd of Tekoa, near Bethlehem. He prophesied in the reigns of Jehoram, king of Israel, and Uzziah, king of Judah, about 784 B.C.

AMOUR, LEWIS DE ST., a'-moor, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and rector of the University of Paris, who went to Rome as the advocate of the Jansenists. He was expelled the Sorbonne for not signing the condemnation of Arnauld.

Died 1687.

AMOUR, ST., a town of France, in the department of the Jura, 19 miles from Lons-le-Saulnier. It carries on a small trade in swine, cattle, horses, and poultry. It has some potteries, tanneries, and iron works, and there are marble quarries near. Pop. 2,500.—This place is celebrated for the number of sieges it has from time to time sustained.

AMOY, a'-moi, a city and seaport in the province of Fo-Kien, China. It is built on an island of the same name, opposite Formosa, in a bay of the China Sea. A line of rocky hills separates the city from the suburbs, and commands it by means of a fortified citadel. The town is large, containing many public buildings, and carrying on a considerable trade, especially with Formosa. It possesses an excellent harbour, in which ships can lie close to the quays, and has been a great trading town for more than a thousand years. Manf. Porcelain, paper, umbrellas, and grass cloth, which with tea and sugar-candy, are its chief exports. Imp. Rice, camphor, and European produce. Pop. over 250,000. Lat. 24° 28′ N. Lon. 118° 4′ E.—Amoy was the great military depôt of the province till 1841, when it was captured by the British, who kept it until the payment of 6,000,000 dollars, demanded, by the treaty of Nankin, from the Chinese government. It was one of the five ports opened to British commerce by the treaty of 1842, and is now open to the ships of all nations. It was taken by the Chinese rebels in 1853, and retaken by the Imperialists in 1855.

AMOZ, father of the prophet Isaiah.

AMPELUSIA, ăm'-pe-lu'-se-a, a promontory of Africa, in Mauritania.

AMPERE, ANDRÉ MARIE, am'-pair, a scientific French annalist, and professor of physics in the central school of the department of Ain, and subsequently in the Polytechnic school of Paris. He published several works on electricity, light, and magnetism; and, as early as 1828, suggested an electric telegraph. He wrote a remarkable treatise on the theory of gambling, in which he showed that the chances are decidedly against the habitual gambler.

Born at Lyons, 1775; died at Marseilles, 1836.

AMPERE, JEAN JACQUES ANTOINE, son of the preceding, professor of the history of French literature in the College of France; member of the French Academy, 1847.

Born at Lyons, 1800; died 1864.

AMPFING, amp'-feeng, a village of Upper Bavaria, 5 miles from Muhldorf, where, in 1322, Frederick of Austria was defeated by Louis of Bavaria, and where, in 1800, Moreau began his famous retreat from Germany to the French frontier.

AMPHIARAUS, ăm'-fi-a-rā'-us, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Oicleus, or, according to others, of Apollo, by Hypermnestra, was present at the chase of the Calydonian boar, and accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition. He married Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, king of Argos. Amphiaraus received divine honours after death, and had a celebrated temple and oracle at Oropios, in Attica. (See ADRASTUS, ALCMÆON.)

AMPHICTYON, ăm-fik'-te-on, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned at Athens after Cranaus, and was the first to interpret dreams and to draw omens. Some say that the Deluge happened in his age.

AMPHICTYON, son of Helenus, was the first to establish the celebrated council of the Amphictyons, composed of the wisest and most virtuous citizens of Greece. This assembly consisted of twelve persons, originally sent by the following states: the Ionians, Dorians, Perhæbians, Bœotians, Magnesians, Phthians, and Æninians. Other cities in process of time were added to their number, and by the time of Antoninus Pius they had increased to thirty. The members generally met twice every year at Delphi, and sometimes sat at Thermopylæ. They took into consideration all matters of disagreement which might exist between the different states of Greece. Before they proceeded to business, the Amphictyons sacrificed an ox to the god of Delphi, and cut his flesh into small pieces; intimating that union and unanimity prevailed in the several cities which they represented. Their decisions were held sacred and inviolable, and even armies were raised to enforce them.

AMPHILA, am-fī'-la, an island in a bay of the same name, in the Red Sea. Lat. 14° N. Lon. 40° 22′ E.

AMPHILOCHIUS, ăm'-fe-lo'-ke-us, bishop of Iconium, who was at the council of Constantinople in 381, and president of that of Sida in 385. He zealously opposed the Arians, and recovered Theodosius from that party.

Died 394.

AMPHILYTUS, ăm-fil'-i-tus, a soothsayer of Acarnania, who encouraged Pisistratus to seize the sovereign power of Athens.

AMPHINOMUS and ANAPIUS, ăm-fin-o-mus, ă-nā'-pe-us, two brothers, who, when Catana and the neighbouring cities were in flames, caused by an eruption from Mount Ætna, saved their parents upon their shoulders. Pluto, to reward their uncommon piety, placed them after death in the island of Leuce, and they received divine honours in Sicily.

AMPHION, am-fī'-on, son of Jupiter, by Antiope. He was born at the same birth as Zethus, on Mount Cytheron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of Dirce; and the two children were exposed in the woods, but preserved by a shepherd. (See ANTIOPE.) When Amphion grew up, he made such progress in music, that he is said to have been the inventor of it, and to have built the walls of Thebes by the sound of his lyre. Mercury taught him the art, and gave him the lyre. The fable of Amphion's moving stones and raising the walls of Thebes by his harmony, has been explained by supposing that he persuaded, by his eloquence, a wild and uncivilized people to unite together and build a town to protect themselves against the attacks of their enemies.—Another, the son of Jasus, king of Orchomenos, who married Niobe, daughter of Tantalus, by whom he had many children; among whom was Chloris, the wife of Neleus.

AMPHIPOLIS, ăm-fip'-o-lis, a town on the Strymon, between Macedonia and Thrace, built by an Athenian colony. It had also other names; such as Acra, Myrica, Eion, the town of Mars, &c. The site is now occupied by the small town Jeni Keui.

AMPHIPYROS, ăm-fip'-e-ros, one of Diana's surnames, because she carries a torch in both her hands.

AMPHIS, ăm'-fis, a comic poet of Athens, son of Amphicrates, a contemporary of Plato. Besides his comedies, he wrote other pieces, which are now lost.

AMPHISSA, ăm-fis'-a, the capital of the Locri Ozolæ, situate at the head of the Sinus Crissæus, about 7 miles from Delphi. It is now called Salona.—A town of the Bruttii, between Locri and Caulon, now called Rocella.

AMPHITRITE, ăm-fi-trī'-te, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Nereus and Doris. Though she had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, yet she was induced to marry Neptune, and rewarded the fidelity of the dolphin who had so powerfully pleaded the cause of the god, by placing him among the stars. She is sometimes called Salatia, and is often taken for the sea itself.

AMPHITRITE ISLANDS, two groups of five and two small islands in the China Sea, to the S.E. of the island of Hainan. Lat. between 16° 50′ and 16° 52′ N. and Lon. 112° 18′ and 112° 20′ E.

AMPHITRYON, ăm-fit'-re-on, a Theban prince, son of Alcæus and Hipponome. (See ALCMENA.)

The district is traversed by the Sind, Punjaub and Delhi, and the Grand Trunk Railways. Pop. 832,800. Lat. between 30° 40′ and 32° 10′ N. Lon. between 74° 40′ and 75° 40′ E.

AMRITSIR, the capital of the above district, is the chief place of religious worship of the Sikh nation, who resort hither to immerse themselves in the sacred basin constructed by Ram Dass, the fourth Guru or spiritual leader of the Sikhs. The name Amritsir signifies "the pool of immortality." This place has upwards of 8,000 shops, and about 450 Hindoo and Mahometan places of worship. The large fortress of Govindgar was built by Runjeet Singh in 1809. Manf. Chiefly shawls, silks, and linen and woollen cloths. A large transit trade is carried on with various parts of India, and it is a great emporium for many of the productions of the East, and for Manchester goods. It is a station on the Punjaub Railway. Pop. 151,896. Lat. 31° 40′ N. Lon. 74° 45′ E.

AMRU-AL-KAIS, an Arabian poet of the 7th century, contemporary with Mahomet, and one of the authors of the Moallakat, or "suspended" poems, in the Kaaba at Mecca. His poem has been translated by Sir William Jones.

AMRU-EBN-AL-AS, am'-roo-en-a'-las, a famous Saracen general, at first a great enemy of Mahomet, but afterwards his zealous disciple. He conquered Syria and Egypt, whence he extended his victorious arms to Africa. He conquered and became governor of Egypt, which flourished greatly under his administration.

Died 663.

AMSDORF, NICHOLAUS VON, Protestant Reformer. One of the first students at the Wittenberg University, where he became Professor of Theology. One of the most steadfast supporters of Luther. He took part in founding the University of Jena. A learned and very vigorous controversialist.

Born near Wurzen, 1483; died at Eisenach, 1565.

AMSLER, SAMUEL, engraver, professor of the art in the Munich Academy. His engravings from pictures of Raffaelle and Overbeck, and from sculptures by Thorwalsden and Dannecer, are remarkable for their grace and fidelity.

Born at Schinznach, Switzerland, 1791; died 1849.

AMSTELVEEN, am'-stel-vene, a town of Holland, on the Amstel, 6 miles south of Amsterdam, consisting of one long street. Pop. about 2,500.

AMSTERDAM, formerly AMSTELDAM, am'-ster-dam', 'the dike or dam of Amstel,' the capital of a province and of the kingdom of Holland, situate on the arm of the Zuyder Zee called the Y or Ij (pronounced Eye), in Lower Holland, at the point of junction with the river Amstel, which divides Amsterdam into the Old and the New towns. From the marshy nature of the soil it has been necessary to erect nearly the whole city on oaken piles driven into the ground. It is intersected throughout by canals, which cut each other in a thousand different ways, there being in all nearly 300 bridges in the city. The three principal canals, the Heerengracht, Keizersgracht, and Princengracht, run in semi-circles within each other. Several of the streets are lined with trees, and form agreeable promenades. On the land side the city was formerly defended by a wall and regular bastions, with a broad and deep ditch, but they have been removed, and the sites planted and converted into a public promenade; but, in case of necessity, the adjacent country could be flooded by means of sluices. Opposite Amsterdam commences the great ship canal, extending to Helder and the Texel, a distance of 50 miles, and which required the labour of eight years, and cost more than a million sterling. Another ship canal, 15 miles long, has also been cut, connecting Amsterdam with Wyk, on the North Sea. The Palace, formerly the Stadthouse, stands on a foundation of 13,659 piles, in an open square in the centre of the city. It is built of freestone (except the ground floor, which is brick), is 282 feet long, 235 broad, and, including the cupola, 182 high. Its interior is adorned with marble, jasper, statues, paintings, and other costly ornaments. Among the other edifices, are the East and West-India Houses, Exchange, Bank, Admiralty, three weigh-houses, Corn Exchange, and Tower. In the Old Church (built about 1300) is a chapel, with windows of painted glass, and it contains monuments of famous Dutchmen. The New Church, where the kings of Holland are crowned, contains the tombs of De Ruyter and the poet Vondel. The synagogues of the Jews are of the most splendid description. There are places of worship for the Dutch Reformed Church, English Episcopalian, and Presbyterians, Lutherans, Roman Catholics, and Greeks. There are several galleries of pictures of great value. The principal public establishments are the arsenals and dock-yards, the academy, anatomical and surgical college, house of correction (or Rasp-huis), orphan-house, hospital for old men, establishment for widows, lazaretto, lunatic asylum, the botanic garden, &c. The famous Bourse or Exchange is a plain but stately fabric of freestone, covered with tiles, and is in length 230 feet, and in breadth 130. It will contain about 4,500 persons, and is daily resorted to after mid-day by all concerned in exchange or other mercantile business. The Bank was instituted by the States of Holland in 1609, but ceased in 1796, and the present Bank of the Netherlands (established in 1814) is on the same model as the Bank of England.

Manufactures.—In the town and adjoining country all sorts of stuffs, damasks, galloon, lace, velvet, woollen cloths, carpets, leather, borax, camphor, cinnabar, sulphur, &c.; there are also refineries of sugar; soap, oil, glass, iron, and chemical works; distilleries, breweries, and tanneries. The diamond-cutters of Amsterdam are celebrated for their skill.

Population.—366,660, including 30,000 Jews, 60,000 Roman Catholics, the remainder being Protestants.

History.—	A.D.

AMULIUS, ă-mu′-le-us, king of Alba, was son of Procas, and youngest brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth, but Amulius dispossessed him of it, and even put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the service of Vesta, to prevent her ever becoming a mother. In spite of all these precautions, however, Rhea brought forth the twins Romulus and Remus. Amulius being informed of this, ordered her to be buried alive for violating the laws of Vesta, which enjoined perpetual chastity, and the two children were thrown into the river as soon as born.

AMURATH I., or MURAD, a′-mu-rath, a sultan of the Turks, who succeeded his father Orchan in 1360. He was the first who led the Turkish armies into Europe, which he overran as far as the Balkan, fixing his residence at Adrianople. He completed the conquest of the Greek empire. He founded the corps of Janissaries, conquered Phrygia, and, on the plains of Cassova, defeated Lazarus, the despot of Servia. In this battle he was wounded by an Albanian soldier, and died the next day.

Born 1326; died 1389.

AMURATH II. succeeded his father, Mahomet I., in 1422. The beginning of his reign was disturbed by pretenders to his throne; but, after suppressing these, he abdicated in favour of his son Mahomet, and retired to a society of dervishes, whence he was soon recalled to engage against the Hungarians, who had invaded the Turkish dominions. He gained a great victory over the Christians at Varna, and, in 1446, quelled a revolt of the Janissaries; and succeeded in resisting the famous Scanderbeg in making advances upon his territories. He then turned his arms against the Hungarians with his wonted good fortune. Finding his son inadequate to the responsibilities of an imperial station, he sent him to govern Asia Minor, and resumed the throne.

Born 1404; died 1451.

AMURATH III. succeeded his father, Selim II., in 1574. He was a weak-minded, frivolous man, and in his reign the formidable Janissaries rose to power.

Born 1545; died 1595.

AMURATH IV. succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1622. In 1638 he recovered Bagdad from the Persians, after which he put 30,000 of the enemy, who had surrendered at discretion, to the sword.—The excessive cruelty and debauchery of this prince have stamped him with the character of being one of the worst sovereigns that ever reigned over the Ottomans. He died early from the effects of his mode of life.

Born 1611; died 1640.

AMWELL, ăm′-wel, a village and parish of Hertfordshire, 21 miles N. of London, where is one of the feeders of the New River, which so largely supplies the English metropolis with water. Harleybury College, formerly the property of the East India Company, is in this parish. Pop. 2,245.

AMWELL, a post township of the United States, in Hunterdon county, New Jersey. Pop. 5,000.—Also a township of Washington county, Pennsylvania.

AMYOT, JACQUES, a′-me-o, bishop of Auxerre, and great almoner of France. Though meanly born and educated on charity, he rose by merit and patronage to be professor of Greek and Latin in the university of Bourges. Here he translated into French the memoirs of Theagenes and Charidea, which procured him the abbey of Bellozane. His translation of Plutarch is admired rather for its style than its correctness, and the French critics consider him to have done much towards determining and improving their language. It was a translation from his Plutarch that afforded Shakspeare material for his Roman plays. At his death he bequeathed 1,200 crowns to the hospital of Orleans, for twelve deniers he received there when a poor starving boy.

Born at Melun, 1513; died at Auxerre, 1593.

AMYRANT, MOÏSE, French theologian and metaphysician. Exhibited unusual talent while a student at the university of Poictiers, and afterwards studied theology at Saumur, and became a minister of the French Protestant church, and professor of theology. Chosen by the synod held in 1631 to represent the Protestant grievances to the king, he refused to kneel, thereby claiming equality with the Catholic priests. His oration delivered on that occasion was much admired. He was one of the most eminent of French Protestants, and the author of numerous theological treatises and devotional manuals still very popular.

Born in Anjou, 1596; died 1644.

AMYTHAON, ăm-i-thaï′-on, a son of Cretheus, king of Iolchos, who re-established or regulated the Olympic games.

ANABARA, an′-a-ba′-ra, a river in Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk. It rises in latitude 66° N., and after a course of 400 miles falls into the Arctic Ocean at latitude 72° N., and longitude 112° E.

ANACAPRI, a-na-ka′-pre, a small town on the Neapolitan island of Capri, on a rocky elevation, where there are a castle and some vestiges of antiquity. Pop. 1,500.—This town can only be reached by a flight of 552 steps, cut in the rock; and it is said that its inhabitants are so much attached to it as a place of residence, that many of them have never descended these steps.

ANACHARSIS, ăn-a-kar′-sis, a Scythian philosopher of the 7th century B.C, who, in the time of Solon, visited Athens, where he was so much esteemed as to be the only barbarian ever admitted to the honour of citizenship. The life of this philosopher was written by Lælius, who, with Plutarch and others, has preserved many of his apophthegms.

ANACREON, ă-năk'-re-on, one of the most famous of the lyric poets, whose muse is supposed to have been greatly inspired by the juice of the grape. His odes are still extant, and their wonderful sweetness and elegance have been the admiration of every age and country. Plato says that he was descended from Codrus, the last king of Athens. He resided a long time at Samos, in the court of Polycrates.—It is said that Anacreon was choked by a stone of a grape. His statue was placed in the citadel of Athens, representing him as an old drunken man, singing, with every mark of dissipation and intemperance. All that he wrote is not extant.

Born at Teos, Asia Minor, 562 B.C.; died there 477 B.C.

ANADYR, or ANADIR, a'-na-dir, a river of Siberia, rising in Lake Ivachno, and after a course of 600 miles falling into an inlet of the Sea of Anadyr (North Pacific), in longitude 177° E.—There is only one station on its banks, which is called Anadyrsk. Lat. 65° N. Lon. 167° E.

ANAGNI, a-nan'-ye, a decayed town in the Campagna di Roma, 37 miles from Rome. It contains a cathedral, built in the 11th century. It is the ancient Anagnia, at one time a place of considerable importance. Pop. 8,200.

ANAH, a-na, a town in Asiatic Turkey, 160 miles from Bagdad. It forms a resting station for the caravans that traverse the great desert of Mesopotamia. Pop. about 3,000 or 4,000.

ANAHUAC, the great central plateau of Mexico, composing three-fourths of the territory. (See MEXICO.)

ANAM, or ANNAM, a-nam, a country of Asia, occupying the E. portion of a promontory to the N.E. of the Malay peninsula, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Siam. Ext. about 970 miles, running N. to S., with a breadth which expands from 85 miles at its narrowest part, about the centre, to 400 miles N., and to 270 S. Desc. Varied as a beautiful landscape, comprising charming valleys, which run up into the slopes of well-cultivated hills, rising into mountain-ranges of considerable extent. It is well watered, but little is as yet known of the interior generally. It is composed of the three provinces Tonquin, on the N.; Cochin-China, on the S.E.; and Cambodia, on the S.W. Agriculture. Defective. Manf. Imperfect. In the manufacture of cotton, silk, and porcelain, the inhabitants cannot equal the Hindoos, Japanese, or Chinese. Exp. Sugar, pepper, tin, teak, sandal-wood, silk, and cotton. Imp. Tea, opium, and manufactured goods. Pop. about 12,000,000, consisting principally of Chinese and Malays. Lat. between 9° 40′ and 23° N. Lon. 102° and 109° 30′ E. (See TONQUIN, COCHIN-CHINA, CAMBODIA.)

ANAMBAS, a-nam'-bas, a group of fifteen islands in the China Sea, mostly inhabited by poor Malays, who support themselves by the cultivation of rice, sago, cocoa-nuts, and fishing. Pop. about 1,500.

ANAMIRAPUCA, a-nam'-e-ra-pu-ca, a river in Brazil, in the province of Para, which, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the estuary of the Amazon, at latitude 0° 15′ S.; longitude 50° 55′ W.

ANAMUR, CAPE, a'-na-mur, the most southern point of Asia Minor. Lat. 36° 1′ N. Lon. 32° 50′ E.

ANANIAS, ăn'-a-ni'-as, a hypocrite in the primitive church at Jerusalem, who was struck dead, with his wife Sapphira, for lying.

ANAPA, ăn'-a-pa', a fortified town on Sundjik Bay, on the eastern shore of the Black Sea, 47 miles S.E. of Yenikale, built on a projecting crag, at the north-western extremity of the Caucasian mountains. Exp. Tallow, butter, hides, honey, wax, &c. Pop. 8,000, consisting of Tartars, Circassians, Greeks, Jews, Armenians, and Russians. Lat. 44° 54′ N. Lon. 37° 18′ E. As a military post it has been greatly prized by Russia. Its fort was built by the Turks in 1784, and taken by the Russians in 1791 and in 1807, and only given up with the greatest reluctance. In May, 1828, it was forced to surrender to the Russians, and at the peace of Adrianople was ceded to Russia, with all the coast towns and forts from the Kouban to Fort St. Nicholas. During the war of 1855, it, with other ports on the Circassian coast, was destroyed by the Russians, but in the following year was again occupied by them.

ANASTASIUS I., ăn'-a-stai'-she-us, emperor of the East, was an officer in the imperial palace for many years, and in 1491 became emperor by marrying the empress Ariadne, widow of Zeno. His reign was disturbed by religious feuds, and by the incursions of the Goths, to check whom he built the Anastasian wall, extending from the Propontis to the Euxine. He was suspected of heresy, and anathematised by Pope Symmachus.

Born at Dyrrhachium, 430; died 518.

ANASTASIUS II., raised to the throne of Constantinople by election in 713. He was soon afterwards superseded by Theodosius, and became a monk in Thessalonica. He afterwards headed a revolt against Leo, the successor of Theodosius, but was taken prisoner and put to death.

Died 721.

ANASTASIUS I., Pope, succeeded Siricus about the year 398. Jerome, who was a contemporary, speaks highly of him. He condemned the doctrine of Origen.—There were several other popes of this name, but with nothing remarkable in their history to record.

Died 400.

ANATOLIA. (See ASIA MINOR.)

ANATOLICO, a-nat-o-le'-ko, a town of Ætolia, in Greece, 6 miles from Missolonghi, standing on a rocky island in a salt lagune on the W. side of the Gulf of Patras. The inhabitants are mostly fishermen. Lat. 38° 24′ N. Lon. 21° 18′ E.

ANAVA, an-a-va, a river of Brazil, and a tributary of the Branca or Parinia. Length, about 200 miles.

ANAVELHANA, a-na-vel-ha'-na, a river of Brazil and an affluent of the Rio Negro, into which it falls near Toroma. Length, about 220 miles.

ANAXAGORAS, ăn-ax-ăg'-o-ras, a philosopher of antiquity, who held that the sun was a mass of burning matter, from which the other heavenly bodies derived light and heat. For these opinions, and, as some say, for his theory of eclipses, he was banished by the Athenians. Euripides, Pericles, Socrates, and Archelaus were pupils of this philosopher, who disputed the atomic theory, and taught that there was a supreme moving power which he designated Nous.

Born at Clazomenæ, Asia Minor, 500 B.C.; died at Lampsacus, 428 B.C.

ANAXARCHUS, a Grecian philosopher who accompanied Alexander the Great into Asia, and enjoyed his intimate friendship. To him is attributed the saying, "Kings, like the gods, can do no wrong."

Born at Abdera early in the 4th century B.C.

ANAXILAUS, a physician and Pythagorean philosopher of the first century, whose knowledge of uatnral philosophy led to the belief that he was a magician, and he was banished from Rome by the Emperor Augustus.

ANAXANDRIDES, ăn'-ax-ăn'-dri-dez, king of Sparta and the father of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylæ. Reigned about 550 B.C. (See LEONIDAS.)

ANAXIMANDER, ăn-ăx'-e-man'-der, a philosopher of Miletus, and the first to observe the obliquity of the ecliptic; he taught that the moon was the recipient of the light of the sun, and much larger than the earth, and that the earth was of cylindrical form. To him is ascribed the invention of geographical charts.

Born 611 B.C.; died 547 B.C.

ANAXIMENES, ăn-ax-im'-e-nes, a philosopher, who maintained that air was the first principle of all things. Pliny attributes to him the invention of the sun-dial. Lived in the 6th century B.C.

ANAXIMENES, Greek historian, who accompanied Alexander the Great to Persia, and wrote histories of Philip and Alexander, and of Greece, and probably one of the treatises generally ascribed to Aristotle.

Born at Lampsacus, in the 4th century B.C.

ANAXIPPUS, ăn'-ax-ip'-us, a comic writer in the age of Demetrius. He used to say that philosophers were wise only in their speeches, but fools in their actions.

ANCENIS, an-sen'-e, a town of France, on the Loire, which is here crossed by a suspension bridge, department of the Loire Inférieure, 20 miles from Nantes. There are a college and a castle, built in the 10th century. Commerce. It trades in wood, corn, wine, vinegar, coal, iron, and timber. Pop. 4,200. When the revolutionary war in La Vendée was at its height, this town was the scene of some severe contests.

ANCHIETA, JOSEPH D', Jesuit missionary, called the Apostle of Brazil, where he resided forty-four years, enduring many hardships. He wrote grammars of some of the native languages, and a Latin memoir on the productions of the country.

Born in Teneriffe, 1533; died in Brazil, 1597.

ANCHOLME, ănk'-home, a river of England, rising in Lincolnshire, and joining the Humber 9 miles from Glanford Brigg.

ANCILLON, JOHANN PETER FRIEDRICH, an-tsil-on, a Prussian statesman and historian, descended from an old French family, who, during the wars of Napoleon I., took an active part in directing the affairs of his country. At his death he held the appointment of minister of foreign affairs. He studied theology in his youth, and was possessed of considerable literary ability. His chief work was "A Picture of Political Revolutions in Europe since the 15th century."

Born at Berlin, 1766; died 1837.

ANCOBAR, ăn'-ko-bar, a river on the Gold Coast, Africa, which there forms the west boundary of the Dutch possessions. Lat. 4° N. Lon. 2° 16′ W.

ANCONA, an-ko'-na, a large province of Italy, lying between the Apennines and the Adriatic Sea; bounded on the S. by the province of Macerata, on the E. by the Adriatic, and on the N. and W. by the province of Urbino. Area, 740 square miles. Desc. Generally mountainous, but intersected with fertile valleys, with many acres covered with copses and laid out in meadows, olive grounds, and pasture land. Pro. Maize, wheat, hemp, wine, tobacco, hay, oil, beans, and silk. Hogs, sheep, and horned cattle are also reared in large numbers. Pop. 274,266. Towns. The principal are Ancona, Jesi, and Osimo.

ANCONA, a large trading town in the above province, standing on a point of land which projects into the Gulf of Venice. It is seated between two hills, on one of which is the citadel (a place of considerable strength), and on the other the cathedral church, built in the 10th century, and dedicated to St. Cyriac. On one of the moles in the harbour is a triumphal arch, erected A.D 112, in honour of Trajan, by his wife Plotina and his sister Marciana, and said to be the finest marble arch in the world. This mole was built by Trajan, and is 2,000 feet long. The new mole has also a triumphal arch, erected by Clement XII., whilst the harbour is defended by several forts. Manf. Leather, paper, wax candles, silk stockings, and verdigris. Exp. Woollen and silk goods, grain, bacon, hemp, fruits, hides, sulphur, cordage, linseed, raw silk, and native tobacco. Imp. Chiefly manufactured goods, dye-stuffs, colonial produce, drugs, wool, wax, hardware, salt-fish, oils, &c. Pop. 32,000. Lat. 43° 38 N. Lon. 13° 30′ E.—Ancona was one of the principal naval stations of the Romans, and was anciently famous for its purple dye. In every period of its history it has been one of the chief commercial cities of Central Italy. In 1797 it was occupied by the French, but in 1799, after a long siege, it was retaken by the Austrians. In 1832 the French again took possession of the citadel, which they did not leave till 1838. In 1860 the city, with the rest of the province, became part of the kingdom of Italy.

ANCON SIN SALIDA, an extensive inlet on the western coast of South America, between 50° 30′ and 52° 30′ S. lat., which cuts through the range of mountains and terminates in the western plains of Patagonia.

ANCRE, a town of France. (See ALBERT.)

ANCRE, MARQUIS D'. (See CONCINI.)

ANCUD, the Gulf of, an'-kud, lies between the island of Chiloe and the mainland of S. America. Ext. nearly 150 miles long, with an average width of 60. Lat. extending from 41° 30′ to 43° 30′ S. Lon. from 72° to 73° W.

ANCUS MARCIUS, ăn-cus mar'-she-us, fourth king of Rome, was the grandson of Numa Pompilius. He was elected 638 B.C. He obtained triumphs for victories gained oven the Latins, Sabines, and Veientes, and extended his territories to the seacoast, where he built the port of Ostia.

Died 614 B.C.

ANCYRA, the ancient name of Angora

ANDALUSIA, or ANDALUCIA, an'-da-loo'-see-a, an ancient division of Spain, which embraces the modern provinces of Cadiz, Seville, Jaen, Grenada, Huelva, Cordova, Almeria, and Malaga. It is bounded on the N. by Estremadura and New Castile, on the S. by the Mediterranean, on the W. by Portugal, and on the E. by Murcia and the Mediterranean. The district is extremely uneven, except the basin of the Guadalquiver, which for the greater part may be regarded as a wide plain. The Sierra Morena mountain-range runs along its north frontier, and is cut by the great road from Madrid to Seville at the pass called the Des-peña-perros, with an elevation of 7,560 feet above the level of the sea. Another mountain-range, called the Sierra Nevada, runs across Andalusia, from Cartagena to Tarifa and Cape Trafalgar. Many of the summits of this range are covered with perpetual snow, and two of them, the Picacho de Mulahacen and the Picacho de Veleta, attain respectively the heights of 11,781 and 11,597 feet. On the Mulahacen Sierra is the Lake of Calderra, 10,112 feet above the level of the sea. The principal river is the Guadalquiver, rising in the province of Jaen, near Cazorla, and after a course of 320 miles, falling into the Mediterranean at San Lucar. The Guadalimar, Guadiato, and Xenil are its chief affluents, which, altogether, drain an area of more than 15,000 square miles, and considerably more than half the size of Andalusia. The rivers on the south of the Sierra Nevada are of little importance. Wolves and bears are occasionally found in the mountain-ranges, and venomous reptiles lurk in the crevices of rocks, and amongst the brushwood of the wilder parts of the country. Deer, hares, and rabbits are abundant, as are bustards, partridges, and plovers. The horses of Andalusia are the best breed in the peninsula, and its bulls are the most distinguished for indomitable stamina in the bull-fights of the country. Sheep are plentiful, and its hogs, reared on the acorns of the woods, supply as excellent hams and bacon as are to be had in Europe. The climate various, though extremely warm on the coasts. The people have a great infusion of Moorish blood, and preserve many of the physical and mental peculiarities of their ancestors.

Area.—30,000 square miles.
Produce.—Grain, olives, figs, cotton, sugar, silk, cochineal, and wine.
Minerals.—Silver, lead, antimony, copper, sulphur, coal, and marble.
Manufactures.—These are not extensive. Silks, woollens, and leather are the most important.
Andalusia is no longer officially recognized.
Lat. Between 36° 0′ and 38° 39′ N. Lon. Between 2° 88′ and 7° 90′ W.

ANDAMAN ISLANDS, ăn'-da-man, several islands on the eastern side of the Bay of Bengal, called the Great and Little Andaman, or more particularly, North, Middle, and South Andaman, and, separated by Duncan Passage, Little Andaman. Area, 3,000 square miles. The islands have been chosen for the place of banishment for the sepoys concerned in the Indian mutiny of 1857, and other criminals. In 1872, the Earl of Mayo, the Governor-General of India, was assassinated here by a convict. Their inhabitants are in the lowest state of civilization, and bear no relation, physically or in respect of language, to other natives of Asia, but have some affinity to the aborigines of Australia. Lat. between 10° and 14° N. Lon. traversed by the meridian 93° E.— In 1791 a settlement was endeavoured to be made on S. Andaman and N. Andaman by the English, but, on account of the unsuitable character of the climate for Europeans, it was abandoned in 1796. The convict settlement is now at Port Blair, on the east coast of South Island.

ANDELYS, LES, lais an'-de-le, a town of France, in the department of the Eure, properly consisting of two, the Great and the Little Andely, situate on the Seine, 20 miles from Evreux. At Great Andely is a collegiate church, with remarkably beautiful painted windows. Manf. Artificial pearls, cloths, thread, and leather. Pop. 5,400.— The ruins of Château Gaillard, a fortress built by Richard Cœur-de-Lion, are in the neighbourhood of Little Andely, and in a neighbouring village, called Villiers, the painter Poussin was born, in 1594.

ANDENNE, an'-den, a town of Belgium, on the right bank of the Meuse, in the province of Namur. Manf. Tobacco-pipes and porcelain. Pop. about 6,400. It is a station on the Northern Belgian Railway.

ANDERAB, a populous city of Independent Tartary, 85 miles N.N.E. of Cabool, at the junction of the rivers Anderab and Kiasar.

ANDERNACH, an'-der-nak, a town of Rhenish Prussia, beautifully situate on the left bank of the Rhine, between Coblentz and Bonn. There was a royal residence in the time of the Merovingian kings, and at a later date the town was one of the most flourishing places on the Rhine. A lofty tower, a fine church built in the 13th century, and the old walls and gates, show the antiquity of the town. Manf. Hydraulic cement, made from volcanic tufa, used in the construction of the dikes in Holland. A considerable trade is done in millstones, which are in great demand. Lat. 50° 27′ N. Lon. 7° 25′ E. Pop. 4,400.

ANDERSEN, HANS CHRISTIAN, an-der-sen, a Danish writer of great genius, who, though born in the humblest circumstances, his father being a poor shoemaker, rose to considerable eminence among his contemporaries. Most of his works are of an imaginative, poetical, or light character, and have procured him not only the patronage of the crown of Denmark, but the approbation of a large portion of the literary circles of foreign countries, and the highest praise has been assigned to his tales for children, in which he is without a rival among modern writers. His 70th birthday was celebrated with much enthusiasm. Deputations from various parts presented their congratulations to him, the King of Denmark decorated him, and an edition of one of his works was published in fifteen languages to commemorate the event. His funeral was attended by the royal family and great officers of state.

Born at Funen, 1805; died at Copenhagen, 1875.

ANDERSON, ăn'-der-son, a county of the United States, in East Tennessee. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. [illegible]. Chief Town, Clinton.

ANDERSON, ADAM, author of a valuable History of Commerce.
Born in Scotland, 1692; died in London, 1765.

ANDERSON, ALEXANDER, a Scotch mathematician of great repute, who resided for several years in Paris, and published several treatises on his favourite science.
Born at Aberdeen, 1582; died at Paris about 1620.

ANDERSON, JAMES, LL.D., a Scotch political economist, scientific and agricultural writer, and one of the founders of the Scotch school of husbandry. He wrote about thirty different works, and was a large contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." In 1780 he received the degree of Doctor from the university of Aberdeen.

Born at Hermiston, near Edinburgh, 1739; died in London, 1808.

ANDERSON, JAMES, Scotch antiquary, who edited for publication many of the public records of the kingdom of Scotland.

Born at Edinburgh, 1662; died 1728.

ANDERSON, SIR EDMUND, an English judge, who was in the commission for trying Mary, queen of Scots; and presided at the trial of secretary Davison, for issuing the warrant by which that unhappy princess was executed.

Born in Lincolnshire; died 1605.

ANDERSON, JOHN, one of the earliest promoters of scientific instruction among the working classes, and the founder of the Glasgow Andersonian University. He was Professor of Oriental Languages, and afterwards of Natural Philosophy in the university of Glasgow. Author of a valuable work "Institutes of Physics."—It was from Anderson, who showed great sympathy with the National Convention of France, that the plan came of sending, by gas-inflated paper balloons, newspapers and other communications from France into Germany, when all other means of conveyance were intercepted by a cordon of troops between the countries.

Born at Rosemeath, Dumbartonshire, 1720; died at Glasgow, 1796.

ANDERSON, GEORGE, an English mathematician, who attained to considerable eminence, though born of peasants and himself a day-labourer.

Born at Weston, Buckinghamshire, 1760; died 1806.

ANDERSON, LARS, or ANDREÆ, LAURENTIUS, Swedish theologian. Converted in early life from Catholicism to Protestantism, chancellor to Gustavus Vasa, but ended his days in disgrace. Translated a portion of the New Testament.

Died at Strengnas, 1552.

ANDES. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

ANDEVOURANTE, a town on the east coast of Madagascar, near the mouth of a river of the same name. A good trade is carried on with European vessels. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 19° S. Lon. 49° E.

ANDKHOO, or ANDKOI, a town in Independent Tartary, capital of a Khanate of the same name. It is well situated on the banks of a large river, on one of the commercial routes between Bokhara and Afghanistan. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 36° 54′ N. Lon. 66° 23′ E.

ANDOCIDES, an-do'-ci-des, one of the ten Attic orators whose lives were written by Plutarch. He was banished from Athens with Alcibiades, and three times afterwards; but subsequently filled offices of trust for the State.

Born at Athens, 467; died 391 B.C.

ANDORNO, an-dor'-no, a town of Sardinia, 6 miles from Biella, situate in one of the most prosperous districts of Piedmont. Pop. upwards of 4,000, chiefly employed in the lead, copper, and iron mines of the neighbouring mountains.—The painter Cagliari was born here.

ANDORRA, or ANDORRE, an-dor'-a. In Arabic, the name of this place signifies being 'thick with trees.' It is a small semi-independent neutral state in the north of Catalonia, in Spain, and on the south side of the Pyrenees. Area, 600 square miles. Desc. Amongst the mildest districts of the Pyrenees, having [illegible] extensive pastures, wi[illegible] rounding it. Little grain is gr[illegible] being mostly shepherds, who live [illegible] remote from the luxuries of cities. M[illegible] are few, and of the most primitive descrip[illegible] Iron is produced in the mines, and some rude implements and tools are made, but nothing that deserves the name of manufactures, as these are now understood in larger and more advanced communities. Gov. Under the protection of France, but the administration is carried on by a syndic, appointed for life by twenty-four consuls elected by the whole population. There are two judges, or viguiers, one appointed by France (and always a Frenchman), the other by the Bishop of Urgel, to whom, in 819, Louis I. of France transferred certain prerogatives which Charlemagne had retained. Commerce. Exp. Iron to Spain, and wool and skins to France. Imp. The necessaries of life; and an active contraband trade is carried on by the republic between Spain and France. Pop. variously estimated, probably about 7,000.—In 790 Charlemagne defeated the Moors in a neighbouring valley, with the assistance of the Andorrans, and from that period they date the independence of their little state. As a recompense for their services, the French monarch allowed them to make their own laws, a privilege which they have continued ever since to enjoy.

ANDOVER, ăn'-do-ver, a parliamentary borough and market-town of Hampshire, on a rivulet called Ande, 12 miles from Winchester. The church is a new building in the early English style. There is a handsome town hall in the market-place. The town is well paved, lighted with gas, and plentifully supplied with water. Silk is manufactured, and a trade in malt and agricultural produce is carried on.—This place gives the title of viscount to the earl of Suffolk. A junction station on the London and South-Western Railway. Pop. 5,744.

ANDOVER, a town, 21 miles from Boston, Massachusetts, United States, beautifully situated on the right bank of the Merrimac. Born 1823.

ANDRÉ, JOHN, an'-drai, an English soldier of Genevese descent, originally a merchant's clerk, but quitting the counting-house for the camp, so greatly distinguished himself in the American war as to be raised to the rank of major. General Clinton had such an opinion of his address, that when the American general Arnold made a secret offer of surrendering an important post to the British, he employed Major André to negotiate the conditions. Having been taken in the performance of his mission, General Washington caused him to be tried as a spy, when he was condemned to suffer death. On going to the place of execution, he asked, with a revulsive feeling to the conceived ignominy of his end, "Must I die in this manner?" Being told it was unavoidable, he replied, "I am reconciled to my fate, but not to the mode; it will, however, be but a momentary pang." His fortitude excited the admiration and melted the hearts of the spectators. On being asked if he had anything to say: "Nothing," he replied, "but to request that you will witness to the world that I die like a brave man." The intelligence of his death was received in England with general indignation. In 1821, his remains were brought to this country, and interred in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory, on which is an inscription describing his virtues and merits, and recording his age and the date of his execution.

Born in London, 1751; died at Tappan, America, 1780.

ANDREOSSI, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, COUNT, an-dre-os-e, a Frenchman of Italian descent, who took an active part in the great revolution, and subsequently served under Napoleon I., and distinguished himself at the siege of Mantua. He was with Napoleon in Egypt, and was one of the few officers chosen to return with him secretly to France. He gradually rose under the Bonaparte régime, and was successively appointed ambassador at the court of Vienna, governor of Vienna, and afterwards ambassador to the Sublime Porte, where he was much esteemed both by the Turks and the Franks. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, he was recalled from Constantinople, by Louis XVIII., who nevertheless conferred upon him the cross of St. Louis. He now withdrew from public life, but on the escape of his old master from Elba, he once more joined him, and during the Hundred Days was created a peer of France. After Waterloo, he again retired from public life, and employed himself in writing memoirs and reminiscences of those scenes and events which had engaged his attention whilst following the destinies of Napoleon. He also wrote on subjects connected with physical geography and engineering.

ANDREW I., ăn'-droo, king of Hungary, was the eldest son of Ladislaus the Bald. On the accession of Peter, in 1044, he and his brother Bala were obliged to quit Hungary; but on promising to abolish Christianity and to restore paganism, they were recalled. When Andrew, however, obtained the throne, he broke his engagement, and compelled his subjects to turn Christians. He was defeated and slain by his brother in 1059.

ANDREW, ST. (See SAINT ANDREW.)

ANDREWES, LANCELOT, ăn'-droos, eminent English prelate. He was descended an ancient Suffolk family, and was educated at Merchant Taylor's school and Pembroke College, Cambridge. He was ordained in 1580, and in 1588 became vicar of St. Giles's, Cripplegate; afterwards appointed chaplain to Queen Elizabeth. He was employed by James I. to defend the sovereignty of kings against Bellarmine, who had attacked it under the name of Matthew Tortus. Dr. Andrewes did this in a piece called "Tortura Torti," and afterwards was made almoner to the king, a privy councillor, dean of the chapel royal and of Westminster, and successively bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester. He was one of the translators of the authorized version of the Bible, author of many lectures and theological treatises, remarkable for their bold defence of evangelical Protestantism, and a very powerful and popular preacher. His great learning was associated with the most exemplary piety.

ANGLESEA, or ANGLESEY, ăn'-gel-se, an island and county of North Wales, in the Irish Sea, separated from the mainland by a narrow strait called Menai, across which there is a bridge of the same name. (See MENAI STRAITS.) Ext. 20 miles long and 17 broad. Area, 271 sq. miles. Desc. Its form is triangular, whilst its land is mostly unenclosed, though well cultivated, and yielding the usual cerealia. It is well supplied with fish. Rivers or Streams. The principal are the Alam, Braint, Cefni, Fraw, and Dulas. Manf. Trifling; but the copper and lead mines, from the time of their discovery in 1768 to 1800, were the most important in the kingdom. Since that period they have declined. Towns. BEAUMARIS, Amlwch, and HOLYHEAD. Pop. 50,919.—This island is the Mona of Tacitus, and was the last stronghold of the Druids, of whose works it has many remains. Curious stone tables are to be seen in it; and there are several remains of architectural and monumental antiquities in the island. Coins, implements, and arms, both Roman and British, are still occasionally found.

ANGLESEA, ARTHUR ANNESLEY, Earl of, son of Viscount Valentia. In the Civil War he joined the royalist party, and in 1643, sat in the parliament at Oxford; but afterwards made his peace with the Parliamentarians, and was despatched as a commissioner to Ulster. He took an active part in the restoration of Charles II., for which he was created, in 1661, Lord Annesley, in the English peerage, and earl of Anglesey; and in 1667 he was made treasurer of the navy. He subsequently became lord privy seal, and in 1680 was accused by Dangerfield, at the bar of the House of Commons, of endeavouring to stifle evidence concerning the popish plot. In 1682 he presented a spirited remonstrance to Charles II., relative to the state of the nation, and the danger to be apprehended from the Duke of York's being a papist. Soon after this he was dismissed from office, when he retired to his country seat, where he died, leaving several children. He wrote a "History of the Troubles of Ireland," from 1641 to 1660, which is lost; but his Memoirs, published in 1608, 8vo, are full of interesting matter.

Born in Dublin, 1614; died 1686.

ANGLESEY, HENRY WILLIAM PAGET, Marquis of, was the eldest son of the first earl of Uxbridge, and at an early age entered upon a military life. On the breaking out of the revolutionary war in 1793 he raised among his father's tenantry a regiment, which was first called the Staffordshire militia, but was subsequently admitted into the regular army as the 80th foot. Of this regiment he became lieutenant-colonel, and 1794 was with the Duke of York in Flanders, where he greatly distinguished himself. When he returned to England he was appointed to the command of a cavalry brigade in the Peninsula, and devoted himself so successfully to his military duties, as to be recognised as the first cavalry officer in the service. He continued to be actively engaged throughout the wars with Napoleon. On the death of his father, in 1812, he succeeded to the title of earl of Uxbridge. At Waterloo he led the final charge which destroyed the French Guards, and near the close of the battle received a shot in the knee, which caused him the loss of his limb. It was for his services in this great conflict that he was created a marquis, and made a knight of the Grand Cross of the order of the bath. He sat in the House of Commons for the Carnarvon boroughs from 1790 to 1796, and for Milbourne Port from 1806 to 1812. In 1818 he was elected a knight of the Garter, and in the following year was made a general of the army. In 1827 he was appointed Master-General of the Ordnance, and in the following year Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, where he established the Board of Education, but was recalled because he favoured Catholic Emancipation, in opposition to the Ministry. In 1842 he was made colonel of the Horse Guards, and in 1846 was appointed field marshal. He was twice married; first, in 1795, to the daughter of the earl of Jersey, from whom he was divorced in 1810, and afterwards to Lady Cowley, his divorced wife becoming Duchess of Argyle.

Born 1768; died 1854.

ANGOLA, ăn-gō'-la, a state of western Africa, situate immediately south of Congo. Its area has not been accurately defined, although a country of considerable importance. The Portuguese apply the name to the whole of the country between the Congo river and lat. 18° S., and extending to an indefinite distance into the interior. This portion of the African coast was discovered in 1484 by Diego Cam, a Portuguese navigator, and it still belongs to Portugal. (See LOANDA.)

Description.—Flat and sterile along the coast, but mountainous in the interior, where the valleys are extremely fertile.

Rivers.—The principal are the Cuanza, Bengar, and Danea. The country generally is well watered with numerous smaller streams.

Zoology.—Almost all the known wild animals of tropical Africa. Birds, reptiles, and insects are numerous. The rivers are infested with crocodiles, and the seacoasts teem with almost every description of fish. Hares, rabbits, antelopes, stags, and goats are abundant, and for domestic purposes, the horse, the ass, and the cow are in use.

Climate.—Although situate near the equator, this is, on account of the trade winds, more temperate and healthy than other regions in the same latitude.

Produce.—Gum, wax, ivory, rice, millet, sugar, mandioca, potatoes, yams, and all kinds of tropical fruits.

Minerals.—Iron, gold, and copper; though none of these have, as yet, been produced in large quantities. Its chief town is Loanda San Paulo.

Population.—Estimated at about 40,000; the religion is chiefly Fetishism.

Lat. between 8° 20′ and 9° 30′ S. Lon. Extending from 14° to 19° E.

ANGORA, or ENGURI, an'-gor'-a, a city of Asia Minor, capital of the vilayet of the same name, standing on a hill near a stream, which flows into the Angora river. It is a place containing extensive remains of Greek, Roman, and Byzantine architecture. Here the famous temple erected in honour of Augustus stood; it was constructed of white marble. Manf. Chiefly yarn and stuffs from the beautiful fine silky wool of the Angora goat. It has also a trade in grain, honey, wax, goat-hides, and Angora cat-skins. Pop. about 35,000, composed of Armenians, Mahometans, Greeks and Jews. Lat. 39° 56′ N. Lon. 32° 50′ E.

History.—The ancient Ancyra occupied the site of the modern town. It originally belonged to Phrygia, and was afterwards the chief town of one of the three Gallic tribes that settled in Galatia. It was the seat of one of the earliest Christian churches.

ANJOU, anzh-oo, the name of an ancient province and government of France, now forming the departments of the Maine and Loire, and parts of the Indre and Loire, the Sarthe, and the Mayenne.

ANJOU, CHARLES, COUNT OF, fourth son of Louis VIII., became the head of the Guelphic party in Italy. He endeavoured, by crushing the Ghibelins, to found an empire in Italy, but was unsuccessful. Whilst engaged in this work, the celebrated massacre, historically known as the "Sicilian Vespers," took place, in which 4,000 of his French soldiers were butchered by the Sicilians in Palermo, on the Easter Monday of 1282. He had laid siege to Messina, where his fleet was captured by the admiral of Peter of Aragon, who had assumed the title of king of Sicily. This event filled him with fury, and he sent a challenge to Peter to meet him in single combat. In order to gain time, the challenge was accepted, though subsequently declined; shortly after which Charles died.
Born 1210; died 1285.

ANJOU, FRANÇOIS DE FRANCE, Duke of, youngest son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medici; he was first called Duke of Alençon. He was of a treacherous, unstable disposition, although it is said that he was a friend of Admiral Coligny, and expressed his abhorrence of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. In 1575 he was at the head of the Huguenot army, and, peace being soon concluded, the duchies of Anjou, Touraine, and Berri were transferred to him. In 1581, such of the Netherland states as were under the control of William of Orange, elected him sovereign, in the hope of obtaining the assistance of the French against the Spaniards, and he was one of the numerous suitors of Queen Elizabeth. The virgin monarch, however, dismissed him, and, becoming an object of suspicion in the Low Countries, he was finally expelled from the country.
Born 1554; died 1584.

ANJOU, RENÉ, Duke of, second son of Duke Louis II. He was the father of Margaret of Anjou, who married Henry VI. of England. He was fond of music, poetry, and painting, and will be remembered as the "Good King René," introduced into Scott's historical romance, "Anne of Gierstein."
Born at Anjou, 1408; died at Aix, 1480.

ANNE, queen of Great Britain, was the second daughter of James II., by Lady Anne Hyde, daughter of the famous earl of Clarendon. In 1684 she married Prince George of Denmark, by whom she had seventeen children, all of whom died young. In 1702, on the death of William III., she succeeded to the crown. Her reign was a continual scene of public glory; and the domineering power of the French nation was completely subdued by the vigour of the British troops under the command of the Duke of Marlborough. One of the greatest events of this important reign was the union of Scotland with England. On account of the number of eminent literary characters who flourished in her reign, it has been called the Augustan Age of Britain. Queen Anne was, throughout her reign, ruled by favourites, first by the famous Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, and afterwards by Mrs. Abigail Masham, between whom and Harley, Earl of Oxford, a quarrel arose, which it is believed hastened the queen's death from apoplexy.

Born at Twickenham, 1664; died 1714.

In 1739 he was chosen commander of an expedition against the Spanish settlements in South America, and sailed from Portsmouth with five men-of-war, a sloop, and two victualling-vessels. In 1741 he doubled Cape Horn, after losing two of his ships. In June following he arrived off Juan Fernandez, with only two ships and two tenders; and having been successful in taking several rich prizes, and in causing much damage to the enemy, he returned to England in 1744, when, for his distinguished services against the Spanish, he was made rear-admiral and one of the lords of the Admiralty. He was also chosen member of parliament for the borough of Heydon. In 1747 he commanded the Channel fleet, and captured six French men-of-war, and four East-Indiamen. For these services he was created Lord Anson, and on the death of Sir John Norris, was named vice-admiral of England. In 1751 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which post he held, with a short interval, till his death. In 1758 he again commanded the Channel fleet, having under him the gallant Sir Edward Hawke. After this he was appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of the British fleet. He is the hero of the well-known book called "Anson's Voyage round the World," which was written by a Mr. Benjamin Robins, from information furnished by Lord Anson.

ANTILLES, ăn-til'-es, a cluster of islands in the West Indies, divided into the Windward and Leeward islands, known also as the Greater and Less Antilles. The Greater comprehend Cuba, Hispaniola, Jamaica, and Porto Rico; and the Less, Antigua, Barbadoes, St. Christophers, Guadaloupe, Martinico, Granada, Trinidad, St. Thomas, Santa Cruz, Dominica, St. Vincent, Tobago, St. Lucie, &c., all of which are noticed under their respective headings.

ANTILOCHUS, ăn-til'-o-kus, the son of Nestor by Eurydice, slain by Memnon at the siege of Troy.

ANTIMACHUS, an-tim'-a-chus, the Colophian, a Greek elegiac and epic poet. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ANTINOUS, ăn-tin'-o-us, a Bithynian youth, remarkable for his beauty, the favourite of the emperor Adrian, who erected a city to his memory, and named it Antinopolis. Medals were struck, statues erected, and festivals held in his honour. He was drowned in the Nile.
Died 130 A.D.

ANTIOCH, ăn-te-ok', now called Antakia or Antakieh, a city of Syria, situate on the south bank of the river Orontes, 57 miles from Aleppo. It is surrounded by walls, inclosing a space of several miles in circumference, a great portion of which is now occupied as gardens. It is one of the most splendid cities of antiquity, named the "Queen of the East," containing many noble buildings and temples, decorated with gold and precious stones. The ruins of a very fine aqueduct still remain. Many of the fine buildings were destroyed by earthquakes, which have been very numerous and disastrous. Only a small portion of the original city, of which the extent is ascertained by the line of walls, is contained within their present inclosure. Antioch is restricted to one corner, in its modern state. The streets are narrow, with very elevated footpaths on each side. The houses are built of stone, and have sloping roofs, a circumstance unusual in the East. On the whole, the general appearance of the place is dull and monotonous. Although there are upwards of a dozen mosques, it is said that there is not a single Christian church; yet it was here that the designation of Christians was first applied to the followers of our Saviour. Its baths and bazaars are numerous.

Manufactures.—Leather, coarse pottery, cotton, stuffs, and silk. This last is the principal branch of industry. A great deal of it is exported to France. Goats' wool, yellow berries, and salted eels are also articles of export.
Population.—About 10,000.
Lat.—36° 11′ N. Lon. 36° 10′ E.

Disastrous earthquakes occurred 148 B.C., and in A.D. 37, 115, 457, 526 (250,000 lives lost), 528, 587, 1822, and 1872.

ANTIOCH, in Pisidia, another city founded by Seleucus Nicator. Ruins of five temples, a theatre, and aqueduct are now the only remains. This is the Antioch referred to in the 13th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. Lat. 38° 18′ N. Lon. 31° 23′ E.

ANTIOCH, BAY OF, in the Mediterranean, commanded by mountains 5,000 feet high. Lat. between 35° and 36° N. Lon. 36 E.

ANTIOCHUS III., ăn-tī'-o-kus, the Great, was the son of Seleucus Callinicus; and on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, 225 B.C., succeeded to the kingdom of Syria. Being defeated by Ptolemy Philopater at Raphia, he was forced to cede to him Palestine and Cœlesyria. He afterwards marched to India, where his success was such as to procure him the title of "great." On the death of Ptolemy Philopater, Antiochus recovered Palestine and Cœlesyria, and reduced a great part of upper Asia. At this the free cities of Greece became alarmed, and applied to the Romans for aid, while Hannibal sought the protection of Antiochus. After several embassies between the king and the republic, hostilities commenced, in which the armies of Greece, under the two Scipios, were victorious, and Antiochus was forced to make an ignoble peace. He was killed in an attempt to plunder a temple at Elymais.
Died 187 B.C.

ANTIOCHUS IV., king of Syria, sometimes called the "Illustrious" and sometimes the "Insane," conquered Palestine and nearly all Egypt. He twice took Jerusalem, but was resisted by the Maccabees. He died raving mad.
Died at Tabre, in Persia, 164 B.C.

ANTIOCHUS, of Ascalon, a philosopher of Athens, under whom Cicero studied. He attempted to reconcile the philosophies of the Academies and Stoics. Lived in the 1st century A.D.

ANTIOCO, SANTO, an-tē'-o-ko, a fertile island lying to the S.W. of Sardinia, in the Mediterranean. Ext. 8 miles long and 3 broad. Pop. 2,300. Lat. 38° 58′. Lon. 8° 26′ E.

ANTIOPE, an-tī'-o-pe, in Greek legend a beautiful woman, ravished by Jupiter in the form of a satyr.

ANTIOPE, an Amazon, who bore a son to Theseus.

ANTIOQUIA, SANTA FE DE, an-tē-o-kē'-a, a town of New Grenada, S. America. It is the principal town of a district trading in sugar and maize. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 6° 36′ N. Lon. 76° W.

ANTIPAROS, an-tip'-a-ros, the ancient Oliaros, an island in the Grecian archipelago, between Paros and Siphanto, 10 miles in circuit. It belongs to the kingdom of Greece. There are few inhabitants. The great attraction of the island is a very beautiful stalactite cavern, 300 feet long and of the same breadth, and 80 feet high. Lat. 37° 2′ N. Lon. 25° 13′ E.

ANTIPATER, an-tip'-a-tor, a native of Macedon, pupil of Aristotle, and the faithful minister of Philip and Alexander. While Alexander was abroad, he left Antipater in the government of Macedon; and by his prudent management he preserved Greece tranquil. On the death of his master, Antipater obtained the European provinces. Not long after, the confederate states of Greece attacked him; but he subdued them, and subverted their democratic forms of government; on which he was called the father of Greece. His last advice to his successor was "never to admit a woman to meddle in state affairs."
Died 319 B.C.

ANTIPHOLUS, an-tiph'-o-lus, a Greek painter, rival of Apelles. Lived in 4th century B.C.

ANTIPHON, ăn'-ti-fon, the Rhamnusian, an Athenian orator, and the first to lay down rules of oratory. He is said to have assisted in establishing the tyranny of the four hundred, for which he was put to death. There are sixteen orations under his name in the collection of ancient orators.
Born at Rhamnus, 480 B.C.; died 411 B.C.

ANTIPODES, ăn-tip'-o-dez, a small island, so called from being the land the most nearly opposite to Great Britain, in the S. Pacific Ocean. Lat. 49° 32′ S. Lon. 178° E.

ANTISANA, an-te-sa'-na, a hamlet in the Andes, of the kingdom of Quito, 13,500 feet above the level of the sea. It is the highest inhabited place on the surface of the globe.

ANTISTHENES, ăn-tis'-the-nes, an Athenian philosopher, and founder of the sect of the Cynics or Realists, one of the pupils of Socrates. He procured Melitus to be put to death, and Anytus banished, for their persecution of Socrates. Of his works only a few apophthegms remain.—Lived in 4th century B.C.

ANTI-TAURUS, ăn-ti-tor'-us, a series of mountain-chains in Asiatic Turkey.

ANTIUM, ăn'-te-um, a maritime town of Italy, built upon a promontory, 33 miles S. from Rome. The site is now occupied by the village Porto d'Anzo. It was the capital of the Volsci. Camillus took it, and carried all its rostra, or beaks of its ships, to Rome, and placed them in the Forum on a tribunal, which thence was called rostrum. The emperors Nero and Caligula were born here. It was a splendid town, with several fine temples, and was much resorted to by wealthy Romans.

ANTIVARI, or BAR, a town of Albanian Turkey, situated on the Adriatic Sea. There is a good harbour, and a considerable maritime trade is carried on. It is a Roman Catholic bishopric. Pop. about 6,000. Lat. 42° 2′ N. Lon. 19° 13′ E.

ANTOINE, ST., an'-to-een, the name of several small towns and parishes in France.

ANTOINETTE, MARIE, mar'-e ăn'-twoi-net, arch-duchess of Austria, and queen of France, was one of the most beautiful persons of her time, as she was also one of the most unfortunate. She had a highly-cultivated mind, and in her fifteenth year was married to the grandson of Louis XV., afterwards Louis XVI. In 1793 she fell a victim to the fury of an infatuated French mob.

Born at Vienna, 1755; beheaded at Paris, 1793.

ANTOMMARCHI, FRANCESCO, an-tom-ar'-ke, a distinguished French anatomist, and physician to Napoleon I. at St. Helena.

Born at Corsica; died at San Antonio, Cuba, 1844.

ANTONELLI, GIACOMO, Cardinal, an-to-nel'-e, a prime minister of Pope Pius IX., in whose councils he has exercised great influence. His views are conservative. He was the son of a poor woodcutter, and was educated at the Grand Seminary of Rome, where he highly distinguished himself. In 1841 he became Under-Secretary of State to the Ministry of the Interior, and rose to the highest offices in the State. He was raised to the dignity of a Cardinal in 1847.

Born at Sonnino, near the Pontine Marshes, 1806. Died 1876.

ANTONELLI DA MESSINA, an Italian painter, who studied in the Netherlands, and on his return exercised a great influence in Italian art by the introduction of the Flemish method of painting in oil.

Born in Sicily, 1414; died 1493.

ANTONIA, ăn-tō'-ne-a, the name of some eminent Roman ladies, the most remarkable of whom was the wife of Drusus, the son of Livia, and brother of Tiberius. She became mother of three children—Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor, and the debauched Livia. Lived A.D. 38.

ANTONIDES, HANS, Dutch poet, and the son of poor parents, who at an early age attracted attention by a tragedy. He studied physic, and practised as a doctor. His poems show great vigour of imagination.

Born at Goes, in Zealand, 1647; died 1664.

ANTONIN, ST., an-to-nă, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Tarn and Garonne, 20 miles from Montauban. Manf. Woollen stuffs and leather. Pop. 5,500.

ANTONINUS, MARCUS. (See AURELIUS MARCUS.)

ANTONINUS, TITUS AURELIUS, ăn-to-nī'-nus, surnamed Pius, on account of his great and good qualities, was the son of a Roman consul, and was adopted by the emperor Adrian, whom he succeeded. When told of conquering heroes, he said, with Scipio, "I prefer the life and preservation of one citizen to the death of a hundred enemies." He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, and built a rampart between the Firths of Clyde and Forth; but he waged no wars during his reign, and only repulsed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. His life was a scene of universal benevolence, and his last moments were easy, though preceded by a lingering illness.

Born near Lavinium, 86; died 161.

ANTONIO, NICHOLAS, Spanish bibliographer who wrote the Bibliotheca Hispanica, or history of Spanish literature. At his death he left a library of 30,000 volumes.

Born at Seville, 1617; died at Madrid, 1684.

ANTONIUS, MARCUS, ăn-tō'-ne-us, a celebrated Roman orator, who was made consul, and was afterwards governor of Cilicia, where he distinguished himself by his naval achievements, and obtained the honour of a triumph. After his return he discharged the office of censor with great credit. Cicero says, that in him Rome might boast of a rival in eloquence to Greece itself. He belonged to the party of Sulla, and was put to death by order of Marius and Cinna.

Born 143 B.C.; died 87 B.C.

ANTONIUS, MARCUS (Mark Antony), the triumvir, was grandson of the preceding, and son of M. Antonius Creticus, by Julia, a noble lady of great merit. On the death of his father, he led a very dissipated life. Afterwards he applied himself to the study of the art of war, and evinced great courage and address in restoring Ptolemy to the throne of Egypt. He next served in Gaul, under Cæsar, who enabled him to go to Rome, where he obtained the quæstorship, in which office he became very active in behalf of his patron. He assisted Cæsar in gaining the empire, for which service he was made governor of Italy, and commander of the legions, by whom he was greatly beloved on account of his liberality. Cæsar afterwards appointed him master of the horse, for his conduct at the battle of Pharsalia, and chose him as his colleague in the consulship, 44 B.C. After the death of Cæsar and the flight of his assassins, Antony began to exercise his authority in such a manner as to convince all parties that he aimed at assuming the sovereignty. To check his career the patriots espoused the cause of Octavius, the heir of Cæsar, when Antony retired to his government of Cisalpine Gaul, and began a civil war by laying siege to Mertina, now Modena. The consuls Hirtius and Pansa, with Octavius, were sent against him, and though he was defeated, both consuls were slain, and Octavius left alone at the head of a victorious army. Antony now crossed the Alps, and joined Lepidus, with whom and Octavius (who betrayed his party) he contrived to form a second triumvirate, to which Cicero fell a victim, through the personal revenge of Antony. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi, he went into Asia, and distinguished himself, above all other princes, by the splendour of his court. Here Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, captivated him, and he accompanied her to Alexandria, where he gave himself up to pleasure. In the mean time Octavius, at the instigation of Fulvia, the wife of Antony, commenced hostilities in Italy; but a reconciliation being effected between them, Antony married Octavia, the sister of his colleague. A new division of the empire was the consequence of this alliance; the West being allotted to Octavius, the East to Antony, and Africa to Lepidus; but Antony, infatuated by the charms of Cleopatra, renewed his intercourse with her in a manner so shameless and undisguised, that he was deprived of his consular dignity, and war was declared against the Egyptian queen by the senate. Immense preparations were making on both sides, whilst Antony was immersed in dissipation, which destroyed his military spirit. At the battle of Actium he escaped in a small vessel, and finding himself deserted on all sides, stabbed himself.

Born at Rome, 83 B.C.; died 30 B.C.

ANTONY, ST., ăn'-to-ne, the founder of monachism, who, though born to a large estate, renounced the world, and assumed the habit of a recluse. He resided for the greater part of an unusually prolonged life in cells on the desert near the Nile. At the age of 104, he went to Alexandria to dispute with the Arians. The fame of his sanctity drew to him many followers, for whom he erected numerous monasteries. Roman Catholic writers relate many whimsical stories of the assaults which this saint encountered from evil spirits.

Born at Koma, Upper Egypt, 251; died 356.

ANTONY of Bourbon, king of Navarre, which title he obtained by his marriage with Jeanne d'Albert, in 1548. He was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme, and, renouncing the Protestant religion, in which he had been educated, united with the duke of Guise and Montmorency in forming the famous Catholic league. On the breaking out of the civil war, he raised an army, and took Blois, Tours, and Rouen. At the siege of the last-mentioned place he received a wound in the shoulder, of which he died in 1562. He left a son, who was afterwards Henry IV. (See JEANNE D'ALBERT.)

ANTRAIGUES, EMANUEL-LOUIS-HENRI DELAUNAY, ang'-traig, Count of, French author, who by turns advocated extreme notions. A book published by him, 1788, on the subject of the rights of States-General, assisted the Revolution, but in the following year he advocated the rights of the King and aristocracy. He resided afterwards in Russia and England, advocating the cause of the Bourbons, and writing against Napoleon. He, with his wife, were murdered in London by an Italian servant.

Born at Vivavais, 1765; died 1812.

ANTRIM, ăn'-trim, a maritime county in the north-east of Ireland, province of Ulster, bounded N. and E. by the sea, S. by Belfast Lough and the river Lagan, and W. in Lough Neagh and the county of Down, and a small portion of the county of Londonderry. Ext. about 54 miles long and 28 broad. Area, 1,191 square miles, of which about 79 square miles are under water. Desc. Mountainous near the coast, several of the mountains having an altitude of from 1,500 to 1,800 feet, and the south-west abounds with bogs. A stupendous assemblage of basaltic columns, the Giant's Causeway, is seen on the maritime confines of Antrim; as also Fair Head, and other lofty capes and promontories. The valleys, especially that of the Lagan, are very fertile, and there are extensive tracts of rich land along the shores of Lough Neagh, and between Belfast and Carrickfergus. Coal and iron ore are worked, and porphyry, rock-salt, chalcedony, jasper, onyx, opal, and talc are found. There are many interesting antiquities, mounts, cairns, round towers, and remains of ecclesiastical structures. Rivers. The principal are the Bann and the Laggan; the former forming the west, and the latter the south boundary. Manf. Linen yarn, white and brown linen, wool, canvas, paper, kelp; and there is an iron foundry. Considerable fisheries are carried on, and great quantities of butter made and sold for exportation. Towns. The chief are ANTRIM, BELFAST, CARRICKFERGUS, LISBURN, BALLYMENA, and LARNE. Pop. 423,127.

ANTRIM, a town of Ireland, in Antrim county, situate at the north end of Lough Neagh, near the point where it receives the Six-mile Water, 13 miles N. W. of Belfast. Manf. Linen, hosiery, paper; and some malting and distilling are carried on. Pop. 2,131.

ANTWERP, ant'-werp, a province of Belgium, bounded on the N. by Holland, S. by Brabant, E. by Limbourg, and W. by East Flanders. Ext. 40 miles from E. to W., and 35 from N. to S. Area, 1,096 square miles. Desc. Flat, but fertile, and highly cultivated. In the northern parts there are some barren heaths, and towards the south the country is well wooded. Pro. All the crops common to England. Rivers. The principal are the Scheldt and its affluents, the Rupel, the Dyle, and the Greater and Lesser Nethe. Manf. Various and extensive; but these will be specified under the several headings of the chief towns in the province. Towns. The principal are ANTWERP, MECHLIN, BOOM, GHEEL, LIERRE or LIER, and TURNHOUT. Pop. about 625,876.—This province is the see of the Archbishop of Mechlin, and by the marriage of the Archduke Maximilian with Mary of Burgundy, it came into the possession of the house of Austria, with whom it remained till the French revolution. In 1814 it was made a part of the kingdom of the Netherlands, and in 1830 it became a province of Belgium. By means of its rivers, canals, and railroads, it is connected not only with the other provinces of Belgium, but France, Prussia, and the interior of Germany.

ANTWERP, a large and well-built city on the Scheldt, capital of the above province, and the principal seaport of Belgium. It is situated about 50 miles from the open sea, and is 25 miles N. of Brussels. It has a deep and capacious harbour. The fortifications which formerly existed have been removed, and the site is occupied by fine boulevards and streets. New fortifications were erected in 1860, at a greater distance from the town. Numerous canals permeate the city in all directions, and enable vessels to deposit their cargoes on the quays and wharfs in the very centre of the town. Its cathedral, dedicated to Notre Dame, which is very large, is one of the most magnificent Gothic edifices in the world. It was begun in the 14th century, but not completed till 1518; the tower rises to a height of 403 feet, the tower intended to correspond has never been completed. The cathedral is 500 feet long by 250 broad, and it is the only church in Europe with six aisles. It contains three of Ruben's finest pictures. The Church of St. James, built in the 15th century, is a splendid edifice, richly decorated, and contains the family chapel and tomb of Rubens, who painted the fine altar-piece. There are several other churches, one of which is occupied by an English congregation. The old mansion of the Hanseatic League (built in 1564) is a fine building, so is the Hotel de Ville. A noble picture gallery and public library should also be mentioned. The Exchange, which was the finest in Europe, was destroyed by fire in 1858, and rebuilt and opened in 1872; and the depôt called the Warehouse for Baltic or East-country Merchandise, is a building of vast dimensions. There are large docks occupying nearly an area of 100 acres, and affording about four miles of quay room. The two oldest docks were constructed by order of the Emperor Napoleon. Teniers, Snyders, Vandyck, and Jordaen, the engraver Edelinck, the geographer Ortelius, the modern novelist Henri Conscience, were all born here. From London, Hull, and Liverpool, there is a regular steam communication to Antwerp; and there are regular lines of steamers to the United States, Brazil, La Plata, and Chili. Most parts of the continent can be reached by railway.

Manf.—Lace, linen, and cotton, sugar, white lead, tobacco, and malt liquor. The lapidaries of Antwerp are famous for their skill in diamond-cutting.

Lat. 51° 14'. Lon. 4° 24' E.

History.—The town was founded in the 7th century

For many centuries it was the most important commercial town in Europe, but its prosperity greatly declined during the wars of the 16th century.

ANURADHAPURA, or ANURAJAPOORA, the ancient capital of Ceylon, once a large and splendid city, now a mass of ruins. The remains of temples and other public buildings are very numerous and interesting. The Lowa Maha Paya, or palace of the priests, contained nearly a thousand apartments. It was erected about 150 years before the Christian era. The town was founded 750 B.C., and deserted 769 A.D.

ANYTUS, an'-i-tus, a rhetorician of Athens, the enemy of Socrates. He prevailed on Aristophanes to ridicule the philosopher in a comedy, and, in conjunction with Melitus, procured his condemnation. After the death of the philosopher, the people discovered their error, when Anytus was banished, and stoned to death at Heraclea.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

ANVILLE, JEAN BAPTISTE BOURGIGNON D', French geographer. His maps were highly valued, and after his death his collection was purchased by the French Government for the Royal Library.

Born at Paris, 1697; died 1782.

ANVARI, a Persian poet, who enjoyed the special favour of the Sultan Sandjar, and accompanied him in many of his warlike expeditions. Lived in the 12th and 13th centuries.

ANZIN, an-zăn, a town of France, in the department Nord, one mile from Valenciennes, on the Escant. Manf. Glass and iron, and it is the centre of the greatest coal-works of France. Pop. 7,300. It is a station on the railway from Douai to Hennes.

AOSTA, a-os'-ta, a town of Italy, in the province of Turin, 49 miles N. of Turin. It was the ancient Augusta Prætoria. There are a cathedral, town-hall, and Roman amphitheatre, triumphal arch, and other Roman remains. The district in which it stands is noted for its vegetable and mineral products, and the Val d'Aosta is one of the most lovely of the Alpine valleys. Manf. Leather, hemp, and cheese. Wine is produced. Pop. 7,000.

APATIN, a town of Hungary, on the left bank of the Danube, 125 miles S. of Pesth. Manf. Silk and woollen cloth, and there are large dyeworks. Pop. 11,000.

APELDOORN, a town of Holland, in the province of Guelderland, 17 miles N. of Arnheim. There are large paper-mills. Pop. 12,000.

APELLES, ă-pel'-es, a native of the isle of Cos, called the "Prince of Painters," much admired by Alexander the Great, who would permit no other person to paint his portrait. His most famous work was a painting of Venus rising from the sea, which Augustus purchased of the people of Cos, and placed in the temple of Cæsar. He was a man of wit, and much addicted to pleasure. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

APELLICON, ă-pel'-i-con, a Peripatetic philosopher, to whom the world is indebted for the works of Aristotle, which he bought at a large price about ninety years B.C. They were afterwards seized by Sylla, and carried to Rome.

APENNINES, ăp'-e-nines, a chain of mountains in Italy, which begins near Mount Appio, one of the maritime Alps, in the territory of Genoa, and after running a considerable distance to the E., traverses Italy in its whole length from N. to S., dividing it nearly equally. When near their termination, the chain separates into two branches, one of which runs to the south-east as far as Cape di Leuca, in the Terra di Otranto, and the other takes a westward direction to the Strait of Messina, which separates Sicily from Calabria. The entire length is about 800 miles, and the chain is divided into the Northern, Central, and Southern Apennines. Desc. The Apennines are far inferior to the Alps in point of grandeur and elevation, their general height seldom reaching beyond 4,000 feet, whilst their highest point is that of Monte Corno, in the Abruzzo, attaining nearly 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. In their appearance they are not peaked like the Alps or the Pyrenees but present themselves in smooth undulating forms, their rocks appearing bare only in the loftiest parts. Minerals. Not many. Iron is found in small quantities, and near Cosenza there are some extensive salt deposits. Their principal wealth consists of the marble of Carrara, Serravezza, and Sienna. Vegetation. Up to 3,000 feet the principal chain is covered with a varied vegetation; the olive, the palm, the citron, and the orange, forming the lower belt. Above this, the mountains are generally arid and destitute of vegetation. There are no extensive forests in the Apennines. Volcanoes. Vesuvius, the only active one on the continent of Europe. Lat. between 38° and 44° 30′ N. Lon. between 7° 40′ and 18° 20′ E.

APENRADE, a town of Schleswig, kingdom of Prussia, situated on the Apenrade fiord, an arm of the Little Belt, 38 miles N. of Schleswig. There is a harbour, and ship-building is carried on. Pop. 6,000.

APHRODITE, the Greek Venus. The name means "born in the foam of the sea."

APICIUS, ă-pish'-e-us, the name of three celebrated Roman gluttons. The first lived under Sylla, the second under Augustus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. The second expended immense sums in gluttony, and was the inventor of several sorts of cakes. Finding his wealth reduced to a sum of £12,000, he, thinking he must starve, poisoned himself.

APION, a'-pion, a Greek grammarian and commentator upon Homer. He taught rhetoric at Rome, and was sent as an ambassador by the Alexandrians to complain to Caligula of the Jews. Josephus, the Jewish writer replied to his statements. Lived in the 1st century.

APOLDA, a-pol'-da, a town of Germany, in the grand duchy of Saxe-Weimar, on the river Ilm, nine miles E. of Weimar. Manf. Chiefly hosiery and cloth. It has thermal springs, and is a station on the railway from Berlin to Weimar. Pop. 10,600.

APOLLINARIS, SIDONIUS, a Christian bishop and theological writer. He was of noble family, and married a daughter of Avitus, afterwards emperor of Rome. Having entered the Church, he became bishop of Clermont.

Born at Lyons, 430; died 484.

APOLLINARUS, SULPICIUS, a famous grammarian of Carthage, who lived in the 2nd century.

APOLLO, ă-pol'-o, the son of Jupiter and Latona, called also Phœbus, and supposed to be a mythological embodiment of the sun. According to Cicero, there were four of this name. To the son of Jupiter and Latona, however, all the actions of the others seem to have been attributed. Apollo destroyed with arrows the serpent Python, which Juno had sent to persecute Latona. Hence he was called Pythius. Apollo was the god of the fine arts, of medicine, music, poetry, and eloquence: of all these he was deemed the inventor. He had received from Jupiter the power of knowing futurity, and he was the only one of the gods whose oracles were in general repute over the world. He is generally represented with long hair, tall, beardless, with a handsome shape, holding in his hand a bow, and sometimes a lyre: his head is generally surrounded with beams of light. He had temples and statues in every country, particularly in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The cock, the grasshopper, the wolf, the crow, the swan, the hawk, the olive, the laurel, the palm-tree, &c., were sacred to him; and in his sacrifices wolves and hawks were offered, as they were the natural enemies of the flocks over which he presided. Bullocks and lambs were also immolated to him. As he presided over poetry, he was often seen on Mount Parnassus with the nine Muses. His most famous oracles were at Delphi, Delos, Claros, Tenedos, Cyrrha, and Patara. His most splendid temple was at Delphi, to which every nation and individual brought considerable presents when they consulted the oracle. He had a famous Colossus in Rhodes, which was one of the seven wonders of the world.

APOLLODORUS, ă-pol'-o-dor'-us, an eminent architect, who was employed by the emperor Trajan to build the great bridge over the Danube, and other structures. His Trajan column in the centre of the Forum is supposed to be the finest work of the kind in existence. The emperor Hadrian banished him from Rome, and he was shortly afterwards put to death.
Born at Damascus, 60; died 130.

APOLLODORUS, a famous painter at Athens, who flourished B.C. 408. He was outshone by Zeuxis, which he greatly lamented in a poem.

APOLLONIA, ă-pol-ō'-ne-a, the name of several ruined cities of antiquity.

APOLLONIUS, surnamed MOLO, a Greek rhetorician, who taught Cæsar and Cicero. He was an ambassador to Rome from the Rhodians, and was the first Greek who addressed the Senate without the aid of an interpreter.
Born at Alabanda, Greece.

APOLLONIUS, surnamed RHODIUS, a Greek poet, author of the "Argonautica," and keeper of the great library at Alexandria.
Born at Alexandria, 3rd century B.C.

APOLLONIUS, PERGÆUS, Greek geometrician, second in reputation only to Archimedes. His works were held in great estimation.
Born about 250 B.C.

APOLLONIUS, TYANÆUS, Pythagorean philosopher, famous for his ascetic habits. After his death divine honours were paid to him. The early opponents of Christianity ascribed to him the power of working miracles similar to those performed by Christ.
Born at Tyana, Cappadocia.

APOLLOS, an Alexandrian Jew, who was converted to Christianity, and associated himself with the Apostles. He is referred to by St. Paul in his Epistles, and in the Acts of the Apostles.

APOSTOLIUS, MICHAEL, a Greek theologian and rhetorician. When Constantinople was taken by the Turks he fled to Italy; but, engaging in some philosophical disputes, was compelled to retire to Crete.
Died about 1480.

APPALACHIAN MOUNTAINS, (See AMERICA, NORTH.)

APPALACHICOLA, ăp-a-lăk'-ă-kō'-la, a river of the United States, which, after a course of 70 miles, falls into St. George's Sound, in the Gulf of Mexico.

APPENDINI, FRANCESCO MARIA, Italian historian and philosopher. Professor of rhetoric at Ragusa, and head of the Academy.
Born at Poirino, 1768; died at Zara, 1837.

APPENWEIER, ap-en-vaī'-er, a town eight miles from Kehl, on the Baden Railway, Germany, where is the junction of the railways running into Germany, France, and Switzerland. Pop. 1,500.

APPENZELL, ap-ent'-sel, a canton of Switzerland, which is wholly encompassed by that of St. Gall. Area, 152 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, particularly in the S., where Mont Sentis rises to 8,215 feet. It is divided into what is called the outer and inner Rhodes, the latter of which is an agricultural district, and the former manufacturing. Manf. Linen and cotton goods, dyeing, embroidery, and various other branches of industry. Rivers. The Sittern is the principal. Towns. Appenzell and Trogau, Gais and Herisau. Pop. about 66,799.

APPENZELL, the capital of Inner Rhodes, in the above canton, six miles from St. Gall. Pop. 3,700.

APPIAN, an eminent writer of Roman history in Greek. He was an advocate at Rome, and one of the procurators of the empire.
Born at Alexandria.

APPIANI, ap-pi-ā'-ni, ANDREA, Italian fresco and oil painter. Known for altar-pieces, portraits, and graceful poetical subjects.
Born at Milan, 1754; died 1817.

APPIN, ăp-in, an extensive district of Argyleshire, Scotland, and formerly the country of the Stuarts.

APPIUS, CLAUDIUS CRASSUS, a Roman decemvir, infamous for his attempt to obtain possession of Virginia, who was killed by her father Virginius to save her from dishonour. Appius was deposed by the army for his conduct, and died in prison, according to Livy, by his own hand.
Lived in the 5th century B.C.

APPLEBY, ăp'-el-be, a borough and market-town of England, and the chief town of Westmoreland, on the left bank of the Eden, which is crossed by a fine old bridge, connecting the town with Bongate, a suburb. There is an old castle which held out, under the heroic Lady Pembroke, against the Parliamentary forces in the time of Charles I., and is now in the possession of her descendant, the earl of Thanet. The church of St. Lawrence is a large ancient edifice, originally erected in 1177, but partially rebuilt in 1665, and contains some interesting historical monuments. Pop. 1,989. A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

APPOMATTOX, ăp-o-măt'-ox, a county in the centre of Virginia, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 10,080.

APSHERON, ăp-shĕ'-ron, an Asiatic peninsula, running 40 miles into the Caspian Sea, and terminating in Cape Apsheron, which forms the E. point of the Caucasian chain. This is the place of the sacred flame, whence the fire-worshippers of Asia drew their superstition. Sulphur and inflammable gas are so plentifully mixed with its soil, that immense quantities of white and black naphtha are annually taken from it. Saffron, salt, and madder are also obtained on this peninsula. On the southern coast is the port of Baku. Lat. of Cape Apsheron, 42° 12′ N. Lon. 50° 20′ E.

APT, ăpt, a town of France, department Vaucluse, 30 miles E. of Avignon. It is well built, and surrounded by walls. The cathedral was commenced in 1050, on the site of a more ancient edifice, but was not completed until the 17th century. There are many Roman remains near the town, including a bridge said to have been constructed by Julius Cæsar. The town was the Roman Apta Julia. Manf. Woollens, cottons, confectionery, and earthenware. A considerable trade is done in grain, fruit, and cattle. Pop. 6,000.

APULEIUS, LUCIUS, ap-u-lē'-i-us, philosopher and writer of romance. Educated at Carthage and Athens. Married a wealthy widow of Alexandria, and was charged with having obtained her affections by magical arts. He defended himself in Othello fashion, and was acquitted. He afterwards obtained great reputation as an orator, and after his death statues were erected in his honour. His "Metamorphoses," or "Golden Ass," is his best-known work, but he was a versatile, humorous and able writer. Cervantes, Le Sage, and Boccaccio adopted some of his amusing stories.

Born in Numida, 125.

APULIA, or PUGLIA, ă-pū'-le-a, the common name for the country comprised in the Italian provinces which extend along the western shore of the Adriatic.

APURE, ă'-poor, a river of South America, which rises in New Grenada, and after running in an easterly direction for 500 miles, and receiving numerous tributaries, falls by several mouths into the Orinoco.

APURIMAC, a Peruvian river. (See TAMBO.)

AQUAMBOE, a-kam'-bo, a country in the interior of the Gold Coast of Africa, extending 20 miles along the river Volta, and 100 miles inland. The territory to the west of the river is under British protection; that to the east is subject to the king of Dahomey. It has a town of the same name.

AQUAPIM, an extensive district in the interior of the Gold Coast of Africa, behind Accra. There are well-cultivated valleys and wooded hills.

AQUILA, a-kē'-la, a town of Italy, capital of the province Abruzzo Ulteriore II., situate on a hill, on the river Alterno, about 56 miles from Rome. It contains a citadel, several fine palaces, a cathedral, a number of parish churches, and a great many cloisters. Manf. Chiefly linen goods; but in general articles of commerce it does a considerable trade. Pop. 17,877.—It stands on the site of the ancient Amiternum, the birthplace of Sallust. In 1688, 1703, and 1706, it was seriously injured by earthquakes.

AQUILA, aq'-ui-la, a native of Pontus, who translated the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek. Lived in the 2nd century.

AQUILA, CASPAR, the Latin name of Caspar Adler, a German theologian, who, having adopted the principles of the Reformation, suffered imprisonment. He was afterwards professor of Hebrew at Wittenberg, and assisted Luther in translating the Bible. In 1528 he became Protestant bishop of Saalfield, but was driven from the place.

Born at Augsberg, 1488; died at Saalfield, 1560.

AQUILA, SERAFINO DELL', Italian poet and improvisatore, patronised by the Borgias.

Born at Aquila, 1466; died 1500.

AQUILEIA, aq'-ui-lē'-i-a, an ancient city at the head of the Adriatic, colonized by the Romans about 181 B.C. It is now a small fishing village, but there are many traces of its ancient splendour. Lat. 45° 48′ N. Lon. 13° 23′ E.

AQUILLIUS, MANLIUS, a Roman consul, who was defeated by Mithridates, 88 B.C., and killed by having molten gold poured down his throat.

AQUITANIA, the name given by the Romans to that part of Gallia between the Garamna and the Pyrenees, names identical with the Gascony of later times. The kingdom of Aquitania was bestowed by Charlemagne on the Infant Louis in 781. It afterwards was named Guienne, and now forms the department Gironde and Lot-et-Garonne.

AQUINAS, ST. THOMAS, ă-qui'-năs, called the "Angelical Doctor," was born of a noble Italian family, and entered into the society of Preaching Friars at Naples, against the inclination of his parents. After teaching divinity in various universities, he settled at Naples, and obtained a pension from the king. He refused the archbishopric of Naples, which was offered him by Pope Clement IV. The authority of Aquinas has always been very high in the Roman church, and he was canonized in 1323. His works make 17 vols. folio, and have been printed several times at several places.

Born in his father's castle of Aquino, Italy, 1225; died at the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, 1274.

ARABAT, a fortified town in the Crimea, on the shore of the Sea of Azov. Lat 45° 47′ N. Lon. 35° 29′ E.

ARABGIR, or ARABKIR, a town of Turkey in Asia, in the vilayet of Sivas, 150 miles S.S.W. of Trebizond. Manf. Silk and cotton goods.

ARABIA, ă-rai'-be-a, the south-western peninsula of Asia, the general outline forming an irregular quadrangle, bounded S. by the Indian Ocean and the Gulf of Aden, W. by the Red Sea, E. by the Gulf of Persia, and N. by Turkey in Asia. The northern limit is not very clearly defined, some writers including the Syrian desert to the east of Palestine as far as the 34th parallel of north latitude, but the boundary most generally accepted is a line drawn from Suez to the head of the Persian Gulf. Taking this line as the northern limit, the extreme length of the peninsula is about 1,300 miles; the greatest breadth, at 23° N. lat., 1,500 miles, and the narrowest part, at the northern boundary, nearly 900 miles. The western, or Red Sea coast, consists of a barren strip of sand and coral reefs, behind which is a range of mountains, seldom exceeding 2,000 feet in height. There are no harbours, but many small islands, mostly of volcanic origin. Near the entrance of the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb is the island of Perim, which is considered a military position of some importance. The south-eastern coast is generally of similar character, except that there are several good harbours, especially ADEN, Dafar, and Keshum. The eastern coast, stretching along the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman, is more fertile, and in some parts well cultivated. A good harbour, Grane, or Keweyt, is near the head of the Persian Gulf, the south-eastern limi: of which is the promontory headed by Cape Musandam, stretching in a north-easterly direction, beyond which is the Gulf of Oman, opening into the Indian Ocean. The extensive bay formed by the bold sweep of the north-western coast of the Musandam peninsula is studded with islands, and further north, between El Katif and Ras Anjir, is the island of Bahrein, the centre of the great pearl fisheries. On the south-western side of the Gulf of Oman is MUSKAT, with a very fine harbour. The general aspect of Arabia is that of an elevated tableland, gradually rising to the east and south. In the interior is a vast ring of arid desert, broadest on the south and east, and rocky towards the north and west, enclosing undulating table-lands with fertile valleys, and occupying about one-third of the area of the peninsula, with an elevation of from 1,000 to 3,000 feet. The Sinaitic peninsula, at the head of the Red Sea, is of a triangular form, the sides formed by the Gulf of Suez on the west and the Gulf of Akabah on the east. Its character is rocky, rising in the centre to the mountains of SINAI. The mountain ranges on the eastern coast, extending along the shores of the Persian Gulf and into the Musandam promontory, are from 2,000 to 3,000 feet in height. Two parallel chains, Jebel-Aja and Jebel-Solma, extend from N.N.E. to S.S.W., the loftiest peak not being more than 5,000 feet above the sea level. The Toweyk range, described as the backbone of the Arabian peninsula, runs nearly due north and south, the distance from the Persian Gulf varying from 100 to 200 miles. There are many gulleys and gorges in this chain, which has an average breadth of nearly 100 miles, the greatest elevation being about 5,000 feet. In the district of Oman the peaks of Jebel Akhdar are 6,000 feet in height. There are no navigable rivers, and the few streams are mostly dry in the hot season. Frequently, in some parts of the country, there is no rainfall for many months. The great Arabian desert, the Dahna, or "red" of the Arabs, so named from the prevailing colour of the sand, in the south part of the peninsula, within the tropics, has an area of about 50,000 square miles. The surface presents the appearance of huge sand waves, and it is rarely traversed even by the natives.

Origin of the Name.—This is uncertain. Some writers trace it to Araba, a level waste; others to the Hebrew Arabeh, a barren place; other derivations are from the Hebrew Arab, to go down, and from Eber, a wanderer.

Territorial and Political Divisions.—Ptolemy and other Greek geographers divided the peninsula into Arabia Petræa, in the north-west; Arabia Felix, in the west and south-west; and Arabia Deserta, the unknown desert in the interior. These divisions are now superseded by a classification into eight districts, each having a distinct character, geographically or politically:—

1. The BAHR-EL-TOUR SINAI, or Sinaitic peninsula. (See SINAI).

2. The HEJAZ (land of pilgrimage) extending along the coast of the Red Sea between 28° and 21° N. lat. The principal towns are JIDDAH, MECCA, and MEDINA. This division is principally subject to Ottoman authority. Farther south are Jebel Aseer, a mountainous tract, inhabited by the Wahabees, and governed by their own sheikhs; and Aboo Areesh, until about a century since attached to Yemen.

3. TEHEMAH, a strip of land extending from N. lat. 15° 30′ to Aden, and partially occupied by the Turks. The chief towns are Hodeydeh, Loyeha, Mokha (better known as Mocha), famous for its export of coffee.

4. YEMEN. This district extends to the eastward of the coast ranges which separate it from Tehemah. It has been recently conquered by the Turks, and now forms a province of the Turkish empire, the capital being SANAA, once a very large and beautiful town.

5. HADRAMAUT, an extensive district on the south-east coast, and extending a considerable distance inland. It is divided into several small principalities, governed by native chiefs. There are no towns of importance, the best known places, the ports of Dafar and Kasheem, being small places.

6. OMAN, the kingdom of MUSKAT, or Maskat.

7. BAHREIN, on the Persian Gulf, including the island of the name and other districts, chiefly known in connection with the pearl fisheries.

8. NEJD, the whole central inhabited district of Arabia.

These divisions will be more fully described under the appropriate headings.

Population.—A careful estimate of the population of the entire peninsula, made by a Turkish official, puts it at a little under 11,000,000, about one-fifth of whom belong to the Bedouin, or wandering tribes. The name Bedouin is derived from "Ahl Bedoo," or dwellers on the open land; the inhabitants of the towns and settled districts are known as Ahl Hadr. The former are shepherds and herdsmen, living in tents, and migrating from place to place. They plunder caravans, unless the travellers can show that they have obtained permission to enter the territory, regarding, as Mr. Palgrave says, the enforced tribute as a substitute for passports and export dues exacted elsewhere. There are many tribes, each under the rule of its own sheikh. A higher title is that of ameer, who, in the more settled districts, has a certain control over a province. The Arabs are of middle stature, thin, with slender extremities, black eyes, hair, and beard, and of swarthy complexion. The women are fairer, and, when young, many of them may be considered handsome; but when old their features assume quite a different character, and are rather repulsive than otherwise. They generally lead a frugal and abstemious life: many depend for subsistence entirely on their flocks. The flesh of the camel is sometimes eaten, on great occasions. It is considered a great delicacy. Porcupines, weasels, rats, lizards, and locusts form a portion of the food of the Arabians. Their common diet is not bread, properly so called, but soft thin cakes half baked, and prepared from a species of millet. Wine is prohibited by the Koran, but different kinds of spirituous liquors are made from honey, sugar, raisins, and other fruits. The dress of the Arabs varies. The men in general wear wide drawers and a shirt, and have a cape or handkerchief tied round their heads; but in the hottest parts they go almost naked. The dress of the women consists of a cloak, a very wide shift, and pantaloons in proportion. They are frequently veiled. The children run about in a state of nudity. The majority of the people dwell in tents made of camel's hair, wandering about with their whole property from place to place; while some of them inhabit villages, towns, and cities.

Religion.—Nominally Mahometan, but the wandering tribes pay little attention to any formal observances, and in some of the wilder districts sun worship and fire worship are not uncommon. The settled Arabs are more rigid Mahometans, the Wahabees, especially, being a sect marked by great ceremonial strictness, and addicted to propagating the faith in the old style by means of the sword.

Climate.—The driest in the world, partaking of the character of that of the desert region of northern Africa, to which continent Arabia is more nearly allied in physical characteristics than to Asia, to which it geographically belongs. In the mountainous regions it is temperate, but in unsheltered situations intolerable heat prevails, aggravated by the pestiferous wind called the simoom or samiel, which frequently surprises the traveller in the desert, and almost suffocates him, while he is overwhelmed by moving clouds of sand.

Products.—Dates and dourra, a kind of millet, wheat, barley, tobacco, indigo, the finest of coffee, sugar, tamarinds, spices, acacia balm, various gums, raisins, drugs, and fruits. In the agricultural arts the inhabitants are extremely backward.

Minerals.—A little silver, iron, lead, basalt, blue alabaster, agate, and the onyx.

Zoology.—The panther, jackal, wolf, and hyæna abound in the deserts, and follow the Bedouins, or track the path of the caravans. Amongst the mountains the rock-goat, the fox, and the musk-deer are found, whilst in the more fertile parts the antelope and gazelle may be seen browsing in the quiet solitudes far away from the haunts of men. The hilly regions are frequented by wild asses, and monkeys are plentiful in the woods of Aden and Yemen. The jerboa, or kangaroo-rat, the flesh of which is eaten, and somewhat resembles that of the rabbit in flavour, burrows in the sand. The Arabian cows and oxen have a hunch over their shoulders.

The most valuable animals of the country, however, are the camel and the horse. The horses have been celebrated in all ages, and the purity of their breed is preserved with the greatest care. As a means of conveyance across the desert, the Arabians, however, chiefly depend on the camel, an animal peculiarly adapted for the inhabitants of a sandy country, being capable of undergoing great fatigue, and supporting itself without water, or even food, for several days together. Of birds, the eagle, the vulture, and several species of the hawk tribe, are common. The ostrich inhabits the desert, and the pelican the coast of the Red Sea. Pheasants and game, fowls, and various kinds of pigeons, are common in Yemen. Peacocks and parrots are found in the southern provinces. Locusts abound in Arabia, and are eaten by the inhabitants. Fish is plentiful along the coasts, especially the east, where not only the soil is manured by them, but domestic animals are fed upon them. Insects abound, including small scorpions, centipedes, a poisonous spider, and the destructive white ant.

Manufactures.—On the west coast, coarse woollen and linen fabrics are woven; matchlocks, lance-heads, and other arms, with tin and copper vessels, are made. Silk and cotton turbans, with silks, canvas, earthen jars, arms, and gunpowder, are made in Oman; but most of the better kinds of manufactured goods are procured from other countries in exchange for Arabian produce.

Exports.—Coffee, gums, drugs, horses, camels, dates, and pearls. Mocha and Loheia are the centres of the coffee trade, and Muskat has recently become the entrepôt for the trade with India and the Persian Gulf.

Lat. between 12° 45′ and 30° N. Lon. between 32° 30′ and 60° E.

History.—Until the time of Mahomet, our knowledge of the interior of Arabia is very imperfect; before his time, however, the Arabs, like those of the present day, partly dwelt in cities, and partly wandered over the desert, pitching their tents where either inclination induced, or necessity compelled them. There were four established monarchies, Yemen, Hira, Ghassan, and Kindel. These were overthrown by Mahomet, who, in the beginning of the 7th century united the people, and, under the influence of the faith of Islam, inspired them with such courage and fervour, that within a century, their dominion, language, and faith extended from the Indus to the Atlantic, skirting the deserts of Africa, penetrating Spain and the south of France, embracing the whole of Asia Minor, and the countries surrounding the Caspian Sea. Mahomet died at Medina, in 632, in the 63rd year of his age; and for a century afterwards, during the reign of his successors, we read of nothing in connection with the Arabs but a series of conquests. In 749 the family of Abbas ascended the throne of the caliphs, and held it, although with gradually diminishing influence, until the taking of Bagdad in 1258, by Hulaku, when the dominion of the Abbasides ended. From that time, with the exception of the wars of petty chiefs, struggling to maintain their authority, or to deprive others of theirs, and the annual pilgrimages to Mecca, there is nothing of general interest to record. In 891 the sect of Karmatians arose and obtained possession of Arabia, but about 990 their power fell. (See MECCA, MEDINA, MAHOMET, and other articles connected with Arabia.)

ARABIAN GULF and ARABIAN SEA. (See RED SEA.)

ARACAN, ar-a-kan', formerly an independent kingdom of further India, but now a division of Lower Burmah. It is situate on the eastern seaboard of the Bay of Bengal, extending from the river Naat to Cape Negrais. Ext. 400 miles in length, but varying in breadth from 90 miles in the north to 15 miles in the south, where it is limited by the Yumadourg mountains, and the coast is studded with a number of formerly fertile islands. Area, 18,530 square miles. Desc. On the east it is divided from Pegu and Ava by a range of mountains, through which there are very few passes, and the country is, in some parts, covered with extensive forests. The principal rivers are the Naf, the Myu, the Koladyne, and the Lemyu. The ports are Akyab, Kyoukphoo, and Sandoway. Exp. Chiefly rice, honey, wax, ivory, drugs, sapphires, rubies, and gold. Imp. Tissues, silks, muslins, European commodities of all kinds, pearls, and diamonds. Pop. 461,000. Lat. between 16° 2′ and 21° 33′ N. Lon. between 92° 10′ and 94° 50′ E.—In 1824 the province was taken from the Burmese by the British.

ARACAN, formerly a city and capital of the above province, situate on a branch of the Kuladyne river, and encompassed by a series of low hills. It is fortified, and has a great number of pagodas. Once a place of very much greater importance than at present. Pop. about 10,000.

ARACATI, a town of Brazil, in the province of Ceara, about ten miles from the mouth of the river Taguaribe. A large export trade in hides and cotton is carried on. Lat. 4° 20′ S. Lon. 37° 58′ W. Pop. 26,000.

ARACENA, a Spanish town, province of Andalusia. The streets are straight and clean. The chief occupations of the inhabitants are agriculture and cattle rearing. Pop. 2,400.

ARACHNE, a-rak'-ne, a virgin of Lydia, who was turned into a spider for contending with Minerva at spinning.

ARAD, OLD, a'-rad, an Hungarian city, county of Arad, 60 miles from Szegedin. It is the see of a Greek bishop, has a citadel, and does a large trade in corn. Pop., including Jews, 35,556.

ARAD, NEW, a town of Hungary, opposite the above. Pop. 4,000.

ARAGO, FRANÇOIS JEAN DOMINIQUE, a-ra'-go, a distinguished French mathematician, astronomer, and man of science. He was the son of a licentiate of law at Perpignan, and at an early age exhibited great talent for mathematics, which he studied assiduously, and at the age of 17 became a pupil at the Polytechnic school, intending to enter the artillery service. A year later he was appointed secretary to the observatory at Paris, and became acquainted with the most eminent scientific men of that city. He was employed to measure an arc of the meridian for the purpose of settling the exact length of the metre, and while in Spain for that purpose experienced various adventures, being taken prisoner by a Spanish corsair. On his return to Paris he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. From 1812 to 1845 he lectured in Paris on astronomy and kindred subjects, and was pronounced by the French emperor, Louis Napoleon, to be not only "the grand high-priest of science, but able to initiate the vulgar into its mysteries." In conjunction with Gay-Lussac, he established the "Annales de Chimie et de Physique," a valuable serial still continued; and throughout his days, prosecuted scientific discovery with unwearied effort. Amongst his other discoveries may be here recorded that of a neutral point in the polarization of the atmosphere, and the suggestion of a positive proof of the theory of undulations, which has since been proved by Foucault. In 1830 he was elected perpetual secretary of the Academy.—Arago was a determined republican, and in 1848 he became a member of the provisional government, uniting the offices of minister of war and of marine. He refused to take the oath of allegiance after the coup d'état of 1852, and gave his reasons in a spirited letter to the government. Louis Napoleon was then the prince-president, and he, to his honour, caused his minister to write, that "a special exception would be made in favour of a philosopher whose labours had rendered France illustrious, and whose existence the government would be loath to sadden." He retained office, but his health was shattered, and after an ineffectual visit to the Pyrenees he returned to Paris, where he died. The Emperor decreed a public funeral. His discoveries in astronomy, magnetism, and optics were very valuable.

Born at Estegal, in the Eastern Pyrenees, 1786; died at Paris, 1853.

ARAGON, or ARRAGONIA, ăr'-a-gon, a province of Spain, bounded by the Pyrenees on the N., Navarre and Castile on the W., Valencia on the S., and Catalonia on the E. The country is surrounded by mountains, whilst its interior is traversed by numerous offsets, with their slopes covered with forests of the beech, oak, and pine. The north is occupied by a portion of the Pyrenees, more than 11,000 feet in elevation. The province is divided by the Ebro nearly into two equal parts, watered by the Guadalaviar, the Tagus, the Xucar, and the Aragon. The Imperial Canal, commenced by Charles V. in 1529, extends for 80 miles. The climate is variable, but healthy.

Products.—Fruit, grain, saffron, hemp, and flax. Rearing sheep is an important feature in the province.

Minerals.—Iron, lead, quicksilver, copper, coal, sulphur, jasper, marble, cobalt, and alum. Immense tracts of the country are covered with stones, and other parts are left in a neglected state, although worthy of cultivation.

Manufactures.—Imperfect; consisting principally of woollen cloths, drapery, leather, cordage, wine, spirits, oil, and soda; most of which form articles of exportation.

Area, 14,726 square miles.

Aragon is no longer officially recognized.

Lat. between 40° and 42° 51′ N. Lon. between 2° 10′ W. and 1° 45′ E.

Divisions.—Aragon is divided into three provinces, HUESCA, TERUEL, and SARAGOSSA, or ZARAGOZA. The chief town is Saragossa.

History.—Aragon was part of the Roman Tarraconensis, and was conquered by the Carthaginians, who were expelled by the Romans about . . B.C. 200
Became an independent monarchy . . A.D. 1035
United to the Kingdom of Castile, by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella . . . 1479

ARAGONA, a town in Sicily. There is an old castle, with a fine collection of paintings and antiquities. Almonds are grown in large quantities, and the famous mud volcano of Maccaluba is near the town. Pop. 11,500.

ARAGUAYA, ar-a-gwi', a river of Brazil, receiving several smaller rivers. It is about 1,000 miles long, and navigable the greater part of the course.

ARAHAL, a town in Spain, 7 miles from Seville. Charles V. gave it a charter of independence in 1555. Manf. Hats, soap, earthenware, oil, and wine. Pop. 9,300.

ARAL, air'-al, a salt lake or inland sea of Asia, in Independent Tartary, the largest, with the exception of the Caspian Sea, in Asia, Ext. 265 miles long, by 145 broad. On the E. it receives the rivers Sir, or Jaxartes, and the Amu-daria. Near its south end are two large islands, at one of which the Russians have a small fleet, and there are a vast number of smaller islands, from which the modern name is derived, ARAL DENGHIS, meaning "the sea of islands." Persian geographers name it the Sea of Khuwarizm. Lat. between 43° 42′ and 46° 44′ N. Lon. between 58° 18′ and 61° 46′ E.

ARAM, EUGENE, ar'-am, a self-educated Yorkshireman, who, by persevering industry, obtained a knowledge of the mathematics, and an extensive acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages, together with the Hebrew and Chaldee. In 1744 he taught Latin and writing at a school in London; and after passing many years in apparent innocence, in 1753 he was apprehended at Lynn, for the murder of Daniel Clark, a shoemaker of Knaresborough, perpetrated thirteen years before. He was brought to his trial in 1759, and made an admirable defence, but was found guilty; and the next morning confessed his crime, alleging that he was prompted to it through a suspicion of Clark's having a criminal intercourse with his wife. Executed at York, 1759. The history of this person has suggested one of Bulwer Lytton's novels, and a powerful ballad by Thomas Hood.

ARAN ISLANDS, SOUTH, three islands in Galway Bay, named Inishmore (or Aranmore), Inishmaan, and Inisheer. There are some very interesting remains of towers and other structures. There are altars, shrines, and holy wells much resorted to. Area, 11,287 acres.

ARANDA, DON PEDRO PABLO ABARCAY BOLEA, Count of, a-ran'-da, a distinguished Spanish statesman. He served in the army with great distinction, and in 1765 was appointed President of the Court of Castile. He abolished the order of the Jesuits, and greatly diminished the power of the Inquisition. In 1773, to avoid ruin, he got himself appointed ambassador to Paris, where he remained till 1787. In 1792 he became the prime minister of Charles IV., but, through the intrigues of a rival, was soon afterwards dismissed.

Born at Saragossa, 1718; died, 1799.

ARANDA DE DUERO, an old Spanish town, in the province of Old Castile, on the right bank of the Duero. It was formerly of much greater importance than at present, being frequently a residence of the kings of Castile, whose palace remains. The church of San Juan Baptista and the Dominican convent are architecturally interesting. The inhabitants are mostly employed in vine-rearing and agriculture. Pop. 4,200.

ARANJUEZ, a-ransh-oo'-eth, a Spanish town, situate on the Tagus, in the province of Toledo, 28 miles from Madrid, with which it is connected by railway. In 1552 Ferdinand and Isabella established a royal residence there, and Philip V. built a splendid palace in the French style. The oak, elm, and sycamore trees in the ground are of great beauty. A small, but very ornamental palace, to which the humble name of "Farmer's House" was given, was built by Charles IV. The town of Aranjuez was an inconsiderable village, and is indebted for its enlargement to Charles III. in the middle of the last century. It is a Court residence during the spring months. The place is famous for rearing horses and mules. Pop. about 4,000.

ARAPILES, a-ra'-pe-lais, a Spanish village, 4 miles from Salamanca. Pop. 400. This place is memorable from its being the scene of the battle of Salamanca, in which the French, under Marmont, were defeated by the British, under Wellington, July, 1812.

ARARAT, ăr-a-răt, a celebrated mountain of Armenia, held in great veneration, from a belief that Noah's ark rested on it. It is the culminating point of Western Asia, where the Russian, Persian, and Turkish empires meet (see ARMENIA). There are two peaks, Ak-Dagh, 17,112 feet high, and Allah Dahr, 13,085. The mountains are of volcanic origin, and in 1840 there were great eruptions of sulphurous vapours and a very destructive earthquake. There are many glaciers in the upper portion, and the climate of the district is very severe, Lat. 39° 42′ N. Lon. 44° 35′ E.

ARARAT, an important town in the colony of Victoria, Australia, 152 miles N.W. from Melbourne. It is the commercial centre of the great grain and wool-producing district in the north-west of the colony, and the chief town of the county of the same name. In the town are an episcopal church, a Roman Catholic Church, and chapels for Presbyterians and Wesleyans, three banks, a lunatic asylum, a hospital, and other public buildings. Immense quantities of the finest timber in the colony are in the locality, and the mining district in the vicinity gives employment to a large number of Chinese and other labourers. Pop. about 3,000.

ARAS, the ancient ARAXES, a'-ras, a river of Asia, which rises in Armenia, 20 miles S. of Erzeroum, and joins the Kur, in about Lat. 40° 5′ N.; lon. 48° 30′ E. It has a rapid course of about 500 miles.

ARATUS, a-ra'-tus, a Greek poet, whose poem entitled "Phenomena," still extant, shows him to have been also an astronomer.

Born in Cilicia, about 300 B.C.

ARATUS of Sicyon, son of Clinias, who, by his activity, established the Achæan league, and recovered Corinth from Antigonus of Macedon. He wrote commentaries on his own transactions.

Born 271; died 216 B.C.

ARAUCANIA, an independent state of South America, lying between lat. 57° and 39° 50′ S., and lon. 70° and 75° 20′, separated from Chili, on the north, by the river Biobio, and lying between the Andes and the Pacific Ocean. The length of the territory is about 180 miles, and the average breadth 150 miles. The area is probably about 25,000 square miles. Pop. uncertain, but estimated at 70,000. The people are warlike and intelligent and claim to be the only aborigines of South America who have never been subdued by Europeans.

ARAUJO D'AZEVEDO, ANTONIO, a-raush'-o, a Portuguese statesman, ambassador to the Hague in 1787. He travelled in England and Germany, and acquired a considerable knowledge of the manufactures, commerce, and political and social life of these countries. In 1806, when Napoleon I. declared that the house of Braganza had ceased to reign, he made his escape to Brazil, whither he took his mineralogical collection, and a printing apparatus which he had imported from London. This was the first printing-press that had been seen in Rio Janeiro, where he began to busy himself with scientific pursuits. Whilst thus engaged, however, he felt severely the disgrace under which he lay, on account of his political errors. Accordingly, he wrote to the prince regent, defending his conduct against some assertions of his calumniators. He received a gracious reply, and in 1815 was created Count de Barca. He finally became sole minister in Brazil.

Born at Ponte de Lima, 1754; died at Rio Janeiro, 1817.

ARAURE, a-rau-ré, a handsome town of Venezuela, South America, and the centre of a fertile region, famous for the production of cotton, coffee, &c. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 90° 17′ N. Lon. 69° 28′ W.

ARAVALLI HILLS, a range of mountains in India, running in a north-easterly direction between lat. 24° and 27° 10′ N., and lon. 72° and 75° E. (See INDIA.)

ARAXAS, a town in Brazil, in the province of Mina Geraes. It is well situated in the midst of good pasturage. The inhabitants manufacture cotton cloth. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 19° S. Lon. 48° 30′ N.

ARBACES, one of the generals of Sardanapalus, against whom he conspired, and founder of the Median empire, in 876 B.C.

ARBE, arb, an island in the Adriatic, off the coast of Croatia. Pop. 4,000. It has a town of the same name, which has 1,100 inhabitants. This island is the most northerly of the Dalmatians.

ARBIL, ar'-bil, the ancient Arbela, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 40 miles from Mosul. Here Darius was signally defeated by Alexander the Great, 331 B.C. Pop. 6,000.

ARBLAY, MADAME D'. (See BURNEY.)

ARBOGA, an old town in Sweden in the government of Westeras, near the canal which joins the Malar and Hielmar lakes. It was formerly a place of great trade, and the residence of several kings of the Vasa dynasty, and several important and religious assemblies were held there. The general trade is chiefly in woollens, iron, and woodon wares. Pop. 3,300.

ARBOIS, ar'-bwaw, a town of France, in the department of the Jura, 6 miles from Poligny. It stands at an elevation of 940 feet. Manf. Paper and earthenware. The town has long been famous for its wines. Pop. nearly 7,000.

ARBROATH, ar-bro-ath', or ABERBROTHOCK, a royal burgh, seaport, and manufacturing town of Scotland, and a member of the Forfar parliamentary burghs. It is in the county of Forfar, 60 miles N.E. of Edinburgh. An abbey was founded here in honour of Thomas à Becket, in 1178. A large portion of the remains of the fine abbey are still in existence. The harbour was greatly enlarged and improved in 1844, and a wet dock constructed in 1875. The chief exports are grain, potatoes, fish, pork, and paving-stones. Pop. 21,758. A station on the Caledonian Railway.

ARBUTHNOT, JOHN, ar-buth'-not, a celebrated writer and physician, educated at Aberdeen. Coming to London, he supported himself by teaching the mathematics, and wrote several works which brought him into prominence. Accidentally administering relief to Prince George of Denmark at Epsom, he became physician to his royal highness, and in 1709 was appointed physician in ordinary to Queen Anne. He engaged with Pope and Swift in a scheme to write a satire on the abuse of human learning, under the title of "Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus." He attained high professional distinction, and was chosen one of the censors of the Royal College of Physicians. Arbuthnot was the author of several works of considerable ability in connection with his profession of a medical practitioner. It is said that he was one of the greatest wits of his time, that his humour was generally without any mixture of ill-nature, being a most humane and amiable man.

Born at Arbuthnot, Kincardineshire, 1665; died in London, 1735.

ARCACHON, ar-ka-shon(g)', a new and fashionable watering-place in France, on the coast of the Bay of Biscay, department Gironde, 32 miles west of Bordeaux. The main part of the town, known as the Ville d'Eté, was originally a small fishing village; the upper part, or Ville d'Hiver, was begun in 1862, and contains many beautifully situated villas, and a casino, surrounded by large grounds. There are three Roman Catholic churches, and a Protestant church, consecrated in 1878. The numerous oyster beds, in the Bassin d'Arcachon, give employment to about 2,000 persons. Pop. 6,000.

ARCADIA, ar-kai'-de-a, the ancient name of a mountainous and finely-wooded province in the Morea, Greece, much sung by the poets.

ARCADIUS, first emperor of the East, son of the Emperor Theodosius, after whose death the Empire was divided into East and West. He permitted his unworthy favourites to exercise almost absolute power.

Born in Spain, 383; died, 408.

ARCANO, MAURO D', ur-ka'-no, a celebrated Italian burlesque poet. Flourished in the 16th century.

ARCESILAUS, a Greek philosopher, and founder of the New Academy. He denied the existence of any sufficient criterion of truth, but asserted that in practical matters probability was a sufficient guide.

Born in Æolia, 316 B.C.; died, 214 B.C.

ARCET, JEAN D', dar'-sat, a French natural philosopher, who was the first to prove, by experiment, the perfect combustibility of the diamond. He was also the inventor of a metallic alloy, of which stereotypes are sometimes made, and to which his name is frequently given. He gave great attention to the study of minerals, and succeeded in producing a porcelain equal to the best of China and Japan. He became inspector of the tapestry manufactory of Gobelins, and also of the public mint; and in the manufacture of the former, as well as in that of porcelain, suggested several improvements.

Born at Douazit, 1725; died at Paris, 1801.

ARCHANGEL, ark-ain'-jel, one of the fourteen general governments, or vice-royalties, into which Russia is divided. It is bounded on the N. by the Arctic Ocean and the White Sea, on the W. by the Ural Mountains, on the S. by the governments of Vologda and Olonetz. It includes the islands of Nova Zembla, Naigatz, and some others. Lying under an inclement sky, where the summer is short, and the winter of uncommon severity, the principal wealth of the country consists in its fisheries, which extend along the whole coast. In the south there are a number of large forests, many wild animals, valuable for their fur, and good breeds of domestic cattle. Its surface is mountainous, and nearly surrounds the White Sea, whilst it is watered by the rivers Dwina, Petshora, Mezen, Onega, Pinega, and Oriza. From October to May the rivers are frozen over in the north, but in the south there is excellent pasturage, although it abounds with marshes. Little corn is grown, but flax, hemp, and timber are plentiful. These, with pitch, turpentine, tallow, leather, and potash, constitute its principal exports. The government is divided into eight circles,—Archangel, Shenskursk, Mezen, Cola, Onega, Pinega, Kholmogory, and Kem. The principal towns are Archangel, Chenkoursk, Mezen, Onega, Kola, Pinega, and Kholmogory. Area, 331,505 square miles. Pop. 315,367. originally Finns, but now mostly Russians. Lat. between 61° and 71° N. Lon. between 29° and 68° E.

ARCHANGEL, or ST. MICHAEL, the capital of the above government, stands at the head of the delta of the Dwina, about 40 miles from the White Sea. It derives its name from a monastery, founded here in 1584, and dedicated to the archangel Michael. As a place of commerce it is much frequented, especially by the English, the Dutch, and merchants of Bremen and Hamburg. It was fortified in 1584, but a British trading establishment had existed for several years. It was for a long period the only seaport of the empire; but its trade was greatly injured by the erection of St. Petersburg into a commercial city. It is, however, still the chief deposit of foreign articles destined for Siberia, and does a large coasting trade. In summer is held the great market, in which train oil, tallow, tar, linseed, furs, wax, iron, and coarse linen, are exposed to sale, chiefly for the accommodation of foreigners. The manufactures are linen, leather, canvas, cordage, mats, sugar and beer. The town is the seat of an archbishop; there are ten Greek and one Protestant church, academies for navigation and engineering, and a Government dockyard and shipbuilding yards. The harbour, on the island of Solomboly, about a mile from the town, is open only from July to September, on account of the severity of the climate. Pop. about 20,000. Lat. 64° 32′ N. Lon. 40° 33′ E.

ARCHELAUS, ar-ke-la'-us, a Greek philosopher, a pupil of Anaxagoras, whose doctrines as to the nature of air he taught in an amplified form. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ARCHELAUS, King of Macedonia, who, 413 B.C., gained the throne by means of a series of murders, and was himself murdered after reigning fourteen years. He was, however, a wise and liberal ruler.

ARCHELAUS, son of Herod the Great, whom he succeeded as king of Judea. His cruelty to the Jews caused his deposition, and he was banished by the Emperor Augustus in the year 7.

ARCHENA, a town of Spain, in the province of Murcia. Here are some ancient mineral baths. Pop. 2,000.

ARCHENHOLZ, JOHANN WILHELM, Baron von, German historian. He served in the army, and then devoted his attention to literature, and wrote a history of the Seven Years' War, "Annals of British History," and several biographies.

Born 1745; died 1812.

ARCHIDONA, a town in Spain, province of Andalusia, on the slope of a mountain, 34 miles N. from Malaga. Pop. 7,610.

ARCHILOCHUS, ar-kil'-o-kus, a Greek satirist, noted for his bitterness, whose poems the Lacedæmonians prohibited. He was the inventor of iambic verses. Most of his writings are lost.

Born in the isle of Paros, about 760 B.C.

ARCHIMEDES, ar'-ki-me'-des, the greatest of the Greek mathematicians, said to have been related to Hiero, king of Syracuse. He boasted, that if he had a place to fix his machines, he would move the earth, which will not be deemed extravagant by those who can calculate the powers of levers, &c. The story of the manner in which he discovered the fraud of the jeweller who made the crown of Hiero is too well known to require repetition here. He is said, amongst other ingenious mechanical contrivances, to have made a glass machine, which represented the motions of the heavenly bodies. The endless, or water-screw, still bears his name. He is also said to have made burning glasses, which destroyed ships at a great distance. When Marcellus besieged Syracuse, Archimedes contrived a variety of machines for annoying the enemy; and when the place was taken, the Roman commander gave strict orders that the house and person of the philosopher should be respected. He was, however, slain by a soldier, while he was deeply engaged in solving a geometrical problem, and inattentive to the noise occasioned by the taking of the city. Several of his works are extant, but some of the most valuable are lost. When Cicero was quæstor in Sicily, he discovered Archimedes' tomb, with an inscription upon it.

Born at Syracuse, about 287 B.C.; died 212 B.C.

ARCHIPELAGO, ar'-ke-pel'-a-go, a term applied to any portion of the sea abounding in small islands, but more especially to the Ægean Sea, or that part of the Mediterranean between the coasts of Asia Minor and Greece.

ARCHYTAS, ar-ky'-tas, Greek philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman. He was contemporary with Plato, whose life he saved when the tyrant Dionysius had condemned him to death. He was seven times appointed general of the army, although generally no citizen could hold the office more than once, and was never defeated in battle. He was a Pythagorean in philosophy, and it is supposed that both Plato and Aristotle were indebted to him. He was a skilled mathematician, mechanic, and musician, and the foremost statesman of the time.

Born at Tarentum 408 B.C.

ARCIS-SUR-AUBE, ar'-se-soor-obé', a town of France, in the department of Aube, 17 miles from Troyes. Here are an old castle where Diana of Poitiers resided, and a fine church, dating from the 16th century. Manf. Yarn and cotton stockings; a considerable trade is done in grain and coal and the wooden wares of the Vosges. Pop. about 2,800.—Near this place, in 1814, there was a battle between Napoleon I. and the Austro-Russian army under Prince Schwartzenberg.

ARCOLE, ar'-ko-lai, (Eng. ARCOLA), a village of Italy, about 15 miles from Verona. Pop. 1,000.—This village and its bridges are famous for the defeat of the Austrians by Napoleon I., in a series of sanguinary actions, in 1796.

ARCON, JEAN CLAUDE D', ar'-kong, a French military engineer and author, who planned the floating batteries with which Gibraltar was attacked, when commanded by General Elliot, on the 12th September, 1782. He afterwards served in the French army at the time of the Revolution, and took part in the conquest of Holland.

Born at Pontarlier, 1733; died near Auteuil, 1800.

ARCOS DE LA FRONTERA, ar'-kos dai la fron-tair'-a, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, on the river Guadalete, built on a rock, 30 miles from Cadiz. Manf. Thread, ropes, and tanned leather, which latter was here first established in Andalusia. Pop. 15,000.—Both in Spain and Portugal there are several places of the name of Arcos.

ARCOT (NORTH and SOUTH), ar-kot', two maritime districts in the presidency of Madras, British India. Area of both, 9,925 square miles. Desc. Full of jungles, and hilly in the interior, but low along the coast. Rivers. The Palar and the Coleroon; but these and other streams are nearly destitute of water in the dry seasons, and tanks of enormous dimensions are constructed. Pro. Chiefly rice, and the usual cerealia. Manf. In North Arcot cotton cloth is largely manufactured, but in South Arcot the manufacture has been almost entirely superseded by European goods. Towns. ARCOT, VELLORE, and CUDDALORE. Pop. 3,800,000.—In 1801 the whole of this district was by a formal treaty ceded to the East-India Company by Azim-ul-Omrah, the nabob of the Carnatic.

ARCOT, the Mahometan capital and chief town of the above province, stands on the Palar, 65 miles from Madras. It is a place of great antiquity, and contains the palace of the former nabobs of the Carnatic, with some fine mosques and tombs. It was at Arcot that Clive laid the foundation of his brilliant reputation by capturing the fort with only 500 men, in 1751. Pop. of the town and its district, about 53,500. Lat. 12° 54′ N. Lon. 79° 24′ E.

ARCTIC OCEAN, ark'-tik, that portion of the ocean extending from lat. 66° 30′ N. to the north pole, having communication with the Pacific Ocean through Behring's Straits on the N.E. of Asia, and with the Atlantic on the N.W. of Europe. (See POLAR REGIONS.)

ARCTIC HIGHLANDS, ar'-lands, a region of N. America, lying between the mouth of the Mackenzie river and Hudson's Bay.

ARDEBIL, or ARDABEL, town of Persia, on the Karasee, a tributary of the Aras, in a fertile plain, about 40 miles from the Caspian Sea. The town is fortified and contains the tomb of Shah Ismael Sufi, founder of the Sufi dynasty of Persia, and is a considerable trading centre. There are several hot mineral springs in the vicinity. The climate of the district is so salubrious that the Persians call it "the abode of happiness." Lat. 38° 15′ N. Lon. 28° 19′ N.

ARDECHE, ar'-daish, a department in the S. of France, bounded E. by the departments of Isère and the Drôme, from the latter of which it is separated by the Rhône; S. by the department of the Gard; W. by the departments of the Lozère and Upper Loire; N.W. by the department of the Loire; and N.E. by that of the Isère. Area, 2,134 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; the Cévennes mountains cover a large portion of this department, the highest peak, Mount Mezenc, an extinct volcano, attaining an elevation of 3,972 feet above the sea level; with many mulberry plantations, and with a soil somewhat sandy, but rich in the production of minerals. Rivers. The Rhône, Loire, Ay, Cance, Doux, Erieux, and Ardèche, from which the department takes its name. Pro. Wine in abundance, chestnuts, and olives. Silkworms are a source of considerable wealth, and cattle are reared in large numbers. Minerals. Lead, iron, copper, manganese, coal, antimony, alum, marble of different colours, gypsum, and porcelain clay; granite, quartz, and pumice-stone abound. Towns. The principal are PRIVAS, LARGENTIÈRE, and TOURNON, which are the capitals of their several arrondissements, and AUBENAS BOURG, and ST. ANDEOL. Manf. Paper, leather, woollens, silks, and cottons. Pop. about 380,000.

ARDECHE, or ARDECE, a river of France, which rises in the Cévennes, and, after a course of about 45 miles, falls into the Rhône above Pont St. Esprit.

ARDEE, ar-dé', a town in Louth County, Ireland, on the Dee. There are two old castles; a trade in agricultural produce is carried on. Pop. 2,572.

ARDELAN, ar'-de-lan, a province of Persia, forming the eastern division of Kurdistan, and inhabited by various tribes, who are represented as brave and hospitable, but addicted to war and rapine, and scarcely considering murder as a crime. The capital town is SENNA.

ARDENNES, ar-den', a department of France, having on the N. Luxembourg, and on the W. the departments of Aisne, on the S. Marne, and on the E. Meuse. Ext. 63 miles, running N. and S., with a breadth of 60, E. to W. Area, 2,021 square miles. Desc. In the north it is full of mountains and woods, in the south-east the soil is chalky, in the south-west it consists of a rich loam, and in the east it is stony. Rivers. The Meuse, and its affluents the Vence, the Bar, and the Sermone; the Aisne, and its affluents the Vaux, the Aire, and the Retourne. Pro. Corn in abundance. Born at Berne, 1505; died 1574.

ARETUSI, CESARE, an Italian painter, who attained a great reputation for his portraits, and for his able copies of the works of Correggio, which have often deceived connoisseurs.
Born at Modena, 1580; died at Parma, 1612.

AREZZO, a-ret-so, an Italian town at the influx of the Chiano into the Arno, capital of the province of the same name. It is the see of a bishop, has two collegiate churches, parish churches, religious houses, and hospitals, besides a town-hall, custom-house, museum, and library. Manf. Anciently this place was celebrated for its terra-cotta vases; now its chief manufactures consist of furs and woollen stuffs. Pop. about 11,000.—In the immediate neighbourhood Michael Angelo was born; and the town was the birthplace of Redi the physiologist, Guido the inventor of musical notation, Petrarch the poet, Vasari the painter, Leonardo Bruno, the historian, and Pope Julius III.

ARGANA, or ARGHANA MADEN, ar-ga'-na, a town in Turkish Armenia, on the left bank of the Tigris, near its source. It is situated on a very steep declivity of a hill, and wretchedly built. There is a rich copper mine in the neighbourhood, and there are vineyards on the surrounding hills. Pop. 4,000.

ARGAND, AIMÉ, ar'-gănd, a native of Switzerland, who invented the kind of lamp which bears his name.
Born at Geneva, 1782; died 1803.

ARGANDA DEL REY, a town in Spain, in the province of New Castile, 18 miles S.E. of Madrid. Excellent red wines are made in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,800.

ARGAUM, ar-gaum, or Argam, a town of Central India, 40 miles from Ellichpoor, where Major-General Wellesley (afterwards the Duke of Wellington), in 1803, gained a decisive victory over the Mahratta forces.

ARGELANDER, ar-je-lan'-der, FRIEDRICH WILHELM AUGUST, an eminent modern astro-nomer, who superintended, for five years, the observatory at Abo, Finland. On its being destroyed by fire in 1828, he undertook the erection of another at Helsingfors. In 1837 he was appointed professor of astronomy at Bonn University. He wrote on his peculiar science with great success.

Born at Memel, 1799; died at Bonn, 1875.

ANGENSOLA, LUPERCIO LEONARDO, Spanish poet, secretary to the ex-empress Maria of Austria, and historiographer-royal. He wrote tragedies and lyric poems.

Born 1565; died at Naples, 1613.

ANGENSOLA, BARTOLOMEO LEONARDO, brother of the above, whom he succeeded as historiographer. He entered the church, and was for some time chaplain to the empress. He wrote a history of the conquest of the Molucca Islands, and other historical works, besides poems.

Born 1566; died 1631.

ARGENSON, MARK RENÉ LE VOYER, marquis d', darzh'-en-song, an Italian, who, in the reign of Louis XIV., was appointed lieutenant-general of the police in Paris, and was the first to introduce lettres-de-cachet in the police. In 1719 he was made chancellor, in the room of d'Aguesseau, but the year following he was deprived of all his places.

Born at Venice, 1652; died at Paris, 1721.

ARGENTAH, a town in France, department of Corrèze, in a beautiful valley on the right bank of the Dordogne, crossed here by a suspension bridge. There is a Gothic cathedral. A trade in corn, timber, charcoal, and an inferior kind of coal is carried on. Pop. 2,800.

ARGENTAN, arzh'-en-tă, a well-built town in the department of Orne, France, 31 miles from Alençon. Manf. Lace, linen cloth, light stuffs, gloves and leather. Pop. 5,700.

ARGENTEUIL, arzh'-en-tu(r)-e, a town of France, in the department of Seine-et-Oise, surrounded by walls and ditches, on the Seine, six miles from Paris. Here was formerly a Benedictine nunnery, of which the celebrated Heloise was prioress after her misfortunes with Abelard. (See ABELARD.) Portions of the parish church are of great antiquity. Vinegar and wine are manufactured, and there are large gypsum quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 8,200.

ARGENTIERA, or KHIMOLE, an island in the Grecian archipelago, separated from Milo by a channel, a mile wide. It is about 18 miles in circumference, and has volcanic hills 1,000 feet high, and there are hot springs. There is a good harbour for small vessels, but very little trade is carried on. Lat. 36° 49′ N. Lon. 24° 35′ E.

ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION.—A republic of South America, consisting of the greater portion of the former Spanish viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres. It is bounded on the N. by the republic of Bolivia, on the E. by the Atlantic Ocean, the republic of Uruguay, the empire of Brazil, and the republic of Paraguay; on the W. by the Andes, dividing it from Chili; and on the S. by Patagonia; but the exact lines of boundary are, owing to political complications, undetermined. More than three-fourths of the country consists of extensive plains, known as the Pampas in the central part, the Chaco in the north-east, and the plains of Patagonia in the south. The Andes and their numerous offshoots make the north-western part of the country a mountainous region. In some parts the plains have a rich soil, but there are extensive saline wastes, and salt lakes of great size. Mr. Darwin, who paid great attention to the physical configuration of this part of America, is of opinion that at some remote time the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans were connected through what is now the basin of the Santa Cruz river, and that there has been a great upheaval in some parts to the extent of 1,400 feet. There is considerable variety of climate, which in the northern parts of the immense territory is tropical, while Argentine Patagonia has the temperature of northern Europe. The two principal rivers are the PARANA and the URUGUAY, which flows into the great estuary RIO DE LA PLATA. The Parana originates in the tableland of Brazil, and for a portion of its course forms the boundary between the Argentine Republic and Paraguay. Its length is about 260 miles, to the island of Apipé, below which it joins the Paraguay. The united rivers enter the Rio de la Plata by many branches, forming a long narrow delta. The Parana has a course of nearly 900 miles within the boundary of the republic, of which 750 miles are navigable. The Uruguay also flows into the Rio de la Plata. The Pilcomayo and the Vermejo are large affluents of the Paraguay. The Salado, a river with a course of more than 800 miles, joins the Parana at Santa Fé. The Rio Negro, Colorado, and Desaguerodo rivers are other rivers watering the Pampas, and flowing into the Atlantic. Within the last few years emigration to the Argentine Confederation has been much encouraged, the number of immigrants averaging about 7,000 yearly. A very great number are Italians, of whom it is computed there are more than 85,000 in the province of Buenos Ayres alone. There are about 2,000 miles of railways, and 4,200 miles of telegraph wires in operation.

Zoology.—The native animals comprise the jaguar, puma, the armadillo, and the small quadrupeds which supply the chinchilla skins. Millions of oxen roam at large across the plains, or are reared on breeding estates of vast extent. Horses and mules are also plentiful, with herds of sheep and swine. These last, however, are of inferior quality.

Products.—Cotton, rice, sugar-cane, indigo, and tobacco; and maize, wheat, and other cerealia, are the principal objects of culture in the south. The other products are cocoa, cochineal, madder, cinchona bark, Paraguay tea, and various fruits. Agriculture generally, however, is in an extremely backward state.

Minerals.—Salt, coal, alum, sulphur, and mineral pitch.

Manufactures.—These are mostly imported, but the Indians make ropes, fishing-nets, yarn, and other articles from the fibre of the aloe; also saddle-cloths, blankets, and other fabrics, which they die with great skill. In Cordova, morocco leather and turned articles are manufactured.

Exports.—Hides, horse-hair, wool, horns, tallow, beef, chinchilla, and other furs.

Provinces, Area, and Population.—The Confederation consists of 14 provinces, the estimated area of which, and population, as given in the last official census, appears in the following tables. (Descriptions of each province appear under the proper headings.)

Provinces.	Area Engl. sq. miles.	Population.
Buenos Ayres	63,000	612,000
Santa Fé	18,000	187,000
Entre Rios	45,000	188,000
Corrientes	54,000	204,000
Rioja	31,500	87,000
Catamarca	31,500	102,000
San Juan	29,700	91,000
Mendoza	54,000	99,000
Cordova	54,000	320,000
San Luis	18,000	76,000
Santiago del Estero	31,500	158,000
Tucuman	13,500	178,000
Salta	45,000	167,000
Jujuy	27,000	66,000
Total	515,700	2,830,000

The Indian territories, including the Pampas and Patagonia, the latter of which is only nominally connected with the Confederation, are estimated to have an area of about 880,000 square miles, and a population of 1,800,000, but the estimate is founded on imperfect information, and is open to correction.

Chief Towns.—BUENOS AYRES (the capital of the Republic), ROSARIO, SAN JUAN, CORDOVA, TUCUMAN, SANTIAGO, and MENDOZA.

Political Constitution.—The Confederation consists of a group of states formerly known as the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata. The present constitution bears date May 15, 1853. The executive power is left to a president, elected for six years by representatives of the fourteen provinces, 133 in number; while the legislative authority is vested in a National Congress, consisting of a Senate and a House of Deputies, the former numbering 28, two from each province, and the latter 50 members. A vice-president, elected in the same manner, and at the same time as the president, fills the office of chairman of the Senate, but has otherwise no political power. The president is commander-in-chief of the troops, and appoints to all civil, military, and judicial offices; but he and his ministers are responsible for their acts, and liable to impeachment before the Senate, by accusation of the House of Representatives.

ARGENTON, arzh'-en-tong, a town of France, department of the Indre, on the Creuse, 18 miles from Châteauroux. There are the remains of an old castle, flanked by ten towers. Manf. Chiefly woollens, cloth, paper, pottery, and glass. There are also fulling-mills and bleaching-grounds. Pop. 5,200.

ARGO, or GORA, ar'-go, an island in the Nile. Ext. 25 miles long, and about five broad, with a rich soil, but only partially cultivated. There are ruins and colossal sculptures on the island. Lat. between 19° 10′ and 19° 30′ N.

ARGO, the name of the ship which carried Jason and his companions, the Argonauts, to Colchis, when they resolved to recover the golden fleece. (See JASON.)

ARGOS, ar'-gos, the name of a small but famous kingdom of the Peloponnesus. Argos, the chief town, stands on the river Nacho, the ancient Inachus. It was considered the most ancient city of Greece. It is now a pleasant town. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 37° 38′ N. Lon. 22° 43′ E.

ARGOSTOLI, ar-gos'-to-le, the chief town of the island of Cephalonia, with a good harbour and quay, eight miles from Cephalonia. The houses are small and meanly built. Shipbuilding and silk-spinning are carried on; and there are manufactures of cotton and pottery. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 38° 10′ N. Lon. 19° 59′ E.

ARGUS, ar'-gus, the son of Arestor, and said to have had a hundred eyes; but being killed by Mercury, when appointed by Juno to guard Io, his eyes were transferred to the tail of a peacock.

ARGYLE, or ARGYLL, ar-gile', a maritime county on the west coast of Scotland, consisting partly of the mainland, partly of islands, and having on its N. Inverness-shire, E. Perth and Dumbarton shires, S. the Irish Sea and the river Clyde, and W. the Atlantic Ocean. The area of the county is 3,255 square miles. Its shores consist of several long promontories and deep bays and inlets, in which the herring fishery is prosecuted with success. A large portion of the shire consists of heath, rocks, and mountains, the loftiest peaks being Ben Cruachan, 3,689 feet; Ben More (in Mull), 3,172; Ben Ima, 3,318; Buchael Etive, 3,345; and Ben Arthur, 2,891. About 25,000 acres of the county are occupied by fresh water lakes, of which Loch Awe is the largest. There are no navigable rivers, but numerous mountain streams, the largest of which are the Orchy and the Aire. The principal islands are Mull, Islay, Jara, Colonsay, Lismore, Tiree, Coll, Gigha, Muck, Rum, and Canna, besides these are the famous basaltic island of STAFFA, and the "sacred isle of IONA." The most important towns are INVERARY, (the capital), Campbeltown, Dunoon, Tobermory, and Oban. Pro. Mostly cattle, which are exported in great numbers to the markets in the south. The great bulk of the inhabitants are occupied in the fisheries, and in agricultural and pastoral pursuits. There are no important manufactures. Pop. 76,440.

ARGYLE, CAMPBELLS, lords of. This family traces its descent from an individual of their name, who, in the 12th century, intermarried with the daughter of a Highland chief, and had for her dowry the lordship of Loch Awe, in Argyleshire. From that time the family has, more or less, taken a distinguished part in public affairs, and several of their members have risen to historical celebrity. The most remarkable of these are the following:—

ARGYLE, ARCHIBALD, eighth earl and first marquis of, who was amongst the most zealous and the bravest of the partisans of the cause of the Covenanters. He took arms against King Charles I., and in 1644 commanded the army sent against Montrose, whom he proclaimed a traitor, and for whose head he offered a reward of £20,000. He subsequently took the leading part in the Scottish installation of Charles II., on whose head, on 1st January, 1651, he placed the crown at Scone, previous to the battle of Worcester. He afterwards submitted to Cromwell, and sat in the parliament of his son Richard as member for Aberdeenshire. For these acts he was, at the Restoration, indicted for high treason, convicted, and beheaded in Edinburgh.

Born 1598; died 1661.

ARGYLE, ARCHIBALD, earl of, son of the above, was a resolute and brave adherent to the royal cause, and so well known for the stanchness of his loyalty that he was excepted by Cromwell from the general pardon which he granted in 1654. In 1682 he was indicted for treason, and condemned to suffer death, on account of his opposition to the measures of the Duke of York; but he made his escape from prison in the train of his step-daughter, Lady Sophia Lindsay, as whose page he was disguised, and fled to Holland. Returning, however, in the April of 1695, he made a descent into Argyleshire at the head of a considerable force, but was made prisoner. On the 30th of June of the same year, on a single day's notice, he was executed at Edinburgh on his former sentence.

Died 1685.

ARGYLE, JOHN, second duke of (also Duke of Greenwich), was the grandson of the above. His father was created a duke by William III. The subject of our notice distinguished himself equally as a statesman and a soldier. In 1705 he was created an English peer by the titles of Baron Chatham and Earl of Greenwich, for his efforts in furthering the union of Scotland and England. As a brigadier-general he fought at the famous battle of Ramillies, and greatly distinguished himself at Oudenarde and Malplaquet, as well as at the sieges of Ostend, Meenen, Lisle, Ghent, and Tournay. On the accession of the Hanoverian family to the throne, he was appointed commander-in-chief of all the king's forces in Scotland, and in 1715 displayed great energy and decision in suppressing the rebellion in Scotland, popularly known in the north as "Mar's rising." He held several offices, of which he was deprived by Sir Robert Walpole, but to which he was again restored on the fall of that minister. Sir Walter Scott introduced him as a prominent character into "The Heart of Midlothian." With his death his English titles became extinct. There is a monument, by Roubilliac, to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Born 1678; died 1743.

ARGYLE, GEORGE JOHN DOUGLAS CAMPBELL, eighth duke of, early in life took an active part in the controversies raging between religious parties in Scotland, and in a pamphlet recommended the abolition of lay patronage in the church. Although going a great way with the views of Dr. Chalmers in reference to "the spiritual independence of the Church," he could not go so far as to leave the establishment and become an absolute adherent to the Free Church movement. At this period he held the title of Marquis of Lorne, but in 1847 he succeeded to the dukedom, on the demise of his father. In 1852 he held the office of Lord Privy Seal under the government of the Earl of Aberdeen, and under the premiership of Lord Palmerston he continued to hold it till November, 1855, when he exchanged it for the office of Postmaster-general. On the fall of the government of Lord Palmerston, he resigned his office. He held the office of Secretary of State for India in the Gladstone Ministry, from 1868 to 1874. However ardently he pursues certain political questions, he never forgets to bestow much of his time upon literary and scientific pursuits. He is the author of "The Reign of Law," and of other works of a theological and philosophical nature.

Born 1823.

ARGYLE, a county of New South Wales Australia, between lat. 34° 25′, and 35° 15′ S., and lon. 149° 20′, and 150° 5′ E. The chief town is GOULBURN.

ARGYRO-CASTRO, a town of Albania in the province of the Avlona. It was once a place of great importance, but in 1814, it was almost depopulated by a plague. It is famous for the manufacture of a fine kind of snuff. Pop. 6,000.

ARGYROPULUS, ar-gy-roy'-u-lus, a learned Greek, who became rector of the University of Padua, and afterwards professor of Greek in the University of Florence, and subsequently at Rome. He translated portions of the works of Aristotle.

Lived in the 15th century.

ARIADNE, ă'-ri-ăd'-ne, daughter of Minos, who, out of love to Theseus, gave him a clue of thread which guided him out of the Cretan labyrinth, and he married her; but he afterwards deserted her, when she became a priestess of Bacchus.

ARIANO, ar-e-a'-no, a town of Italy, in the province of Avellano, 38 miles N.E. of Naples. It is situate on a steep hill, 2,500 feet above the sea level. It is the see of a bishop, and does an export trade in wine and butter. Pop. 14,000.

ARICA, a-ré'-ka, the chief seaport town of Southern Peru, on the coast of the Pacific, with a convenient port, but with a most unhealthy climate, and subject to frequent earthquakes. Lat. 18° 26′ S. Lon. 70° 10′ W. Pop. 4,000.

ARICHAT, ăr-i-kat a seaport on the south side of Cape Breton Island. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the fisheries. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 45° 28′ N. Lon. 61° 3′ W.

ARIEGE, a'-re-aish', a river of France, rising in the Pyrenees and falling into the Garonne.

ARIEGE, a department of S. France. Ext. 66 miles, running east and west, with an average breadth of 48 miles, from north to south. Area, 1,900 square miles. It includes the old countship of Foix, and parts of Languedoc and Gascony. Wooded and mountainous, the southern part being occupied by the Pyrenees, with a mild climate generally, and with iron-mines, marble-quarries, and mineral waters. Its chief commerce is in grain, cheese, iron, and wood. Its manufactures consist of woollen, cotton, paper, and steel wares. Towns, Foix, Pamiers, and St. Girons. Pop. 240,000.

ARION, a-ri'-on, an ancient musician, native of Methymna, in Lesbos, who invented the dithyrambic measure, and became rich by his professional skill. There is a poetical legend that, on his passage to Italy, he saved his life from the cruelty of the sailors, who insisted that he should either die by his own hand on shipboard, or cast himself into the sea, by choosing the latter alternative. He first sang a dirge, accompanied by his lyre, and so enchanted a dolphin, that when he leapt into the sea, it bore him safely to land. Lived in the 7th century, B.C.

ARIOSTI ATTILIO, a'-re-os'-te, an Italian composer, who wrote several operas, the most popular of which was "Coriolano," which is supposed to have been parodied by Gay in the "Beggar's Opera." He was one of the three composers whose services were engaged for the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in London. The others were Bononcini and Handel; but the reputation of Arioti seems to have been based upon a slight foundation, as in a few years he fell into neglect. He gave lessons to Handel, and in conjunction with Bononcini and his pupil, the well-known opera of "Muzio Scevola" was composed.

Born 1660; died 1740.

ARIOSTO, LUDOVICO, a-re-os'-to, an Italian poet, patronised by Cardinal d'Este, by whose interest he obtained several small and ill-paid employments. He entered into the service of Alfonso, duke of Ferrera, who employed him diplomatically as ambassador to Pope Julius II., who at one time was very near ordering him to be killed. His most famous piece is entitled "Orlando Furioso," in some respects a sequel to the famous "Orlando Annamorato" of an earlier poet, Boiardo. He also wrote some comedies, which were performed in the hall of Ferrara, before the duke and his court. He died of consumption.—Ariosto is considered among the best of Italian satirists, and he was one of the first writers of regular comedy in Italy. His "Orlando Furioso" has been translated into most continental languages, and the best in English is that by Mr. S. Rose.

Born at Reggio, 1474; died 1533.

ARISH, or EL ARISH, el air'-ish, a small town in Syria, where, in 1799, Sir Sydney Smith concluded a convention with the French, by which he permitted them to return to France with their arms and baggage, which was afterwards disapproved by the British Government. Lat. 31° 5′ N. Lon. 33° 48′ E.

ARISPE, ă-ris'-pe, a mining town of Mexico, in the intendancy of Sonora, of which it is the capital, in the Sierra Madre, on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains. Pop. 7,000.

ARISTÆUS, ă-ris-tē'-us, in mythology, Apollo's son, who taught mankind to extract oil from the olive, to make butter, honey, &c.

ARISTANDER, the soothsayer of Alexander the Great, after whose death, when his body had lain unburied for thirty days, he procured its burial by announcing that the country in which it was interred would be the most prosperous in the world.

ARISTARCHUS, ăr-is-tar'-kus, a Greek astronomer, of Samos, reputed to have been the first who asserted the rotation of the earth upon its axis, and its motion round the sun. He is also said to have invented sun-dials.

Lived in the 3rd century, B.C.

ARISTARCHUS, a famous Greek grammarian and critic. He criticised Homer with such severity, that all severe critics since his time have been denominated "Aristarchi." He also criticised Pindar and other poets. Being persecuted at Alexandria, he withdrew to Cyprus, where it is said he voluntarily starved himself to death.

Lived in the 2nd century, B.C.

ARISTIDES, ăr-is-tī'-des, a celebrated Athenian, who rose to the first offices in the state, and discharged them with such integrity as to obtain the surname of the Just. At Marathon he distinguished himself by his bravery, and though he had charge of the spoils, took nothing for himself. The party of Themistocles at length prevailed against him, and he was banished by the ostracism, but was recalled, and afterwards distinguished himself as general of the Athenian forces. He died in poverty.—The Athenians bestowed a magnificent funeral on him, and gave his son Lysimachus an estate and pension, besides giving his daughters portions from the state.

Lived in the 5th century, B.C.

ARISTIDES, ÆLIUS, a Greek historian and philosopher, who travelled in various countries, and obtained such a reputation for eloquence that monuments were erected to him in several of the towns through which he passed. He wrote a remarkable book, "Sacred Discourses," in which he seems to have anticipated mesmerism and other occult phenomena.

Born 117; died 189.

ARISTIPPUS, ăr-is-tip'-us, of Cyrene, the disciple of Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic sect. His maxim was, that pleasure is the chief good of man; but that, to experience true happiness man must be superior, not a slave, to pleasure. He flourished about 400 B.C.

ARISTO, or ARISTON, a Stoic philosopher, pupil of Zenon. He was renowned for eloquence, and maintained, somewhat in opposition to his master, that external condition, fortune, health, &c., are matters of indifference, and that virtue consists in a healthy and intelligent condition of mind. Lived in the 3rd century, B.C.

ARISTOBULUS, ăr-is-to-bū'-lus, a Jew of Alexandria, who endeavoured to reconcile Greek philosophical conceptions with the Jewish religion.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

ARISTOMENES, ăr-is-tom'-e-nes, a Greek, the son of Nicomedes, and descended from the kings of Messene. He defeated the Spartans in a great battle, for which his countrymen would have made him king, but he was content with the title of general.

Lived in the 7th century B.C.; died at Rhodes, where he was buried with great pomp.

ARISTOPHANES, ăr-is-tof'-a-nes, a celebrated Greek play-writer, the son of Philip of Rhodes. He wrote fifty-four comedies, of which only eleven have come down to us. He lived in the time of Socrates, Demosthenes, and Euripides, and lashed the philosophical theories, the political intrigues, and the vices of his age with a masterly hand. The wit and excellence of his comedies are well known, and he occasionally exhibited remarkable poetical powers. Aristophanes has been called the prince of the ancient comedy, as Menander is of the new. The play called "Nubes," or "The Clouds," is that in which Socrates is ridiculed.

Born in the island of Ægina, 448 B.C.; died 380 B.C.

ARISTOTLE, ăr'-is-tot'-el, the head of the Peripatetic sect, was the son of Nicomachus, physician to Amyntas, grandfather of Alexander the Great. Losing his parents when young, he at first intended to follow the hereditary profession, that of a physician. He became a pupil of Plato at the age of seventeen. On the death of that philosopher, under whom he studied with great diligence, but to whom some assert he was ungrateful, he went to the court of Hermias, at Atarna, in Mysia, and married that prince's sister. He was afterwards sent for by Philip of Macedon to instruct Alexander, and gave such satisfaction to the king, that the latter erected statues to him, and rebuilt Stagira, his birthplace. On the accession of Alexander to the throne, Aristotle refused to accompany him in his expeditions, but recommended to him his kinsman Calisthenes, and he himself settled at Athens, where, in the Lyceum, he taught his philosophy to a great number of disciples. He was in the habit of walking up and down the garden, while teaching, and from that circumstance his school was named the Peripatetic. Here he composed his principal works. Being accused of impiety, he wrote an apology for himself, and addressed it to the magistrates. He soon, however, quitted this city, and spent the remainder of his days at Chalcis, a city in Eubœa. The works of Aristotle may be classed under the heads of rhetoric, poetry, politics, ethics, physics, mathematics, logic, and metaphysics; and they display an immense amount of genius. No philosopher has ever exercised such a powerful influence on the human intellect.

Born at Stagira, 384 B.C.; died at Chalcis, 322 B.C.

ARISTOXENUS, ăr-is-tox'-e-nus, a pupil of Aristotle, who achieved great reputation, and is said to have composed 300 treatises; but only a few fragments of a treatise on harmony remain.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

ARIUS, air'-i-us, founder of the sect of the Arians, and a presbyter of the Church of Alexandria. His opinions in reference to the divinity of Jesus Christ occasioned such disputes, that Constantine, in 325, called a council at Nice to put an end to them. In this council the heresy of Arius was condemned, and the celebrated confession of faith known by the name of the Nicene Creed, drawn up. Arius was now banished by the emperor; but two years after he was recalled to Constantinople, and made a confession of his faith, which was received as orthodox. He next went to Alexandria, where Athanasius refused to receive him. When that prelate was banished, Arius returned to that city, but the people obliged him to withdraw. He retired into Egypt, where he raised new disturbances by his opinions; on which the emperor sent for him to Constantinople, and demanded of him whether he adhered to the Nicene faith. Arius answered on oath that he did, and at the same time delivered his own confession, which, appearing sound, Constantine ordered that he should be readmitted into the Church. He was then conducted in triumph by his followers to the great church, but died on the way. His doctrines did not expire with him, but occasioned fierce contentions in Christendom for ages.

Born 270; died 336.

ARIZONA, a territory of the United States of America, having Utah on the N., Mexico on the S., New Mexico on the E., and California and Nevada on the W. It lies in the basin of the Colorado river, which forms a considerable portion of its westward boundary. The surface of the country presents three special features, a barren plateau, with an average elevation of 11,000 feet, through a stupendous gorge in which the Colorado passes. This gorge, or "canon," is about 300 miles long, and the nearly perpendicular walls are from 3,000 to 6,000 feet high. The valley traversed by the Little Colorado, or Flax River, is to the south of the plateau, and still farther south is another elevated region, part of which is known as the Mogallon mountains, a well-timbered and fertile district. In the extreme south is the basin of the Gila river, into which numerous smaller streams discharge. As yet the country has been little explored. There are vast forests of oak, ash, sycamore, iron-wood, walnut, and other valuable timber; and, in the settled districts, grapes, figs, oranges, tobacco, and cereals generally, grow abundantly. The towns are small. The capital is Tucson; the next most important, Arizona City and Prescott. Area, 113,900 square miles. Pop., there are only at present about 10,000 whites in the territory; the Indian population is estimated at 25,000, most of whom have had districts allotted to them.

ARKANSAS RIVER, ar-kăn'-sâs, or ar-kăn-saw', with the exception of the Missouri, the largest affluent of the Mississippi, which it joins at lat. 33° 54′ N.; lon. 91° 10′ W.—The course of this river is about 2,200 miles, and it is estimated to drain 178,000 square miles of country.

ARKANSAS, one of the United States, lying between the state of Missouri on the N., Louisiana on the S., the Texas on the W., and the Mississippi river on the E. Ext. 240 miles long, with an average width of 224. Area, 52,198 square miles. The centre of this vast state is generally of a rich soil, and in the scenery which it presents, beautifully undulating and wooded; but towards the east it becomes soft and marshy, though still thickly clothed with forest-trees, whilst the W. rises into mountains. Only about one-seventeenth of the territory is allotted and occupied.

Rivers.—Arkansas, Washita, and the Red and White.
Pro.—Maize, wheat, rice, sugar, potatoes, cotton, and tobacco. Extensive herds browse upon the prairies.
Minerals.—Iron, zinc, manganese, lead, copper, granite, limestone, slate, coal, and salt, are the principal. There are many mineral and thermal springs.
Towns.—Arkansas, Little Rock, Batesville, Columbia, and Fulton. Little Rock is the seat of government.
Manf.—Chiefly articles of necessary use. There are some tanneries, cotton-factories, distilleries, brick-fields, and numerous flour-mills.
Pop.—802,525
Lat. between 33° and 36° 30′ N. Lon. between 89° 45′ and 94° 40′ W.
History.—Arkansas takes its name from a tribe of Indians, now extinct, and in 1685 was first explored and settled by the French. It formerly formed a portion of Louisiana, which in 1803 was purchased by the United States from France for 15,000,000 dollars.

ARKLOW, ark'-lo, a seaport and market town of Ireland, in county Wicklow, on the Avoca or Ovoca, near the Irish Sea, 12 miles from Wicklow. It consists of an upper town and a lower, mostly inhabited by fishermen. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the herring and oyster fisheries. Near the town are the ruins of the old castle of the Ormonds, destroyed by Cromwell in 1649. A station on the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway.—In the neighbourhood of the town a sanguinary engagement took place between the insurgent United Irishmen and the king's troops, in June, 1798. Pop. 5,178.

ARKWRIGHT, ark'-rite, SIR RICHARD, an English manufacturer, who, from being originally a barber at Bolton-le-moor, in Derbyshire, commenced travelling through the country buying hair, and at Warrington became acquainted with one Kay, a clockmaker, with whom he projected a machine for spinning cotton, in the perfecting of which they were assisted by Mr. Atherton, of Liverpool. This was the famous spinning-frame, which spins a vast number of threads to any degree of fineness, one of the greatest of all the inventions which have contributed to the immense development of the cotton manufacture of this country. Arkwright afterwards went into partnership with Mr. Smalley, of Preston, but not succeeding there, they went to Nottingham, and erected a cotton-mill, which was worked by horse-power. By this time Arkwright had taken out a patent for his machine, which, however, was, in 1785, set aside in the Court of King's Bench. He afterwards erected works at Crumford, in Derbyshire, and acquired a large fortune. He was knighted in 1786, not for the merit of his inventions, but for having, as high sheriff of Derbyshire, presented a congratulatory address to George III.

Born at Preston, 1732; died at Crumford, 1792.

ARLAUD, ar-lo, JAMES ANTONY, an eminent Swiss painter, who went, at the age of 20, to Paris. Here he was patronised by the royal family, and painted his Leda, a copy of which he sold in London for £600, but would never part with the original; and it is said that, in a fit of enthusiasm, he destroyed this exquisite production by cutting it to pieces.

Born at Geneva, 1668; died 1743.

ARLER, PETER VON, ăr'-ler, German architect, who completed the cathedral of St. Vitus, Prague, one of the finest examples of German Gothic. He also erected the Allrhelighi church in the same city, and designed the famous bridge, with statues of saints, over the Moldau.

Born at Bologna, 1333; died 1386.

ARLES, arl, a well-built town of France, in the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, 46 miles N.W. from Marseilles. Besides the cathedral church, dedicated to St. Trophime, and famous for its portico, there are several parish churches and other religious houses, a fine town hall, built in the time of Louis XIV., a college, museum, school of navigation, and public library. A canal has been recently cut, connecting the town with Bouc, on the Mediterranean. It carries on a trade in corn, wine, oil, fruit, sheep, and sausages, and has manufactures of hats, serge, gold and silver articles, saltpetre, soap, and brandy. The building of railway carriages is an important branch of industry. A new bridge over the Rhône was erected in 1866. The town was the Arelate of the Romans. Constantine, the Roman emperor, took great delight in this place, and made it the seat of his empire in Gaul; and here are some remains of antiquities, of which a Roman amphitheatre, capable of holding 24,000 spectators, and an obelisk, and a cemetery (now laid out as a public pleasure-ground), are the most remarkable. Many ecclesiastical councils were held here in the Middle Ages. Pop. 2,600.

ARLINCOURT, ăr'-lin-cour, CHARLES VICTOR PREVOT, Viscomte d', French author. He was descended from an old family of Artois, and the son of one of the royalist victims of the Revolution. He held various offices under Napoleon and Louis XVIII. He was a poet and dramatist, but it is as a romancist that he gained his fame. They are mostly of a political tendency, and attained great popularity.

Born near Versailles, 1789; died 1856.

ARLON, capital of the Belgian province of Luxemburg. Iron wares, clay pipes, crockery, and tobacco are manufactured. It occupies the site of an ancient town, Oralaunum, but has been known as Arlon for more than a thousand years. Pop. 6,000.

ARMAGH, ar-ma, a county in Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded N. by Lough Neagh, W. by Tyrone and Monaghan counties, S. by Louth, and E. by county Down. Ext. 31 miles long and 20 broad. Area, 512 square miles. Desc. It is traversed by a chain of mountains, including Slieve Gullion, 1,893 feet; and the Newry mountains, the highest point of which is 1,385 feet; and, with the exception of these, the soil is rich and well cultivated, besides being plentifully watered by numerous streams, and abounding in picturesque lakes, but near Lough Neagh the county is low and boggy. Rivers. Bann, Blackwater, Callan, Tona, and several small streams flowing into the Bay of Dundalk. Pro. The usual cerealia of Britain, potatoes, flax, &c. Towns. The principal are ARMAGH, LURGAN, PORTADOWN, and a portion of NEWRY. Manf. Linen fabrics chiefly. Pop. 179,260.

ARMAGH, 'the lofty field,' anciently the metropolis of Ireland, and now the capital of the above county, a city and parliamentary borough, situate on a hill, near the river Callan, 33 miles from Belfast, and 62 N. of Dublin. The cathedral, a large cruciform edifice, is supposed to occupy the site of that erected by St. Patrick in the 5th century. It has been repaired, chiefly at the cost of the late Archbishop Beresford, who, with other members of his family, was a great benefactor to the town. Armagh is the ecclesiastical metropolis of both Anglicans and Roman Catholics, and there is a large Roman Catholic cathedral in the Gothic style. There are a college, a public library, an observatory, a fever hospital, several churches and schools, and a Roman Catholic convent. Armagh has a very large market every Tuesday; the principal commodity sold being linen cloth in the brown state. It has also a large inland trade in linen, yarn, and corn. Pop. 8,797.—A station on the Northern of Ireland, Newry and Armagh, and Belfast and Armagh Railways.

ARMAGNAC, ar'-man-yak', a small territory in the old French territory of Gascogne, from which the counts of Armagnac took their title. It is now included in the departments of Gers and Hautes-Pyrenées. The ancient capital is Lectoure, on the river Gers.

ARMANSPERG, JOSEPH LUDWIG, Count of, Bavarian statesman, who, having occupied important posts in the Bavarian ministry, undertook to form a government for the young king Otho in Greece, on his accession to the throne in 1833. He was prime minister for four years, but court intrigues led to his dismissal, and he retired into private life at his castle in Bavaria.

Born 1787; died 1833.

ARMENIA, ar-mē'-ne-a, a country of western Asia, bounded N. by Georgia and Mingrelia, S. by the mountains of Kurdistan, E. by the Caspian Sea, and W. by the river Euphrates. It is now divided between Russia, Turkey, and Persia. The Russian portion is chiefly included in the government of Erivan; the Persian the district of Azerbijan; Turkish, the province of Erzeroum. The country is mountainous in general, and, owing to its height above the level of the sea, of a colder temperature than might have been expected from its geographical position. Here the celebrated Mount ARARAT forms an angle of an immense range of mountains, and rears its lofty peak amid everlasting snows.

Rivers.—The Tigris, the heads of the Euphrates, the Aras, the Kur, and the Joruk.

Lakes.—Van, Urumiyah, and Sevan.

Pro.—Wheat and barley are extensively cultivated; cotton, hemp, tobacco, and raw silk are also plentiful. Manna is produced in sufficient quantities to be exported; and honey and wax are obtained in the hilly districts.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, lead, and iron; saltpetre, sulphur, and bitumen. There are productive quarries of jasper and marble.

Towns.—The chief are, in Russian Armenia, ERIVAN, AKHALZIKH, ETCHMIADZIN, ORDUBAD, and ALEXANDROPOL; in Persian Armenia, URUMIYAH; and in Turkish Armenia, ERZEROUM, KARS, and VAN.

Manf.—Unimportant, and mostly consisting of copper and iron, silk and cotton, wine, tobacco, and manna.

Pop. about 2,000,000.

Lat. between 37° and 42° N. Lon. between 39° and 50° E.

History.—Armenia formed a part of the Empire of the Medes, and passed through the same changes as that empire till 224 B.C., when Zadriades and Artaxeas revolted from Antiochus the Great, the former taking possession of Armenia Minor, and the latter of Armenia Major. Tigranes, who reigned here in 95 B.C., reduced Armenia Minor and other provinces. He became tributary to Rome in 66 B.C., and Trajan made this country a Roman province in 106. In 370 it was conquered by Sapor, king of Parthia, but the Romans soon recovered it. Afterwards it was governed by its own princes, till the Saracens obtained it, about 651. It was conquered by the Seljukian Turks about 1046, after which it suffered many changes till it was reduced by the prince of Kharasm in 1200, who was driven out of it by Genghis Khan in 1218. In 1335 the Ilkanian dynasty began here, and continued till 1385, when it was conquered by Timur, from whom it was soon after recovered by the Ilkanian princes. On the death of Ahmed Jalayr, the last of that line, in 1405, Kara Yusef, the chief of the Turcomans, got possession of it. This dynasty had the name of the Black Sheep, and in 1483 it fell by conquest to the family of the White Sheep. In 1500 it was conquered by Ismael Sosi, and reduced by Selim II. in 1552; since which the Turks have held possession of all, except that part in the east which belongs to the Persians, and the Russian government of Transcaucasia. In the Russian war of 1854, Armenia was one of the theatres of the conflict. (See ERZEROUM and KARS.)

ARMENIERSTADT, ar-man'-i-er-stat, a town of Transylvania, Austrian Empire. Here are an Armenian church and schools. Weaving and cattle-dealing are carried on, and there is a large transit trade with the interior. Pop. 4,600.

ARMENTIERES, ar-man'-ti-air, a town of France, on the Lys, 9 miles N.W. of Lille, department of Nord. Manf. Linen, lace, cotton, leather, beetroot sugar, and soap. Pop. 22,618.

ARMFELT, arm'-felt, GUSTAV MAURITZ, Baron, a Finnish nobleman, who distinguished himself as a statesman in the service of Sweden. His life, however, was one of continual difficulty, danger, and vicissitude. He was involved in a conspiracy to depose the regent, and afterwards suspected of poisoning the prince of Augstenberg. He finally entered the Russian service, in which he was treated with the most distinguished honour.

Born at Juva, 1757; died at Tzarskoe-Selo, 1814.

ARMINIUS, JAMES, ar-nin'-i-us, (the Latinized form of the family name, Hermanns), a Dutch divine, and the founder of Arminianism, was, after studying at Geneva and other places, in 1588 ordained, and became a popular preacher at Amsterdam. About this time Lydius, theological professor at Franeker, desired him to refute a piece on predestination, which had been written against Beza by some divines at Delft. In studying this point, Arminius became a convert to the opinion which he was employed to confute. In 1603 he was appointed professor of divinity at Leyden, where his lectures were much admired. His great adversary was Gomarus, with whom he held several conferences. Arminius was a very learned, pious, and eloquent man, and remarkable for the evenness of his temper. His motto was, "A good conscience is a paradise."

Born at Oudewater, 1560; died 1609.

ARMINIUS, (See HERMANN.)

ARMLEY, arm'-le, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Leeds, on the Bradford Railway. Manf. Chiefly woollen. Pop. from 6,000 to 7,000. The Great Northern, Midland, and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways have each a station here.

ARMSTRONG, arm'-strong, an agricultural county of the United States, in Pennsylvania. Area, 575 square miles. Pop. 47,641.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, a Scotch poet and physician, who, in 1732, took his degree of M.D. at Edinburgh. In 1744 he published the "Art of Preserving Health," a didactic poem, and shortly afterwards received the appointment of physician to the military hospital. In 1760 he was appointed physician to the army in Germany, and the next year wrote a poem called "Day, an Epistle to John Wilkes, of Aylesbury, Esq." In this letter he threw out a reflection upon Churchill, which drew on him he resentment of that satirist. He published several other works of a miscellaneous character.

Born at Castleton, Roxburghshire, 1709; died at London, 1779.

ARNAUD, HENRI, ar'-no, first the pastor of the Vaudois, and then their military leader in endeavouring to recover the possession of their valleys in Piedmont, from which they had been driven by the tyranny of a count of Savoy. He himself subsequently became the historian of this expedition, and says that in eighteen battles fought against his enemies he lost only thirty of his followers, whilst no fewer than 10,000 of his foes were slain. He was invited by William III. to reside in England, but preferred to remain pastor of the exiles at Schomberg.

Born in La Tour, Piedmont, 1641; died at Schomberg, 1721.

ARNAULD, ANTOINE, ar'-nawld, a French polemical writer of considerable reputation in his time. He was the twentieth son of a famous advocate of the same name, who had defended the university against the Jesuits. He was first trained to the law, but entered the Church and joined the Sorbonne. He engaged in the great Jansenist controversy, and the works he produced placed him in the very first rank of controversialists.

Born in Paris, 1612; died at Brussels, 1694.

ARNAY-LE-DUC, ahr'-nay-le-duhk, a French town, department Côte d'Or, near the river Arroux. A considerable trade is carried on in grain, cattle, wine, leather, wool, horsehair, and poultry. Cloth and starch are manufactured, and there are tanneries and tile-works. Pop. 2,300.

ARNDT, ERNST MORITZ, arnt, a German political writer of ability, who, on completing his collegiate studies at the university of Jena, assumed the profession of the church, and travelled through Italy, France, Hungary, Austria, and Sweden. The observations made in these travels were reduced to writing, and Arndt now became professor extraordinary at Griefswald. Here he denounced, in a work, the serfdom which then existed in Pomerania, and subsequently, in a still more spirited production fervently appealed to the patriotism of his countrymen to check the bondage to which they were being reduced under the policy then pursued by Napoleon I. The boldness with which he spoke of the emperor, in subsequently expanding this work, forced him to flee his country, and he sought refuge in Stockholm. Returning to his country under an assumed name, he resumed his pen, and wrote a great many effusions both in poetry and prose, which had for their object the rousing of the whole spirit of Germany against the foreign yoke under which it groaned. These produced a great effect at the time, and after the peace (1815-16) he became the editor of a journal called "The Watchman," at Cologne. In 1818 he was presented by the king of Prussia with the professorial chair of modern history in the university of Bonn. His liberal tendencies, however, soon caused his suspension from his duties, although he was still allowed to retain his salary. For twenty years he lived in retirement, when, in 1848, the Revolution drew him once more into public life. He became a member of the National Assembly at Frankfort; from this, however, he soon withdrew, and passed the remainder of his life in seclusion. Statues have been erected to his memory at his birthplace and at Bonn, where he was buried.

Born at Schoritz, Isle of Rugen, 1769; died 1860.

ARNE, THOMAS AUGUSTINE, an English musician, educated at Eton, and afterwards articled to an attorney; but he soon abandoned the desk for the violin, on which he played so well that he was engaged as leader of the orchestra at Drury-lane. In 1733 he composed the music for Addison's opera of "Rosamond," which was received with universal applause. In 1738 he acquired great credit by setting Milton's "Comus," and in 1740 set Mallet's masque of "Alfred," in which first appeared the song of "Rule Britannia." In 1759 Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of music. In 1762 was produced his opera "Artaxerxes." His settings of some of Shakespeare's songs still retain their popularity.

Born in London, 1710; died 1778.

ARNEDO, ar-nay'-do, a city of Spain, province of Old Castile, near the left bank of the Cidacos. It is well built, and the public buildings are good. An ancient castle, now a barrack, is on an adjacent hill. Linen weaving is carried on; but agriculture and cattle rearing are the chief occupations of the inhabitants. Pop. 3,345.

ARNHEIM, arn'-hime, the capital of Guelderland, Holland, standing at a distance of about 50 miles from Amsterdam, on the right bank of the Rhine, where it is crossed by a bridge of boats. It is neatly built, and its fortifications, in 1702, were greatly enlarged by the famous Cohorn. The church of St. Eusebius contains the tombs of the dukes of Egmont; the town hall is noticeable for its grotesque ornamentation. Manf. Cotton, woollens, paper, and tobacco. It has likewise an active trade in oil and bark. Pop. 45,372.—Arnheim was taken from the Spaniards in 1585, and in 1813 the Prussians took it from the French. It is connected by railway with Utrecht, Amsterdam, Hague, Rotterdam, and with Rhenish Prussia.

ARNHEIM BAY, a spacious bay at the north-west extremity of the Gulf of Carpentaria, North Australia. It is bordered by Arnhem Land, which was discovered by the crews of the Arnheim and Fora, in 1618. Kangaroos are abundant, and parrots are seen in the woods. Lat. of the entrance, 12° 11′ S. Lon. 136° 3′ E.

ARNIM, JOHAN GEORG, Baron Von, general and diplomatist, who highly distinguished himself in the Thirty Years' War. He first entered the Swedish service under Gustavus Adolphus, but afterwards became the friend and ally of Wallenstein. In 1634 he was seized by the Swedes, and imprisoned at Stockholm. He escaped, and while engaged in raising an army, died suddenly.

Born in Brandenburg, 1586; died 1641.

ARNIM, LUDWIG ACHIM VON, German poet and novelist. Studied medicine and the natural sciences, but devoted himself to poetry and romance, producing many works characterised by whimsical fancy.

Born at Berlin, 1781; died 1831.

ARNO, ar'-no, a river of Italy, having its source in Monte Falterona, of the Apennines, and, after a course from E. to W., enters, by an artificial mouth, the Mediterranean Sea, 8 miles below Pisa. The length of its course is 140 miles. The river is noted for destructive inundations. Its valley is one of the most beautiful and most fertile in Italy.

ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, a priest who had studied under Abelard, in France, and on his return to Rome vigorously attacked the temporal dominion of the Pope and the luxury of the clergy, for which he was banished from Italy, and retired to Zurich, but a popular insurrection breaking out in Rome he returned thither, and endeavoured to obtain the deposition of the Pope, and the restoration of the ancient republic. Having been delivered up to the Pope by the emperor Barbarossa, he was hanged and his body burnt and thrown into the Tiber.

Died 1155.

ARNOLD, SAMUEL, an English musician, who, about 1760, became composer to Covent Garden Theatre, where he distinguished himself by several fine productions. His "Cure of Saul" attracted crowded houses, and this was succeeded by the "Prodigal Son," an oratorio, for which, in 1773, he obtained his doctor's degree at Oxford. At this time he was proprietor of the Marylebone Gardens, then a favourite place of public amusement. On the death of Dr. Nares, in 1783, he was appointed organist and composer to the Chapel Royal. In 1786 he commenced an edition of Handel's works. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, of which he was organist.

Born in London, 1740; died 1802.

ARNOLD, JOHN, a Cornish watchmaker, whose mechanical genius led him to effect great improvements in the marine chronometer.

Born at Bodmin, 1744; died 1799.

ARNOLD, THOMAS, D.D., schoolmaster and historian. The father of Dr. Thomas Arnold, was a collector of customs at Cowes, Isle of Wight, but the family was originally from Lowestoft, in Suffolk. The college education of Thomas began at Winchester, where his favourite studies were poetry and history. In his 16th year (1811) he was removed to Oxford, having obtained a scholarship in Corpus Christi College. Here he exhibited that "intense earnestness" with which his future existence was to be governed and guided. In defining his convictions at this period, we should say that he considered, in relation to duty and conduct, all mere professions to be the idealities of mankind, and only performances to be their realities. In 1814 he took a first-class degree, and in the following year became a fellow of Oriel College. In 1818 he was ordained a deacon. In 1820 he married, and settled at Laleham, near Staines, where another change seems to have passed over his character. He was now twenty-five, and he had taken several young men under his tuition to prepare them for the universities. He was at the same time employed in collecting materials for his edition of Thucydides, and contributed articles on Roman history to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." In 1828 he was elected head master of Rugby school, and he entered upon his duties as a benevolent, ardent, and enlightened instructor, and gained the universal respect and deep affection of all entrusted to his care. In 1835 he accepted the office of a fellowship in the new London University; but in 1838 retired, on account of some difference between the members upon the principle of voluntary examinations. In 1841 Lord Melbourne appointed him regius professor of modern history at Oxford, but he lived only to deliver his introductory course of lectures. Dr. Arnold was buried in the chapel at Rugby, and after his death several scholarships were founded by subscription in honour of his name. His writings consist of a Roman history, an edition of Thucydides, a volume of lectures on modern history, several volumes of sermons, and other contributions of a miscellaneous kind to reviews and other periodicals.

Born at West Cowes, Isle of Wight, 1795; died at Rugby, 1842.

ARNOLD, BENEDICT, an American general, who, although bred a surgeon, was for many years master of a trading vessel; but on the breaking out of hostilities between Great Britain and the colonies, he entered into the service of the latter, and was chosen captain of a company of volunteers at New-haven. He soon rose to the rank of colonel, and commanded an expedition to Canada, where he was joined by General Montgomery, and in an attempt on Quebec, received a wound in the leg. He next commanded a flotilla on Lake Champlain, where he distinguished himself by his bravery. He continued in the American service till 1780, when he opened a correspondence with Sir Henry Clinton for betraying West Point to the British, in which negociation Major André became a victim. (See ANDRÉ.) Arnold had a narrow escape, and got on board an English ship of war. He now served with equal ardour on the other side, and, at the peace, retired to England, where he had a pension. He afterwards went to Nova Scotia, whence he sailed to the West Indies, and on his passage was taken by the French, from whom he effected an escape.

Born in New England; died in London, 1801.

ARNOTT, NEIL, DR., ar'-not, a Scotch medical practitioner, greatly distinguished for his benevolence, and his labours in the cause of sanitary improvement. He invented the water-bed and floating mattress, which, in cases of patients confined to their beds, have been used with great success. He is also the inventor of "Arnott's stove" and "Arnott's ventilator," which are now in almost universal use. Dr. Arnott, as an author, has obtained great celebrity for his work entitled "Elements of Physics; or, Natural Philosophy, General and Medical, explained in plain or non-technical language." In 1854 the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal, and in 1855 the jurors of the class of the Universal Exposition of Paris awarded him the great gold medal, and Napoleon III. presented him with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Arbroath, 1788; died in London, 1874.

ARNSBERG, a district of the Prussian province of Westphalia. (See WESTPHALIA.)

ARNSBERG, the chief town of the above district, situated on an eminence by the river Ruhe. It was the capital of the ancient duchy of Westphalia, and a member of the Hanseatic league. The new part of the town has been built since 1815. The ruins of an ancient castle are near the town. Manf. Weaving, white lead, shot, and paper; brewing and distilling are carried on, and there are works for the production of railway plant. Pop. 5,000.

ARNSTADT, arn'-stat, an old and thriving town of Saxony, capital of the principality of Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, on the Gera. There are an old church, with some very interesting monuments, a castle, palace, and town-hall. There are copper and rock-salt mines in the neighbourhood, and saline springs. Manf. Leather, cloth, tobacco, weaving, pottery, and paper, and a trade is carried on in grain and wool. Pop. 8,000.

AROLSEN, ă-rol'-sen, capital of the municipality of Waldech, Germany, on the Aar. In the palace are a fine museum of antiquities, and a library. Manf. Worsted, and woollen stuffs, and iron-ware. Pop. 2,000.

ARONA, a-ro'-na, an Italian port, province of Novara, near the southern extremity of Lake Maggiore, on which there is a dockyard. The Church of St. Maria has a fine altar-piece. There are several other churches, a gymnasium, and hospital. In the old castle, now a ruin, Count Carl Borromeo, canonized for his piety, was born, and a colossal statue, 66 feet high, erected to his memory in 1697, is on a hill near the town. A considerable trade is carried on with Germany and Switzerland, and there is a quarry of red marble in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,500.

AROUAT, a'-rou-at, a town of Northern Africa, in the Sahara. The people are industrious; and a trade in sheep, wool, oil, grain, and slaves is carried on. Lat. 33° 48′ N. Lon. 1° 38′ E.

AROUET, ă-rou'-ai. (See VOLTAIRE.)

ARPAD, ar'-pad, a chief of the Magyars, and founder of the Hungarian monarchy. He was the son of Arnos, under whom the Magyars first gained a footing in Hungary, and was chosen duke on his father's death, in 889. Having crossed the Carpathian mountains, he entered a country which was split up into petty principalities, consisting of numerous Sclavonic tribes. These he won by presents, or conquered by arms, and finally took up his abode on the island of Tsepel, in the Danube. From this place he governed Hungary, and bequeathed it to Zoltan, his son and successor.

Died 907.

ARPAJON, ar'-pa-zhong, a French town, department Seine-et-Oise, at the confluence of the Orge and Remarde. There is an ancient endowment, the Hôtel-Dieu. There are ant-pits, cotton-works, and breweries. Pop. 2,500.

ARPINO, ar-pi'-no, an Italian town, in the province of Catula, on the Garigliano, the Roman Arpinum, and the birth place of Cicero. Manf. Woollen cloth (for which it was known in the Roman towns), parchment, paper, &c. There are marble quarries near. Pop. 10,500.

ARRAH, a'-ra, a town and capital of the district of Shahabad, in the province of Bengal, British India, 36 miles from Patna. It was in going to the relief of a few Englishmen who had fortified themselves in the neighbourhood of this place, that 400 British fell into an ambuscade of the sepoys, and of whom 200 were slain, July 1857. Lat. 25° 31′ N. Lon. 84° 43′ E. Pop. 40,000.

ARRAN, ăr'-ăn, an island on the W. coast of Scotland, near the mouth of the Clyde, and forming the larger part of the shire of Bute. Ext. 20 miles long, and from 8 to 11 broad. Area. 165 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and picturesque. The greatest elevation is Goatfell, 2,865 feet high. Marble, jasper, agates, cairngorms, and a fine species of rock crystal commonly called the Arran diamond are found. Small patches of flax are cultivated, and an inconsiderable quantity of linen, and some woollens, are manufactured; and the island is laid out in extensive sheep-walks. Its shores are frequented by shoals of salmon, herring, and white fish. A few red deer are still found in the island, and blackcock and other species of grouse are plentiful. There are Druidical circles and sepulchral cairns. Pop. 4,730.

ARRAN ISLES, a group of three small islands, belonging to the county of Galway, Connaught, lying across the entrance to Galway Bay, and 4 miles off the west coast of Ireland. At one time these islands contained twenty churches and monasteries. The centre island, Inishmore, is still known as "Arran of the Saints." United Area, 11,287 acres. Pop. 3,050.

ARRAS, ar'-as, a large and strongly fortified town of France, the capital of the department of the Pas de Calais, on the Scarpe, 36 miles from Amiens. The seat of a bishopric, and there is a cathedral, a large building on the site of that destroyed in the revolution; the town-house, a beautiful building, erected in 1510; a public library, a picture gallery, and a museum, are among the public buildings. Manf. Tapestry, fine linen, dimities, lace, and porcelain; it has also some beet-root sugar and soap factories. Pop. 21,732. Lat. 50° 17′ N. Lon. 2° 46′ E.—This is one of the most ancient towns in the kingdom, being the Nemetacum of the time of Cæsar. It was the birthplace of Robespierre, Lebon, and Damiens.—It is a principal station on the Northern Railway of France.

ARREBOE, ANDEN, Danish writer, Bishop of Drontheim, 1618; dismissed for improper levity, but restored five years afterwards. He is considered to be the most eminent of the early Danish poets.

Born in the island of Ærroe, 1587; died 1637.

ARRECIFE, ăr'-ra-ceef, a seaport town, capital of Lancerota, one of the Canary islands. Pop. 2,500. Lat. 28° 56′ N. Lon. 13° 36′ W.

ARRHENIUS, CLAUS, ar-hai'-ne-us, Swedish historian. Studied at Upsal University, where he became professor. His fame rests on an uncompleted history of the Church in Sweden.

Born at Linkoping, 1627; died at Stockholm, 1689.

ARRIA, ăr'-e-a, the wife of Cæcina Pætus, who perceiving the hesitation of her husband, the Roman consul, who was condemned by Claudius to fall upon his sword, plunged a dagger into her bosom, and drawing it out said, "My Pætus, it is not painful."

Died 42 A.D.

ARRIAN, FLAVIUS, ăr'-e-an, a Greek historian, who united the character of a warrior and philosopher, and rose to the highest dignities in Rome. He wrote an account of the expedition of Alexander the Great, in seven books.

Born at Nicomedia. Lived in the 2nd century.

ARRU, or AROO, ar'-oo, a group of islands about 80 miles to the south of New Guinea, which produce pearl, tortoise-shell, and trepang. These articles the inhabitants exchange with traders for British manufactured goods. Lat. between 5° 20′ and 7° 6′ S. Lon. between 134° 10′ and 134° 54′ E. Pop. 13,000. The group belongs to Holland. The largest island of the group is Cobron, 69 miles by 23.

ARSACES I., ar-sai'-ses, founder of the Parthian monarchy. He induced his countrymen to rise against the Macedonian yoke, 250 B.C., on which they raised him to the throne. Arsaces was slain in battle, after reigning three years.—His successors are known in history as the Arsacidæ.

ARSACIDES. (See SOLOMON ISLANDS.)

ARSAMASS, a Russian town in the government of Nijni-Novgorod. It contains 20 churches and two convents. There are two annual fairs, at which a large trade in sheepskins and sail-cloth is carried on. There are iron and dye works, soap factories, and tanneries. Pop. 12,500.

Seven miles from the northern coast of the gulf to which it gives its name. It was the ancient Ambracia. Lat. 39° 8′ N. Lon. 20° 5′ E. Pop. 7,000.

ARTA, Gulf of, a gulf of the Ionian Sea, 25 miles long and 10 wide, near the entrance of which the naval battle of Actium was fought, 29 B.C.

ARTA, a town in the isle of Majorca. It is well built and defended by a castle. Manf. weaving dyeing, and brandy making; cattle rearing and fishing are carried on. Pop. 4,000. The place is chiefly famous for some very beautiful stalactite caverns in the vicinity.

ARTABANUS IV., ar'-ta-bai'-nus, the last of the Parthian monarchs, who, in 217, escaping with great difficulty from a perfidious massacre commenced by the Romans, with Caracalla at their head, mustered an army, and engaged his foes in a battle which lasted two days; but as the armies were preparing to renew the combat, Artabanus was informed of the death of Caracalla, and peace was made on honourable terms. Artaxerxes afterwards incited his subjects to revolt, and in a battle Artabanus was taken and put to death. Thus ended, in the 3rd century, the Parthian empire.

Died 224.

ARTAVASDES I., ar'-ta-văs'-des, a king of Armenia, who succeeded his father Tigranes. He joined the Roman forces under Crassus, but deserted to the enemy, and then the Romans were defeated and Crassus slain. He similarly betrayed Mark Antony when engaged against the Medes; but afterwards Artavasdes fell into Antony's power, and he was taken, with his wife and children, to Alexandria, where they were dragged at Antony's chariot-wheels in chains of gold. After the battle of Actium, Cleopatra caused his head to be struck off, and sent to the king of Media.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

ARTAXERXES, ŭr-ta-zerk'-zes, a royal Persian name borne by several kings. The first was the son of Xerxes, the invader of Greece, whom he succeeded, 465 B.C. The name appears in the Scriptural books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and the identification of the particular kings referred to has given rise to much scholarly discussion.

ARTEDI, PETER, ar-te-de, a Swedish naturalist, between whom and Linnæus there was such an attachment, that they made each other heirs to all their MSS. Artedi devoted himself chiefly to ichthyology, which he greatly advanced. Linnæus published, in 1738, his "Bibliotheca Ichthyologica" and his "Philosophia Ichthyologica."

Born at Angermania, 1705; accidentally drowned at Leyden, 1735.

ARTEMIDORUS, ar-tem-i-dor'-us, the Dalian, author of a work on the interpretation of dreams.

Born at Ephesus in the 2nd century.

ARTEMIS. (See DIANA.)

ARTEMISIA I., ar-te-mis'-e-a, queen of Halicarnassus, who assisted Xerxes in person against the Greeks, and behaved with such valour that the Athenians offered a reward for her capture, and the Spartans erected a statue to her.

Lived in the 5th century, B.C.

ARTEMISIA II., queen of Caria, erected a monument to her husband Mausolus, which was so magnificent, that every splendid structure of the kind has since been called a mausoleum. Many sculptures from the mausoleum are now in the British Museum.

Lived in the 4th century, B.C.

ARTEVELDE, JACOB VON, ar'-te-vel, a popular leader of Ghent in the 14th century. He was a wealthy brewer, and took the side of the citizens against Count Louis, of Flanders, whom, with the aid of English troops, he expelled. He was killed in a popular tumult.

Died 1345.

ARTEVELDE, PHILIP VON, son of the above, who also distinguished himself as a leader against Count Louis and the French. He was defeated and killed at Rosbecque. He is the hero of Sir Henry Taylor's fine play.

Died 1382.

ARTERN, an old town in Prussian Saxony, in the government of Merseburg, 27 miles N. of Weimar. There are a palace and two churches. Rock salt is worked. Pop. 3,600.

ARTHUR, ar'-thur, a British prince, in the records of whom legend is so mingled with history that it is almost impossible to construct even a moderately authentic biography. The popular history rests upon the chronicles of Geoffery, of Monmouth, according to whom Arthur was the son of Uther, pendragon or dictator of the Britons, by the wife of the duke of Cornwall. He succeeded Uther in 516, and instituted the military order of the Knights of the Round Table, and settled Christianity at York in the room of paganism. The adventures of himself and knights and the story of his queen Guinevere are related by the old Welsh bards, and Tennyson has recently revived the Arthurian legend in his beautiful "Idylls of the King." The real Arthur was probably a leader of the Celtic tribes of the West of England against the Saxons in the 5th century.

ARTHUR, duke of Brittany, the posthumous son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Henry I., by Constantia, daughter of the duke of Brittany, and declared heir by his uncle Richard I., who afterwards devised his kingdoms to his brother John. A peace, however, taking place, Arthur did homage to his uncle for the dukedom of Brittany. In another rupture between England and France, Arthur was taken prisoner by John, who caused him to be confined in the castle of Rouen, where it is supposed he was murdered.
Born 1187; died 1202.

ARTOIS, ar'-twaw, an old county and government of France, which is now divided into the departments of the Pas de Calais, the Somme, and the Nord.

ARTVIN, art'-vin, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 35 miles from Batoum. It has a trade in honey, wax, butter, and oil. Pop. 7,000.

ARUNDEL, ă'-run-del, a town of Sussex, situate on the Arun, 50 miles from London. The town is supported principally by a shipping trade in timber and corn. It was formerly a place of great strength, and was besieged by Henry I. in person, by whom it was taken, after a gallant resistance from the earl of Arundel. The castle dates from the time of the Conquest. The church, which dates from the 14th century, is a handsome cruciform structure, containing many interesting monuments. There is a town hall in the Norman style. Pop. 2,956.—A station on the South Coast Railway.

ARUNDEL, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Richard II. and Henries IV. and V. He was the second son of the earl of Arundel, and was made bishop of Ely at the early age of 22. He was a severe persecutor of the followers of Wickliffe, and was one of the leaders in procuring the act "De Hæretico Comburendo."
Born 1353; died at Canterbury, 1413.

ARVA, or ORAWA, ar'-va, a district in Hungary, situate among the Carpathian mountains, with an inclement atmosphere and barren soil. Pop., composed chiefly of Bohemian Sclavonians, 74,000.

ARZEW, ar-zoo, a seaport-town in the W. of Algeria, 26 miles from Oran. It is considered to be the ancient Arsenaria, and it contains many relics of antiquity. Lat. 35° 52′ N. Lon. 1° E.

ARZIGNANO, arts'-en-ya'-no, a town of Lombardy, 12 miles from Vicenza. Manf. Woollens, leather, and silk twist. Pop. 4,000.

ARZILLA, ar-zil'-a, a small seaport-town of Morocco, the first on the Mediterranean after passing Cape Spartel, from which it is distant about 20 miles. Pop. 1,000. Lat. 35° 28′ N. Lon. 6° 2′ W.

ARZOBISPO ISLAND, ar'-zo-bis'-po, in the Pacific. (See BONIN ISLANDS.)

Died 914 B.C.

ASAPH, a'-saf, a Hebrew musician of the tribe of Levi, contemporary with David, and the composer of several of the Psalms.

ASAPH, ST., ăs'-af, a town of Flintshire, 20 miles from Chester. It has a plainly-built cathedral, 178 feet long and 68 feet wide, restored by Sir G. Scott, in 1875. The episcopal palace is a spacious and commodious building. Pop. 1,900.

ASBEN, AIR, or AKIR, a large kingdom of Sahara, Africa. The chief town is Agadez. The country is fertile, and a considerable trade is carried on. Lat. between 16° 15′ and 20° 15′ N. Long. 6° 15′ and 9° 30′ E. Pop. 64,000.

ASCALON or ASKULAN, ăs'-ka-lon, a town of Palestine, 14 miles from Gaza, and one of the five chief cities of the Philistines, on the coast of the Mediterranean. In 1099 a great victory was won here by the Crusaders. The fort and fortifications were destroyed by the Saracens in 1270, and the place is now a heap of ruins.

ASCENSION, a volcanic island in the Atlantic, 800 miles from St. Helena, and a possession of Great Britain. Ext. Eight miles long, with an average breadth of six miles. Area, 35 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with one peak rising to a height of 2,870 feet. Scarcely any verdure whatever clothes its surface. Climate. Dry but healthy. The castor-oil plant, pepper, the Cape gooseberry, and tomato, are indigenous. Turtle and birds' eggs form the principal exports of its inhabitants. Pop., nearly all military, 500. Lat. 7° 55′ S. Lon. 14° 25′ W.—This island was, in 1501, discovered on Ascension Day; from which circumstance it takes its name. The British took possession of it in 1815, when Napoleon I. was sent to St. Helena, and made it a military station. There is a victualling establishment on the island.

ASCENSION BAY, on the E. side of the peninsula of Yucatan, in the Bay of Honduras. Lat. 19° 30′ N. Lon. 88° 56′ W.

ASCH, ash, a market-town of Bohemia, on a rivulet of the same name, in the circle of Eger. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, paper, leather, and beer. Pop. 9,000.

ASCHAFFENBURG, ash-af'-en-boorg, the ancient Hercynia, a fortified town of Bavaria, on the Maine, 24 miles from Frankfort, in the district of Unterfranken. Johannesberg, the castle, built early in the 17th century, and the cathedral, founded in 980, are fine edifices. The other principal public buildings are the churches of St. Peter and St. Alexander, two other churches, the foundation called Insignis Collegiata, the Capuchin monastery, and the Jesuits' college, in which is now held the Lyceum, or public school, with a royal library of 25,000 volumes. It is a principal station on the Bavarian State Railway. Manf. Woollens, coloured paper, soap, straw goods, and tobacco. Shipbuilding is carried on, and it has a pretty fair transit trade. Pop. 9,300.

ASCHAM, ROGER, ăs'-kam, a learned English writer, who, at the age of 15, entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and speedily distinguished himself by his classical acquirements. In 1548 he was appointed classical tutor to Lady, afterwards Queen, Elizabeth, and after being thus honourably employed two years, he returned to Cambridge, where he had been before teacher of Greek, and had a pension settled upon him by King Edward VI., at the same time filling the office of public orator with great reputation. In 1550 he attended Sir Richard Morysine in his embassy to the emperor Charles V., and remained in Germany three years. He was now appointed Latin secretary to King Edward, but on the death of that prince he lost his place and pension. Afterwards he was made Latin secretary to Queen Mary, and was employed by Cardinal Pole. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he continued in his office of secretary, and became her private tutor in the learned languages. His most esteemed work is entitled, "The Schoolmaster," of which an excellent edition by Mr. Upton appeared in 1711; his Latin epistles have been frequently printed, and are admired as elegant compositions. He was fond of instrumental music and archery, and a treatise on the latter subject gained him, while still a youth, a pension from Henry VIII.

Born near Northallerton, Yorkshire, 1515; died 1568.

ASCHERSLEBEN, ash-erz-laï'-ben, a town of Prussia, in the government of Magdeburg, between the rivers Eine and Wipper, seven miles from Magdeburg. Manf. Friezes, flannels, linen fabrics earthenware, beet-root sugar, and vinegar. Pop. 16,800. In the neighbourhood of this town are the picturesque ruins of the ancient burgh of Ascania, the ancestral seat of the house of Anhalt.

ASCOLI, as'-ko-le, an Italian town and bishop's see, in the province of Ascoli Piceno, standing on the bank of the Tronto, 15 miles from Teramo, and from its strong position and the stern character of the country in which it is situate, has, at all times of trouble, been considered an important place. There are a citadal, a cathedral, and remains of the old Roman town Asculum Poconum, which occupied the site. Manf. Woollen cloths, hats, leather, majolica, paper, and glass. Pop. 23,000.

ASDRUBAL and ASDRUBAL BARCA. (See HASDRUBAL.)

ASELE-LAPPMARK, a'-sel-läp-mark, a town of Swedish Lapland, in a district of the same name, 85 miles from Umea. Lat. 64° 12′ N. Lon. 17° 4′ E.

ASGELL, JOHN, an eccentric English writer, bred to the law, but first made himself conspicuous by a pamphlet on the currency, about 1670. He was appointed commissioner to settle claims and forfeited estates in Ireland. He was twice returned to Parliament, but each time expelled on account of a strange pamphlet he had written advocating the idea that men might attain eternal life without passing through death. The pamphlet was condemned as blasphemous. He died in poverty in a debtors' prison. He was a pamphleteer to the last.

Died 1738.

ASHANTEE or ASHANTI, ăsh'-ăn-te', an extensive territory of Western Africa, situate immediately to the north of the states which occupy the Gold Coast. It is mountainous and well watered, but in many parts covered with dense forests, which remain impervious, save by several paths, which have been hewn through them with immense labour.

Rivers.—The principal are the Assinie and the Volta. These, however, would seem to have different names in different parts of the country.

Climate.—Hot; but, in the more elevated districts, considered healthy.

Zoology.—Elephants, lions, hyænas, wild hogs, deer, and antelopes. These are the principal wild quadrupeds. Of tame ones, cows, with horses of a small breed, with a kind of hairy sheep, and goats, are the chief. Of birds, there are numerous vultures and hawks; parrots abound in the woods, and there are several smaller species of beautiful plumage, which are possessed of considerable powers of song. Of reptiles, alligators and snakes are plentiful.

Pro.—The principal vegetable grown is the yam; but rice, corn, sugar-cane, and a mucilaginous vegetable called encruma, are cultivated; tobacco and the pine, apple are also cultivated, and gum and dye-woods are plentiful.

Minerals.—Gold, iron, and lead; the first is washed down the rivers in particles as well as in lumps, mingled with sand in the earth.

Towns.—The principal are COOMASSIE, the capital, Dwabin, Mankarno, Boossoor, Dinkira, Kickiweri, Korauza, Buntakoo, Salaga, and Yahndi, which are all capitals of the various districts, provinces, or kingdoms composing the country.

Manf.—Principally cotton cloth, which the Ashantees weave on a loom worked by strings and held between the toes. Their patterns are painted with a feather, and often of brilliant colours. Leather is tanned, sword-blades are made, and figures of gold executed with considerable ingenuity.

Area, about 70,000 square miles.

Pop. variously estimated: perhaps about 2,000,000.

Government.—A monarchy, but the chiefs have great power, and control the action of the king on all important matters. The lower orders are in the most abject condition. Polygamy is encouraged, the king being allowed 3,333 wives, many of whom, however, act as guards and servants. Human sacrifices are common. The Ashantees were involved in difficulties with this country in 1824, 1843, and again in 1873, when Sir Garnet Wolseley commanded an expedition, and made his way to Coomassie, and dictated terms of peace.

Lat. between 6° and 8° N. Lon. 0° 3′ W.

ASHBOURNE, ăsh'-borne, a town of Derbyshire, on the Dove, 140 miles from London. There is a cruciform church, dating from the 13th century, and restored in 1845. Manf. Lace and cotton fabrics, and iron, and an active trade is carried on in cheese and malt. Pop. 4,884. A station on the North Staffordshire Railway.

ASHBURNHAM, JOHN, a staunch supporter of Charles I., and the only attendant, with the exception of Dr. Hudson, of that unfortunate monarch on his journey, in April, 1646, from Oxford to Newark, where the Scots army was lying. This individual passed through many vicissitudes, yet was so fortunate as to be able to repurchase the family estates, which his father had squandered through dissipation. His grandson was made a peer in the time of William and Mary, and the earls of Ashburnham are now in the enjoyment of the estates which were recovered by his success.

Born 1603; died 1671.

ASHBURTON, ăsh-bur'-ton, a borough and market-town of Devonshire, 18 miles from Exeter, near the river Dart. St. Andrew's church is a handsome cruciform structure in the Gothic style. Manf. Principally serge. There are slate quarries and tin and copper mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,335.—A station on the South Devon Railway.

ASHBURTON, ALEXANDER BARING, Baron, the second son of Sir Francis Baring, Bart., a London merchant of considerable wealth. In 1810, on the death of his father, he became the head of the firm of Baring Brothers and Co., and in 1812 was elected a member of Parliament for Taunton, afterwards sitting for Callington, Thetford, and North Essex. In 1834 he became a member of Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, as president of the Board of Trade and master of the Mint, and was created Baron Ashburton. In 1841 he proceeded to America, and amicably settled the boundary question with the United States, and which settlement is known by the name of the "Ashburton Treaty." He continued to support Sir Robert Peel in the House of Lords until Sir Robert brought forward his measure for repealing the corn laws. To this measure he gave a decided opposition, and after it had passed into law, he intermeddled very little with politics.

Born 1774; died 1848.

ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, ăsh'-be-del-a-zoosh, a market-town of Leicestershire, 16 miles from Leicester. St. Helen's is a fine old church, with interesting monuments. The Ivanhoe Baths are frequented for the saline waters; the name of the baths is taken from Sir Walter Scott's novel, some of the most striking scenes in which are laid near the town. Manf. Leather, hosiery, hats, bricks, nails, and there are iron-smelting furnaces. A canal 30 miles long connects the town with Coventry. Pop. 9,024.—Here are the ruins of Ashby castle, in which Mary queen of Scots was imprisoned.—It is a station on the Midland Railway.

ASHFORD, ăsh'-ford, a market-town in the county of Kent, 53 miles from London, on the Stour. The church is of Gothic architecture, and there is here a free school. Pop. 9,693.—It is a junction station on the South-Eastern Railway; the works connected with which occupy a large number of persons, who chiefly reside in a suburb known as New Ashford.

ASHLAND, ăsh'-land, a county of Ohio, U.S. Area, 342 square miles, with a fertile soil. Pop. 23,883.

ASHMOLE, ELIAS, ăsh'-mole, an eminent antiquary, who at first adopted the legal profession, but, on the breaking out of the Rebellion, went to Oxford, and entered Brasenose College. He was for some time in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined, he settled in London, and became a Member of the Society of Astrologers. On the restoration of Charles II. he was appointed Windsor herald, and became one of the first members of the Royal Society. In 1669 the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.D. In 1672 he presented his "History of the Order of the Garter" to the king, who rewarded him with £400. In 1683 he presented the university of Oxford with his collection of curiosities, including the famous Tradescent collection, which gift was augmented at his death by the bequest of his MSS. and library. He left a number of MSS., some of which were published; viz., "The Antiquities of Berkshire;" "Miscellanies on Several Curious Subjects;" and "Memoirs of his own Life."

Born at Lichfield, 1617; died 1692.

ASHMUN, JEHUDI, American philanthropist, and agent of the African Colonization Society, who founded the settlement on the West Coast of Africa, afterwards known as Liberia. His health was so greatly injured by the climate that he died soon after his return to America. He received a public funeral.

Born at Champlain, State of New York, 1794; died at Connecticut, 1828.

ASHOVER, ăsh'-o-ver, a town of Derbyshire, six miles from Chesterfield. The church of All Saints is a very beautiful structure in the Gothic style, and contains several monuments of great antiquity, and a remarkable leaden font. Manf. Worsteds, stockings, and cotton goods. Pop. 3,500.

ASHTABULA, ăsh-ta-bu'-la, a county in the north-east part of Ohio. U.S., on Lake Erie, with a rich soil. Pop. 37,139.

ASHTAROTH, ăsh'-tă-roth, "flocks," "the sheep," or "riches," the idol goddess of the Zidonians. (See ASTARTE.)

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE, ăsh'-ton-under-line, a town in Lancashire, on the river Tame, six miles from Manchester. It is well built; the streets are wide, and there are numerous handsome public buildings, including public baths, infirmary, hospital, and large union workhouse. The Town-hall, erected in 1840, is a very elegant structure. The church of St. Michael is a fine specimen of the later English style of architecture. A new church, St. John's, is cruciform, and has two spires. There are other churches and chapels. There is a public park, and near the town are large barracks for cavalry and infantry. There are stations of the London and North-Western, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and Oldham and Ashton railways. Manf. Principally cotton; but there are woollen, silk, and hat factories besides. Iron and brass-founding, brick-making, machine-making, bleaching, dyeing, and basket-making are also carried on to a considerable extent. In the immediate vicinity there are upwards of twenty collieries. Pop. 37,027.

ASIA, ā'-she-a, the largest of the great divisions of the earth. It is bounded on the N. by the Arctic Ocean, on the E. by the Pacific, on the S. by the Indian, and on the W. by Europe and Africa. It is united to Africa by the Isthmus of Suez, which is about 75 miles across, and is separated from N. America by Behring's Straits, about 48 miles wide at their narrowest part. The extreme northern point of the continent is Cape Sievero-Vostotehnii (North-east Cape), lat. 78° N.; the southern point (exclusive of the island Singapore), the extremity of the Malay peninsula, about 1° 20′ N.; the extreme east, Cape Vostochnyii (East Cape), 90° E., at the entrance of Behring's Straits; on the extreme west, Cape Baba, on the Mediterranean, 26° E. The boundary between Asia and Europe runs through the Black Sea and along the range of the Caucasus to the Caspian, nearly on the line of 42° N. lat. North of the Caspian the Ural river and mountains form the line of demarcation. The length of the continent, from the shores of the Mediterranean on the E. to the eastern coast of Japan, is over 6,000 miles; the breadth, from the extreme northern to the extreme southern point, 5,300 miles. The continental mass is four times larger than that of Europe, but the coast line, broken by many peninsulas and gulfs, is about 33,000 miles, not equal to half the coast line of Europe. On three of its sides the shores are singularly irregular, and in the north are indented with deep bays; but from the sea being almost continually frozen, these are of comparatively little value in a commercial point of view. The principal capes are the East Cape, North-east Cape, Lopatka, Cape Romania, the most southern, Negrais, Comorin, Ras-al-had, and Baba, which is the most western. East Cape is the most easterly part of the continent, and North Cape the most northern. Straits. The chief are Behring's; the straits of Corea, Perouse, Saugor, Formosa, Malacca, Palk, Ormus, Bab-el-Mandeb, the Dardanelles, and the Straits of Constantinople. Those of Palk, Perouse, and Behring's, are named after their discoverers; Bab-el-Mandeb means the "gate of tears," and is so called from the great number of ships which were wrecked on its coasts. It is only twenty miles wide between Africa and Arabia. Formosa signifies "beautiful," and was so named by the Portuguese. The Sea of Kara and the Gulf of Obi are connected with the Arctic Ocean; the Gulf of Anadyr with the Sea of Kamchatka, the Seas of Okhotsk and Japan with the Gulf of Tartary, the Yellow and China Seas and the Gulf of Tonquin, are all connected with the Pacific; whilst the Indian Ocean has the Gulf of Martaban, the Bay of Bengal, the Arabian Sea with the Gulf of Cambay, the Gulf of Cutch, the Persian Gulf, the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea, with the Gulfs of Suez and Akaba. Besides these there are the Levant Archipelago, the Sea of Marmora, the Black or Euxine Sea, and the Sea of Azov. The immense indentations which many of these make cause corresponding projections of land, which, in the form of peninsulas, run far out into the ocean on the south, west, and east coasts. Thus we have the Tchuktches, stretching towards America; that of Kamchatka, the Corea, the Malayan, the Indian, and the Arabian, the aggregate area of which alone, independently of the central continental mass, may be taken at 3,500,000 square miles. The large group of islands lying to the east and south-east of the continent are considered to belong to Asia. The principal are the KURILE Islands, the islands of JAPAN, LOOCHOO, FORMOSA, and the PHILIPPINES. The Malay Archipelago, including SUMATRA, JAVA, BORNEO, and numerous smaller islands lie farther south. Geographers have not drawn an exact line dividing the Asiatic islands from those of Australasia; but Mr. Wallace, the eminent naturalist, has pointed out a line, which may reasonably be adopted, passing through the Macassar Straits, the channel between Borneo and the Celebes, to the west of which the flora and fauna are essentially Asiatic in their type, while to the south and east the Australian characteristics are distinctly marked. The continent of Asia is traversed by the loftiest mountain ranges in the world, and the most extensive plateaux, or table-lands. These elevated districts occupy about two-fifths of the entire continent. The chief mountain systems are the HIMALAYA, the ALTAI, the THIAN-SHAN, or Celestial Mountains, and the KUEN-LUN. (See respective headings.) The Himalaya is a general name given to an immense range stretching from north-west to south-east, and consisting of three parts, the HINDU-KUSH, the Himalaya proper, and the mountains of Bhotan and Assam. This stupendous mountain range with its offshoots is about 2,000 miles long, and varies from 100 to 500 miles in breadth. The Altai system stretches, under various names, from the confluence of the Uba and Irtish, first to the Gulf of Okhotsk, and thence to East Cape. The whole length is about 3,000 miles, and the breadth varies from 400 to 1,000. The Thian-Shan, or Celestial mountains, rise in Tartary, and taking a course nearly along the 42nd parallel of north latitude, terminate in the great desert of Gobi. The Kuen-lun range runs nearly parallel with the Celestials, and in some places also with the Hindu-Kush. It takes its rise a little to the east of the 100th degree of east longitude, and under a variety of names runs west and north-west, and skirting the Caspian and Black Seas on the south, finally terminates to the west of the latter. The Stanovi Mountains, which rise in some parts of the range to an elevation of 61,000 feet, stretch from Kamchatka to the borders of Manchuria, as far as lon. 135° E. and lat. 55° N. In West Asia, the Ural and the Caucasian ranges are the principal. Besides these there are, in Anatolia (Asia Minor) the Taurus and Anti-Taurus, the Persian mountains, the Western Ghauts in the Carnatic, the Vindyhias in Upper India, and the Assam chain, which are described in the notices of the various countries. The chief features of the physical configuration of this vast continent may be described as the Eastern and Western plateaux or table-lands; the Great Desert of Central Asia; the plain of Northern India, and the plain of Turkestan; the Siberian lowlands, and the Chinese lowlands. The Eastern plateaux, divided from the Western by the Hindu-Kush Mountains, including the table-land of TIBET, to the north of the Himalaya, and extending from lon. 70° to 103° E., and from lat. 27° to 35° N. The area of this vast district, which has a mean elevation of about 15,000 feet, is larger than that of all Europe. Further north is the Gobi, or Great Desert of Central Asia, at an elevation varying from 2,000 to 6,000 feet, and extending from East Turkestan to Mongolia. The Western plateaux, or table land of Iran, including Afghanistan, Beloochistan, Persia, Armenia, and Asia Minor, has for its northern limit the shores of the Caspian Sea and a line extending to the Black Sea and Sea of Marmora; on the east a line of hills between the mouth of the Indus and the Himalaya; on the west the Black Sea and Mediterranean; and on the south and south-west the Persian Gulf and the Arabian Sea. This extensive region extends from the Mediterranean to the Indus, about 2,500 miles in length, with an average breadth of 600 miles, and an elevation varying from 2,000 to 8,000 feet. The entire area of this vast table-land is estimated at 1,700,000 square miles. The great plain of Northern India lies between the elevated region of the peninsula and the foot of the Himalaya. It occupies about 500,000 square miles, and in the highest points is about 1,000 feet above the sea level. The Plain of Turkestan occupies the space between the table-land of Iran and the Caspian and Aral Seas. The table-lands of India are described under the proper heading. In North-western Asia the plains are described as "steppes." The steppe of Ischim, in Siberia, extends from the southern part of the east slope of the Ural mountains to the Irtish, a distance of about 700 miles, and is partially covered with dense forests. Between the Irtish and the Upper Obi river is the steppe of Baraba, and farther south an extensive steppe between the Altai mountains and the eastern confines of Tartary. In the east of China there is an alluvial plain of 210,000 square miles. There is a great variety of soil in the steppes, rich pastures being intermingled with woods and sandy tracts, and there are many lakes and streams of salt and bitter waters.

Rivers and Lakes.—Asia contains some of the largest rivers in the world. The following table shows the principal rivers with their lengths and areas of drainage, as far as has been ascertained:—

	Length in miles.	Area of drainage. Square miles.
WESTERN ASIA (discharging into the Persian Gulf.)
Euphrates	1,716	196,000
Tigris	1,150	..
EASTERN ASIA (discharging into the Pacific Ocean.)
Amoor	1,750	800,000
Hoang-ho	2,480	700,000
Yang-tse-Kiang	3,300	700,000
Hoang-Kiang	..	..
Sang-Koi, or Tonquin	..	..
NORTHERN ASIA (discharging into the Arctic Ocean.)
Obi	2,670	1,250,000
Irtish	1,960	...
Yenisei	3,200	1,040,000
Lena	2,800	800,000
SOUTHERN ASIA (discharging into the Indian Ocean.)
Indus	2,300	400,000
Ganges	1,940	400,000
Brahmapootra	1,400	..
Irawaddy	2,670	1,250,000
Godavery	900	..

Menam	550	..
Camboja	1,000	..

The Attok, Chenab, and Sutlej are affluents of the Indus. For other Indian rivers see INDIA, BENGAL, BOMBAY, MADRAS, &c.

The largest lake of its kind, in the world, is that which is denominated the CASPIAN SEA. The other lakes are Aral, Tengiz, Van, Ooroomia, Asphaltites or the Dead Sea, which are all salt; and Baikal or Holy Sea. This last is of fresh water, has an area of 14,000 square miles, and forms a part of the great line of commercial communication between Russia and China. There are numerous other lakes distributed over Siberia, Tartary, Armenia, and Asia Minor; but these are the principal.

Volcanoes.—Few on the continent in a state of activity, but in the Asiatic islands they are abundant. Java contains a greater number than any other place on the globe of the same size. In West Asia, Demarcand is the only existing active volcano. On the eastern table-land, in the chain of Thian-Shan, there are two volcanoes, Peshan and Ho-cheou, widely apart from each other. In Kamchatka there are nine in a state of activity. In those regions where they occur, earthquakes are frequent.

Climate.—Although Asia is mostly within the temperate zone, it is generally colder than might be supposed by the indications of its latitude. In the central, north, and east parts, the extremes of heat and cold are felt. In Siberia the variation between the mean of the hottest and coldest months amounts to more than 100° Fahr. The great table-land is both dry and cold; but to give a general and comprehensive definition, the continent may be said to be cold in the north; wet and cold in the east; dry and hot in the south-west; and wet and hot in the south, where the year is divided only into two seasons—a wet and a dry. There is most rainfall in winter and spring in Persia, Asia Minor, Afghanistan, and Syria; but on other parts of the continent the wet season is between May and September. In the islands near to the equator the heaviest fall is between October and February. Here the monsoons blow from April to September from the south-west, and from September to April from the north-east. It is from this peculiarity that they have received their name, which, in the Malay language, signifies a season. The suffocating simoom—from the Arabic word semma, 'to poison,'—sweeps the deserts of Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Syria; whilst typhoons carry their terrors across Persia and the south-eastern countries generally. In China every variety of climate is experienced, in accordance with the difference of latitude in which it lies, and with other causes which combine to give it this character. Although its capital is in about the same latitude as Naples, in winter it has the atmosphere of the north of Europe, and in summer that of Egypt.

Vegetation.—The common cerealia, with rice, maize, and millet; the vine, olive, date; coffee, tea, sugar, orange, lemon, mulberry, tamarind, mango, figs, banana, plantain, indigo, spices, pepper, cinnamon, tobacco, and cotton. Barley and millet are produced in the north, wheat in the central, and maize and rice in the southern parts. Rice forms the staple article of food in the south-eastern hot and well-watered countries, and dates in the south-western sunny and dry ones. In the northern, central, and desert parts, there is little cultivation of any kind, the inhabitants being not only few in numbers, but mostly nomadic in their habits. From Turkey to China the vine is cultivated in about the same latitudes of these countries, whilst in the south-western countries the olive is carefully produced. Arabia supplies the coffee shrub; and China, Japan, and Assam, the tea-plant. Cinnamon, which is composed of the inner bark of a species of laurel, is produced in Ceylon; and sugar in Bengal, and other countries to the east. Malacca, Java, and Ceylon are also famed for their coffee and cloves; peppers and nutmegs have long been known as the products of the islands of the Indian archipelago. The poppy is extensively cultivated in Anatolia, Syria, and eastward into India. In the north, trees are dwarfs, and vegetation decreases as we proceed eastward. In the south of Siberia we enter the region of the birch, the willow, and the fir; in Manchooria we are in the country of oak; but on the great north plain, and in the regions of the south-west, wood is thinly scattered. In Hindostan and further India, the teak and the other oaks appear: the banyan-tree forms a grove in itself; the cocoa, areca, talpa, and other palms, spread their broad and protecting leaves, and the most esteemed woods, as ebony, rose, satin, sandal, and others, attain perfection. On the great table-land of Manchooria, the ginseng, valued so highly for its medicinal virtues by the Chinese, grows; and from Persia to China the rhubarb is found. The camphor-tree diffuses its fragrance in both China and Japan; the plant called assafœtida is found in Afghanistan, and the dried juice of the ash, designated manna, is produced in Persia and Turkey. In fruitage and floral vegetation Asia is prolific. To it Europe is indebted for many of its most esteemed fruits, which, with spontaneous luxuriance, are there growing wild. Amongst these may be noted the orange and the lemon, the peach and the apricot, the walnut and the cherry, the olive and the grape; whilst in Hindostan the pine-apple is so abundant as to be held by the natives as a fruit almost of no value. In flowers and ornamental shrubs, Europe has received from Asia the damask rose, the China aster, the Chinese primrose, chrysanthemums, hydrangea, and many others. The flora of the Himalaya Mountains is noticeable for the prevalence of rhododendrons and magnolias.

Minerals.—All the useful as well as precious metals are found in Asia. Gold, silver, lead, platina, tin, copper, quicksilver, iron, coal, salt, diamonds, rubies, amethysts, and almost every variety of precious stones. In Siberia, India, China, and Japan, gold is found; silver in Siberia, India, China, Japan, and Turkey; lead, iron, and copper in several countries; platina in Siberia; tin in India and China; quicksilver in China, Japan, and Ceylon; coal in Hindostan and China; and salt in most parts. Coal is known to exist in Asia Minor, Bengal, Northern China, and some of the islands of the Indian Archipelago.

Zoology.—Wild Animals. The principal are, the tiger, the panther, the leopard, and the jackal; the elephant, and rhinoceros; apes are abundant, and several kinds of deer, antelopes, and oxen. These all inhabit the southern or warmer portion of the continent. In the central regions there are the djiggetai, a kind of horse, the ass, musk, sheep, and goat. Here also are numerous herds of antelopes, roaming at will over the boundless plains, but often falling sacrifices to the ferocity of the wolves and jackals, which pursue them in packs. The north is the habitat of the fur animals. Here the ermine and the sable have their haunts, and the fox pursues his depredations. The sea-otter infests the shores of Kamchatka, and the polar bear wanders over the trackless snows of the arctic regions, in which the hardy reindeer and elk also obtain a scanty subsistence. In Hindostan, the maneless, and in the south-west, the maned lion, are sometimes, but rarely, found. But in these regions, the tiger abounds, and has been found as far north as the 50th degree of latitude. Birds. Numerous and splendid in their plumage, but in general destitute of the charms of song. The more showy consist of parrots, parroquets, and peacocks; gold and silver pheasants, and all the wild stock of our common fowls. In Arabia, the ostrich sweeps the plains with the fleetness of an Arab steed, whilst herons, cranes, storks, pelicans, and wild ducks, are to be found in the vicinity of its lakes. To Southern Asia Europe is indebted for the common cock and hen. Reptiles. The principal haunts of Asiatic reptilia are the north and north-east parts of Hindostan, between the Himalayas and the Bay of Bengal; in China, and in the islands of Ceylon, Sumatra, Celebes, and Java. At their head are the different species of the crocodile, haunting, and, with their loathsome forms, rendering horrid, the rivers of India. In the Ganges especially they are numerous. Of frogs there are ten species peculiar to Asia, and of toads there are nine, most of which are distributed over the islands. Fresh-water tortoises, and chameleons, are frequently found, and the woods, swamps, and jungles abound in serpents and snakes. Of these, the cobra-de-capello is the most deadly, and the python is the largest of the Eastern world. Tree-serpents, like parti-coloured garters, entwine the stems of the tropical forests; and the Indian Ocean, as well as fresh-water streams and lakes, swarm with innumerable snakes, as venomous as they are ferocious. In the Persian Gulf, the Red Sea, and on the shores of Ceylon, the pearl-oyster is found. Insects. Abundant, especially in the south, where the locust and the mosquito are intolerable pests. Fish. Every description is to be found along the coast, in accordance with the situation and the kind of water necessary to their existence; but their characteristics are too nearly assimilated to those of other continents to require a detailed or particular notice here. Domestic Animals. The same as those of Europe, with the addition of the one-hunched and the two-hunched camel, and the elephant. The greater number of European domestic animals are supposed to have come originally from Asia, as man himself is supposed to have done. In the north, the reindeer and the dog are broken in and employed as beasts of draught. In the central regions, the grunting ox, or yak, an animal with a tail like a horse, is similarly used; and in the south it is the Brahmin ox that is used. In the desert districts the camel is found; the dromedary, or one-hunched species, traversing the "sandy seas" of Arabia, Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, North-west India, and Turkestan; the Bactrian camel, or two-hunched, the dreary wastes of the central table-land. This animal may be seen as far north as the 50th degree, and the reindeer may be seen as far south in the same hemisphere, although the one is naturally the inhabitant of an intensely hot, and the other of an intensely cold country. The elephant luxuriates in the rich vegetation of the south, whilst the Tibet or shawl-goat adheres to the central regions of the continent. The sheep, whose tail often weighs from eight to ten pounds, is found in Afghanistan, Turkestan, and other parts, whilst the hog is abundant amongst the Chinese, although repudiated in the Mahometan countries of the south-west.

Area, 17,000,000 square miles.

Population and Races.—The most trustworthy estimates give the population of Asia at 795,000,000. The population may be divided into five principal groups, having marked characteristics, and further subdivided by some writers on ethnography into several minor groups. The five principal divisions are:—1. The Mongolian, or Mongol-Tartar; 2. The Caucasian, or Aryan; 3. The Semitic; 4. The Malay; 5. The Negroid, or Papuan. The Mongolians are by far the most numerous, extending, with certain modifications of type, over the whole of Northern Asia, China, Tibet, the plains bordering on the Caspian Sea, and the Malayan peninsula. They are generally short in stature, have yellowish-brown skins, flat noses, oblique eyes, and black hair. The Aryan or Caucasian race includes the bulk of the inhabitants of India, Persia, Afghanistan, and part of Asia Minor. To the Semitic group belong the Syrian and Arabian races. The Malays, a fierce race, occupy the islands of the Indian Archipelago. The Negroid group are closely allied in characteristics to the negroes of South Africa. They occupy a part of the Malayan peninsula, the Philippines, Papua, and some of the neighbouring islands. They appear to be derived from a mixture of the true negro with the Australian type. The stunted savages of the Andaman islands, and some of the hill tribes of India, exhibit a marked affinity with the native Australian races. It is estimated that more than 900 different languages, or dialects of languages, are spoken in Asia.

Religion.—Brahminism, Buddhism, Mahometanism, and Christianity. As all these religions had their origin in Asia, they prevail more or less in all its parts. Hindostan is the principal seat of Brahminism, and Buddhism is the creed of the inhabitants of further India, Ceylon, China, Japan, Mongolia, Tibet, and Corea. In India, independent Tartary, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, Persia, and Arabia, Mahometanism is professed, as it is also by the Tartars and Turks of Siberia and Turkey. In Asiatic Russia, Christianity prevails, and it has many believers in Turkey besides. In the extreme north of Siberia superstition and idolatry of the grossest kind hold dominion over the minds of the inhabitants.

Political Divisions and Forms of Government:—

BRITISH POSSESSIONS.—Aden and Perim (Arabia); Hindostan (or India), Ceylon, Assam; Straits Settlements, including Singapore, Penang, and Malacca; Hong-Kong (Chinese Island), Labuan (Borneo). Lower Burmah acquired 1826; Upper Burmah 1885.

RUSSIAN POSSESSIONS.—Siberia, Caucasia, and Turkestan.

FRENCH POSSESSIONS.—Cochin China; Chandernagore, Karikal, Mahe and Pondicherry in India.

TURKISH POSSESSIONS.—Asia Minor, or Anatolia, Syria, portions of Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Kurdistan.

PORTUGUESE POSSESSIONS.—Goa, Salcete; settlements in the Indian Archipelago; Macao, in China.

DUTCH POSSESSIONS.—Java and Madura; West Coast of Sumatra, portions of Borneo, Celebes, Molucca Islands, Palembang, Timor and Sumba, and various small settlements.

SPANISH POSSESSIONS.—The Philippine Islands.

EMPIRES AND KINGDOMS.—Chinese Empire, including the islands of Formosa, Hainan, and Loochoo, and the dependencies of Tibet, Mongolia, Mantchuria, and Korea; Japanese Empire; Kingdom of Siam; Persia, absolute monarchy; and Burmese Empire.

INDEPENDENT AND SEMI-INDEPENDENT TERRITORIES.—Afghanistan, Beloochistan, Bokhara, Khiva, and Khokan.

Arabia, under various chiefs.

(See each place mentioned under proper heading.)

ASIA MINOR, or ANATOLIA, the most western portion of the continent of Asia, situated between lat. 36° and 42° N., and Lon. 26° and 40° E., bounded by the Black Sea on the N., the Ægean Sea on the W., and the Mediterranean on the S. The precise eastern boundary is uncertain, the mountains which extend from the Gulf of Scanderoon at the north-eastern extremity of the Mediterranean, to Trebizond on the southern coast of the Black Sea (which are generally considered to be the limit in that direction), being broken masses, partly connected with the Taurus range and partly with the highlands of Armenia, and presenting no definite line which can be accepted as a physical boundary. The length from west to east is about 700 miles, and the greatest breadth, which can be determined with more accuracy from Cape Injeh on the north to Cape Anamur on the south coast, is 420 miles. The name Asia Minor was first given in the 5th century; but in the 10th century the name Anatolia, from a Greek word signifying "sunrise," was generally employed. The word "Levant," commonly applied to the western coast of the country, has the same meaning. Asia Minor is deeply interesting from its religious and classical associations. The Seven Churches of Asia—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea; Galatia, to the church in which St. Paul addressed an epistle, and Cappadocia, so frequently mentioned in the New Testament, were within its limits. The Troad, with Troy and Mount Ida, near the north-western angle, and the names of rivers and mountain streams, such as the Scamander and the Meander, recall classical associations. Strabo, and other Greek geographers, divided Asia Minor into the following districts, having marked distinctions in geographical features, and modern writers frequently adopt this method of division, although it does not correspond with the districts or governments into which, as part of the Turkish empire, Asia Minor is now divided:—1, Pontus, on the Euxine, or Black Sea, extending west from Armenia to the mouth of the Halys river; 2, Paphlagonia, and 3, Bithynia, also on the Euxine coast; 4, Mysia, comprising the north-west angle of the peninsula; 5 and 6, Lydea and Caria, on the shores of the Ægean Sea; 7, 8, and 9, Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia, extending along the southern coast from the Gulf of Macri (Makry) to the frontiers of Syria; 10, Pisedia, the mountainous country to the north of Pamphelia; 11, Phrygia, further west; 12, Galatia, near the centre of the peninsula; 13, Cappadocia, and 14, Lycaonia and Isauria, two barren and mountainous regions, further east, on the north side of Mount Taurus. The centre of Asia Minor is occupied by an extensive plateau, with an average elevation of 3,000 feet above the sea, traversed by numerous mountain ranges, and with a surface varied by undulations and deep valleys. The ranges separate the plateau into several basins, the waters of which have no communication with each other. One of these vast depressions, 250 miles in length and 150 in breadth, extending from the sources of the Sangarius and Halys on the north to the Taurus chain on the south-east, contains a chain of lakes (the streams having no outlet), the most considerable of which is named Tuzlah, or Tous, the salt-pan, descriptive of the extreme saltness of the water. To the north of this region is a tract of undulatory downs, scarcely supplied with water and nearly treeless. The Taurus Mountains, a broken and irregular range, extend from the south-western extremity of the peninsula, in a direction nearly parallel with the south coast to the frontiers of Syria, upwards of 400 miles. In some places offshoots from the main chain extend to the Mediterranean, but generally there is a broad alluvial plain between the mountains and the sea. The average elevation is nearly 8,000 feet; but some of the peaks are estimated at nearly 11,000. A characteristic feature of these mountains is the frequent occurrence of basin-shaped valleys, varying in elevation from 2,000 to 6,000 feet, known as "yailahs," which afford good pasturage. There are several famous passes, at a great elevation, affording access to the southern coast, to Syria, and to the Valley of the Euphrates. The pass, known as the Cilician Gates, between the two great mountain masses of the Bulghan-dagh on the west and the Ala-dagh on the east, is historically memorable in connexion with the march of the younger Cyrus, and with that of Alexander previous to the battle of Issus. It crosses the central ridge of the Taurus at an elevation of about 3,300 feet. A portion of the range farther inland was known to the Greeks as the Anti-Taurus; and farther west is a series of volcanic peaks or groups, extending for about 150 miles from north-east to south-west. The most northerly peak, Erdjish-dagh, is the highest mountain in Asia Minor, having an elevation of about 13,000 feet. Nearly 60 miles south-west is Hassan-dagh, 8,000 feet, which has covered a large district with volcanic deposits. Farther in the same direction are the volcanic group of Karadja-dagh and Kara-dagh, a volcanic mass about 8,000 feet high. Nearly at right angles with the line of these volcanic mountains is a range extending about 120 miles in a south-easterly direction, separated from the main range of the Taurus by a broad elevated valley, and rising in the central portion to about 6,000 feet. This chain is known as the Sultan-dagh, and nearly parallel with it is the range known as the Emir-dagh. At the western extremity of the great central plateau, and stretching to the Ægean Sea, are various ranges and mountain masses. The mountains north of the Meander (Meinder) river extend from near the town of Buladun to the promontory of Samsoun-dagh, opposite the island of Samos: the average elevation is about 3,000 feet. Another range, the Boz-dagh, reaches the sea near Smyrna; the Demindji range is connected at the south-eastern extremity with the lofty groups of Ak-dagh and Murad-dagh. In the Troad, or north-western angle of the peninsula, is the mountain group of which Mount Ida is the centre. The highest summit, Kaz-dagh (the ancient Gargarus), is 5,750 feet high. The northern part of Asia Minor is very mountainous; the most important ranges are that known as the Mysian Olympus, rising to the south of Broussa, and the Ala-dagh, between the rivers Sakariek and Kizil-ermak. East of the latter river the mountains, some of considerable elevation, approach the sea coast, and near Trebizond an altitude of 8,000 feet is obtained.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Kirzal-ermak, or red river (the ancient Halys), discharging into the Black Sea, to the east of Sinope, has a very winding course of about 560 miles. Farther west is the second largest river, the Sakarieh (ancient Sangarius), with a length of 320 miles, and discharging into the Sea of Marmora, and the Edrenos, or Adranas-tchai (the ancient Rhyndacus). East of the Kirzal-ermak, or Halys (the ancient Iris), which enters the Black Sea about fifteen miles east of Samsoun, after a course of about 200 miles, in which it receives the waters of a scarcely inferior river, the Ghermeli-tchai (the ancient Lycus), the Khodja-tchai (the Granicus, famous in connection with the victory of Alexander over the Persians), flows into the Sea of Marmora, and the Scamander, of Trojan fame, into the Dardanelles. The rivers discharging into the Ægean Sea are the Bakyr-tchai (the Caicus), the Ghediz-tchai (Hermus), flowing into the Gulf of Smyrna; the Kutschuk-mender, the Bojuk-mender (Meander), which has numerous small tributary streams, and a total course of about 240 miles. All these rivers bring down a great amount of alluvial deposit, which has filled up several of the ancient harbours, and now threaten the port of Smyrna. The Gerenis-tchai, rising on the northern slope of the Taurus range, discharges into the Gulf of Maekay; and on the southern, or Mediterranean coast, are numerous rivers, the most important of which are the Gok Su, or blue river (Calycadnus), a deep and rapid stream rising in the Taurus, and, after a course of about 100 miles, falling into the sea about twelve miles below Selevke (Seleucia); Sihun and Jihun (the ancient Sarus and Pyramus), which rise at the north of the Taurus, and pass southward through narrow and deep gorges. The latter river discharges into the Gulf of Issus, near Iskanderoon. The largest lake is the great salt lake already mentioned, and farther west are the fresh-water lakes of Eber-Gol, Ak-shehr-Gol, and Ilgun-Gol, which almost disappear in the dry season. Between the Taurus and the Sultan-dagh range are two beautiful fresh-water lakes, the Kerali-Gol (3,600 feet above the sea level), and the Egerdir-Gol (2,800 feet); and about 30 miles to the south-west of the last named are the lakes Buldur and Chardah, the waters of which are extremely salt. In the north-western part of Asia Minor, near the Sea of Marmora, into which they discharge their waters, are Isnik-Gol (Lake of Nicæa), Aboulonia Gol (Lake of Apollonia), and Manyas-Gol (Lake of Miletopolis). These lakes are frequently referred to in classical literature.

Climate.—On the central plateau the air is dry and extremely cold in winter, but excessively hot in summer. On the north coast cold winds and fogs are experienced. The temperature in the plains and valleys of the south coast is very high; and in the western districts the climate is one of the most delightful in the world.

Productions.—Large oak and pine forests cover a large portion of the Taurus range; and walnut, poplar, plane, cypress, and willow, abound in the less elevated districts. In the northern provinces are extensive forests of oak, beech, chestnut, and box, and in the valleys there is a remarkable abundance of fruit trees. The vine, figs, raisins, oranges, lemons, melons, medlars, apples, pears, plums, olives, and mulberries are extensively cultivated, the latter chiefly for the sake of the large silk factories at Broussa, Amosia, and other places.

Zoology.—Most of the wild animals of Europe are found in Asia Minor, especially boars, wolves, and bears; in the mountains are the ibex, chamois, and wild goat, and the leopard is not unfrequently met with in the same districts. Among the domestic animals are the camel and buffalo, and an enormous number of sheep feed on the large pastures of the interior. The horses are generally of an inferior description.

Area, about 520,000 square miles.

Pop.—No authentic estimate of the total population has been made. The bulk is composed of Turks, who form the mass of the rural and agricultural population; Greeks and Armenians, who live in the towns, and are chiefly occupied in trade. There are many wandering and pastoral tribes, the principal of which are the Kurds, in the eastern districts; the Turcomans, in the north-eastern and central provinces, and the Yourouks in the west.

Government.—Asia Minor forms a portion of the Turkish Empire, and is divided into the provinces of ANATOLIA (or Natolia), KARAMANIA, ADANA, ROUM (or Sivas), TREBIZOND, and MARASH.

Chief Towns.—AIDIN, BROUSSA, KONIEH, KUTAYAH, SINOPE, AND SMYRNA.

ASIOLI, BERNARDO, an Italian musical composer, who composed masses and many other pieces before he was eight years old. In after life he composed overtures, cantatas, operas, and a great number of pieces for the voice and piano.

Born at Correggio, 1769; died 1832.

ASKEW or ASCUE, ANNE, ăs'-ku, an accomplished English lady, daughter of Sir William Askew, of Kelsay, in Lincolnshire. She was married, when young, to one Mr. Kyme, much against her inclination, and on account of harsh treatment received from him, the result of her renunciation of the doctrines of the Catholic Church, in which she had been educated, she went to the court of Henry VIII. to sue for a separation, where much attention was paid her by Queen Catherine Parr, and those ladies who were attached to the Reformation. In consequence of this she was arrested, and having confessed her religious principles, was committed to Newgate. She was first racked with savage cruelty in the Tower, Lord Chancellor Wriothesley, it is said, himself applying the torture, and then burnt in Smithfield. From her letters and other pieces in Foxe and Strype, it appears that she was an accomplished as well as a pious woman.

Born 1520; died 1546.

ASKOE, as'-ko, a small Danish island in the Great Belt. Lat. 54° 54′ N. Lon. 11° 29′ E.

ASMAI, or ASMAYI, Arabic scholar and preceptor of Haroun-al-Raschid. He wrote a history of the kings of Persia and Arabia, which is highly valued by oriental scholars, and a romance entitled "Autar."

Born at Basna, 740; died 830.

ASNIERES, a'-ne-air, a small village a few miles from Paris, where are some large pleasure-gardens, much frequented by the Parisians and visitors to the capital of France. It is a station on the Western Railway of France.

ASOLA, a'-so-la, a fortified town of Northern Italy, in the province of Treviso, situate on the Chiese, 20 miles from Mantua. There are a cathedral and the remains of a Roman aqueduct. Manf. Silk twist. Pop. about 5,500.

ASPASIA, ăs-pai'-se-a, a Grecian courtesan celebrated for her beauty and her talents. She was so eminent for philosophy and rhetoric, that the greatest men of the age, including even Socrates, did not scruple to visit her house. Pericles having divorced his wife, married her.

Born at Miletus. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ASPASIUS, a philosopher of the Peripatetic school, and commentator on Aristotle.

Lived in the 1st century.

ASPER, HANS, as-pair', a Swiss painter, famous for fruit and flower pieces and portraits. Though held in such great estimation that a medal was struck in his honour, he died in great poverty.

Born at Zurich, 1499; died 1571.

ASPERN, as-pern', a town of Austria, on the Danube, five miles from Vienna; the scene of a great battle in 1809, between Napoleon I. and the Austrians, in which the former was defeated.

ASPHALTITES, LAKE, ăs-făl-ti'-tes. (See DEAD SEA.)

ASPINWALL, or COLON, a city and port on the northern coast of Panama, one of the United States of Colombia, Central America. The city is built on the coral island of Manzanilla. It was established in 1850 by the Panama Railway Company, and was named after Mr. Aspinwall, one of the largest shareholders. It is a rapidly increasing and very busy town, and the centre of a large local trade, and is connected by telegraph with Kingston in Jamaica. Pop. 6,600. Lat. 9° 23′ N. Lon. 79° 53′ N.

ASPROPOTAMO, ăs-pro-pot'-a-mo, the largest river of the kingdom of Greece, rising in Albania, and, after a course of 100 miles, falling into the Ionian Sea, 15 miles from Missolonghi.

ASSAM, an outlying province of British India, to the north-east, presided over by a Chief Commissioner, and divided into ten districts. It is bounded on the N. by the sub-ranges of the Himalaya; on the E. by the forests and mountains which separate the British possessions from Northern Burmak; on the W. by Kuch Behar; and on the S. by the hills which divide it from Silhet. The province consists chiefly of a series of fertile valleys through which the great river Brahmapootra flows, forming a number of islands, and receiving many tributaries, the most important of which are the Kundel, Digara, Tengapani, Dihang, and Kalaneg. The soil is rich and well adapted to agricultural purposes. Besides the Brahmapootra and its affluents there are more than 60 less important rivers, of which 34 flow from the northern and 24 from the southern ranges of hills.

Area, 36,415 square miles.

Zoology.—There are immense numbers of tigers, elephants, buffaloes, rhinoceroses, and other wild animals. Foxes, jackals, and monkeys abound. The birds are similar to those of India. Snakes are very numerous and dangerous, especially the poisonous cobra and karait, and the enormous boa-constrictor.

Productions.—The most important article of cultivation is tea, which was discovered in Assam in 1823. Tea culture was encouraged by the British Government, and Chinese labourers were introduced, and about 60,000 are now employed. The tea is of a fine quality, and the cultivation is steadily increasing. Indian corn, sugar-cane, hemp, and jute, are also among the articles profitably cultivated.

Population 4,381,426, of whom considerably above three millions are Hindoos, and a quarter of a million Mahometans. The hill and frontier tribes, some of whom live in valleys, follow agricultural pursuits.

History—

Surrendered to the British after the Burmese war	1826
Upper Assam formed into an independent native state	1832
,, re-united to the British possessions	1838
Assam, with the adjoining district of Cachar, placed under the control of a Chief Commissioner	1874

ASSAROTTI, OTTAVIO GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a'-sa-rot'-ti, an ecclesiastic, who first instituted schools for the deaf and dumb in Italy.

Born at Genoa, 1753; died 1829.

ASSAYE, or ASSYE, ăs-ay', a village of Hyderabad, in the Nizam's dominion, India. Here in 1803, the Duke of Wellington, then General Wellesley, with but 8,000 men, only 1,500 of whom were Europeans, completely defeated the combined forces of Scindia and the rajah of Nagpoor, numbering 50,000 men.

ASSEN, capital of the Dutch province of Drenthe, 16 miles south of Groningen. It is connected by a canal with the Zuyder Zee, and carries on a large trade in corn and peats. Pop. 6,800.

ASSENDELFT, as'-en-delft, a village in Holland, 10 miles from Amsterdam. Pop. about 3,000.

ASSENEDE, as'-en-eed, a town in Flanders, 13 miles from Ghent. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and soap. Pop. 4,000.

ASSENS, as'-ens, a maritime town of Denmark, on the west coast of the island of Fünen, 20 miles from Odense. Has a trade with Fünen and Schleswig. Pop. 3,600. Lat. 55° 15′ N. Lon 9° 55′ E.

ASSER, JOHN, or ASSERIUS MENEVENSIS, ăs'-er, bishop of Sherborne, was a native of Wales and a monk of St. David's. It is said that Alfred contributed so greatly to the foundation of the university of Oxford by his advice, that in gratitude to that prince, by whom he was created a bishop, he wrote his life, which was published by Archbishop Parker in 1574.

Died 910.

ASSERGHUR, or HASSER, a'-ser-gur, a fort and town of British India, in the presidency of Bombay, 15 miles N. of Boorhampoor. The fortress occupies a very strong position on a hill above the town.—First in 1803, and then in 1819, this fort was taken by the British. Since the latter period it has remained in their possession.

ASSEYLYN, Hans, Dutch painter, famous for the clearness and beauty of his landscapes. Born at Antwerp, 1610; died at Amsterdam, 1660.

ASSINIBOINE, a river in British North America, flowing in a north-easterly direction into Lake Winnipeg, and rising near the head waters of the Mississippi, about lat. 52° N., lon. 104° W. About 50 miles before reaching the lake it receives the Red River. (See Red River Settlement.)

ASSINIE, as'-i-ne', a country of Africa, at the west extremity of the Gold Coast. Here the French founded a factory in 1843, when they took possession of the country.

ASSISI, as-e'-se, a town of Italy, in the province of Perugia, about 13 miles S.E. of Perugia. The cathedral was erected about 1230, and contains the tomb of St. Francis, who founded here the first monastery of the Franciscan order, to which thousands of pilgrims resort every year. There are several other fine churches. The town was the ancient Asisium, and the remains of an ancient temple of Minerva form the portico of the church of Santa Maria de Minerva. Manf. Files and needles. Pop. 6,000.

ASSOUAN, or ERSUAN, or ESWAN, a town of Upper Egypt, the ancient Syene, on the right bank of the Nile, near the borders of Nubia. There are not many remains of the ancient city.

ASSUAY, a'-su-ai, formerly a department of Ecuador, South America, now divided into the provinces of Cuença and Lora, lying between Guayaquil, Peru, and Brazil. Area, estimated at 250,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and, on account of the varieties of elevation, more or less productive. Some of the mountains attain a height of from 13,000 to 15,500 feet. Pro. Every variety of the temperate and torrid zones. In the temperate, all the usual cerealia; and in the warmer, maize, indigo, sugar-canes, gums, bananas, &c., are raised. The cinchona bark is also produced. Minerals. Silver-mines are worked to some advantage at a place called Los Azoquis. Towns. Loxa, Cuença, Jaca, and Borga. Pop. uncertain; perhaps about 120,000. Lat. between 3° and 6° S. Lon. between 70° and 80° W.

ASSUMPTION, ăs'-um'-shon, one of the Ladrone islands, in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 19° 41′ N. Lon. 145° 27′ E.—There is another island of the same name, forming one of the Seychelles in the Indian Ocean.

ASSUMPTION, or ASUNCION, the capital of the republic of Paraguay, in South America, situate on the eastern bank of Paraguay, 18 miles above the junction of the first mouth of the Pilcomayo. There are a cathedral and college. The town was founded by the Spaniards in 1535. The inhabitants are chiefly of Spanish descent, and there are several thousands of Indians and Mestizoes. Its exports mostly consist of hides, tobacco, sugar, fruits, Paraguay tea, and rum. The port is good, and defended by several batteries. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 24° 47′ S. Lon. 59° 35′ W.

ASSYRIA, ă-sir'-e-a, an ancient empire in the upper portion of the Mesopotamian plain. The name was given by the Greeks and Romans to an extensive tract of country almost corresponding with modern Kurdestan, in noticing which we shall refer to the principal geographical features. Ancient Assyria was bounded on the N. by the mountains of Armenia; on the S. by Babylonia; on the E. by Media; and on the W. by the high ground on which the Euphrates takes its rise, and is about 280 miles long, and rather more than 150 miles broad. Besides Nineveh, the capital, there were many great cities, chiefly on the banks of the Tigris, the remains of which have been brought to light by Mr. Botta, Mr. Layard, Mr. George Smith, and other explorers. (See Nineveh, Babylon, Mosul, and Tigris.) The whole country is under the Mahometan rule. This fine and once fertile district is almost a desert. Huge mounds, the accumulation of nearly three thousand years, cover the superb palaces of the powerful monarchs, the large and busy towns of the ancient empire. The first discovery of Assyrian antiquities was made in 1820 by Mr. Rich, who brought home a few relics and arrow-headed or cunieform inscriptions. In 1835-37 Colonel Chesney and the Euphrates Exploring Expedition partially examined the district; but the first excavations of any magnitude were made in 1843 by M. Botta, the French consul at Mosul, who was followed between 1845 and 1849 by Mr. Layard, whose researches were of a very extensive character, and who obtained a magnificient collection of sculpture, some of the pieces of colossal size, and inscriptions, which, being deciphered, afforded historical information of the highest value. Subsequent researches have brought to light historical cylinders, and the contents of royal libraries, on cylinders and tablets of baked clay, from which it is possible to ascertain the leading incidents of Assyrian history, the succession of dynasties, and the wars in which they engaged. Previously, the statements of Ctesias, a Greek physician, had been chiefly relied upon by popular writers; but his history is now pronounced worthless, and the narrative of Berosus, a priest of Babylon, who lived in the 3rd century before the Christian era, is found to be more in accordance with the history now in course of disclosure by a careful and laborious examination of the newly discovered inscriptions. In the main, allowing for variation in the orthography of the names and some chronological characteristics, the references to Assyria in the Bible are found to be in remarkable agreement with the information obtained from the tablets. Ctesias and his followers asserted that Assyria was more ancient than Babylon, contradicting the narratives of the Bible and Berosus. The reverse is now ascertained to be the case. Ninus, Semiramis, Sardanapalus, and others whose names have hitherto figured in popular history, and whose magnificence has been the theme of poets and dramatists, are now regarded as mythical. Sardanapalus appears to be a Greek perversion of the name of several Assyrian kings, Assur-dan-i-pal; but his character, as depicted in Byron's poetical play, is purely imaginary. At present, exact dates are not known; but it seems beyond doubt that Assyria became independent of the Babylonian empire, of which it had previously formed a portion, about the 13th century before the Christian era, and that the seat of government was first at Asshur (the modern Kileh-Sergat) on the Tigris, 40 miles below Nimrud, and 60 miles below Nineveh, the later capitals. The first dynasty of 18 kings extended, according to the inscriptions discovered, from Bel-lush to Iva-lush (1273-74 B.C.). The second dynasty begins with Tiglath-Pileser, and lasted less than 80 years, until the destruction of Nineveh. In this period are included the reigns of Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon, familiar to all readers of the Bible. In this period the empire appears to have attained a high degree of power and wealth. The cities were of great extent, and there were superb palaces; but it must be remembered that the kings never scrupled to avail themselves of forced labour, and probably the poverty of the mass of the people was great. The inscriptions indicate a considerable amount of intellectual culture and scientific knowledge on the part of the priests and scribes. The religion was polytheism, the multitude of divinities, each with many names and titles, rendering it very difficult to obtain a clear notion of the religious ideas entertained. The sculptures obtained show human-headed and winged lions and bulls, sphinxes, winged globes, and other instances of an intricate symbolism. The historical tablets depict chiefly scenes of warfare and hunting exploits, and from the figures of animals now only found far to the east of the Tigris, it would appear that incursions on a large scale into foreign countries were frequent. A more copious description of the arts, sciences, and history of the country will be given under the heading NINEVEH.

AST, GEORGE ANTHONY FREDERICK, German philosopher and scholar. He was of the school of Schelling, and wrote numerous works on philosophical and philological subjects, and edited a complete edition of the works of Plato.

Born at Gotha, 1778; died at Munich, 1841.

ASTAFFORT, as-taf-for', a French town, department of Lot-et-Garonne, on the right bank of the Gers. It is surrounded by decayed walls and bastions. It was founded by the English, and its name is supposed to be a corruption of Stafford. Pop. 2,500.

ASTARLOA, Y. AGUIRRE, DON PABLO Pedro de, Spanish author and philologist, who held an ecclesiastical benefice at Durango. He mastered 60 languages, especially devoting attention to the Basque. He was a man of enlarged mind and great information.

Born at Durango, 1752; died at Madrid, 1806.

ASTER, ăs-ter, a dexterous archer of Amphipolis, who offered his services to Philip, king of Macedonia. Upon being slighted, he retired into the city which Philip was besieging, and aimed an arrow, on which was written, "For Philip's right eye." It struck the king's eye, and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleasantry, threw back the same arrow, with these words, "If Philip takes the town, Aster shall be hanged." The conqueror kept his word.

ASTERABAD, or ASTRABAD, as-ter-a-bad', a town of Persia, capital of a province of the same name, situate on the shore of the Caspian Sea, at the mouth of the Gourgan, which forms a convenient bay for shipping. Its trade is chiefly confined to horses and cattle, which are given in exchange for various articles of necessity brought by way of the Caspian Sea. The climate is so unhealthy that the town has been named the City of the Plague. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 36° 50′ N. Lon. 54° 25′.

ASTERIUS, sophist and teacher of rhetoric in Galatia. He was converted to Christianity, but relapsed, and was afterwards re-admitted to the church. He is best known as a defender of the Arian doctrines.

Lived in the early part of the 4th century.

ASTI, as-te', a large town of Italy, in the province of Alessandrio (Piedmont), on the Tanaro, 26 miles from Turin. It is well built, and contains a Gothic cathedral, dating from the 14th century, and many churches and monastical institutions. Manf. Chiefly woollen goods, paper, and hats, and an active trade is carried on in corn and wine. The country around is said to produce the best wines in Piedmont. Pop. 32,734.—In the middle ages this place was celebrated for its commercial industry and enterprise, and was one of the most powerful republics of northern Italy. It was famous for its hundred towers, of which some are now standing. Here Alfieri was born. (See ALFIERI.)

ASTON, a busy suburb of Birmingham. (See BIRMINGHAM.)

ASTON, SIR ARTHUR, ăs'-ton, a commander in the service of Charles I., who commanded the dragoons at the battle of Edgehill, and thrice defeated the earl of Essex. He was successively governor of Reading and Oxford. Having the misfortune to break his leg, he was obliged to have it amputated. After the execution of the king, he served in Ireland, and was appointed governor of Drogheda, on the taking of which by Cromwell, he had his brains beaten out with his wooden leg.

Died 1649.

ASTOR, JOHN JACOB, a wealthy merchant, son of a German peasant. At the age of twenty he went to the United States, and realised an immense fortune. In 1811 he founded a settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river, on the west coast of America, for the purpose of developing the fur trade. The place was named, after him, Astoria, and Washington Irving wrote a work on the subject. He was the greatest landowner in New York city, and founded the Astor Library.

Born at Walldorf, near Heidelberg, 1763; died at New York, 1848.

ASTORGA, as-tor'-ga, a walled town of Spain, of great antiquity, on the Tuento, in the province of Leon. It is the see of a bishop, and contains a Gothic cathedral, several parish churches, and other religious houses. Manf. Linen and cloth yarn. Pop. about 4,500.

ASTORGA, EMMANUELE D', Italian musical composer, author of a much admired Stabat Mater, and many other works. He was the son of a baron of Sicily, who suffered death for his attempts to liberate his country from the Spaniards.

Born at Palermo, 1686; died 1755.

ASTRACAN, or ASTRAKHAN, ăs-tra-kăn', a province of European Russia, in the government of Caucasus, lying on the N.W. of the Caspian Sea, and having the Maloi Uzan for its N.E. boundary, and the Manitch for its S.W. The Volga divides it into two nearly equal parts. Ext. 370 miles long, and 250 broad at its widest part. Area, estimated at 85,000 square miles. Desc. A vast sterile steppe or desert. Judging by the saline nature of its soil, it would seem at some former period, to have been submerged by the Caspian. Climate. One of extremes: winter shows 13°, and summer 70° of Fahrenheit. Pop. 790,338. Lat. between 45° and 50° N. Lon. between 43° 30′ and 51° E.

ASTRACAN, an archiepiscopal city, and the capital of the above province, is situate on an island about 30 miles from the mouth of the Volga, which discharges itself into the Caspian Sea. The old buildings of the city are chiefly of wood. Of the public ones, the most conspicuous are two commercial halls, for the reception and sale of merchandise, one for the Tartars, the other for the Persians. The modern houses are in general built of brick, or of a kind of freestone. The town consists of three parts, the Kremlin; the Belogorod, or white town, where are the Government buildings; and the Llobodeo, where the bulk of the population reside. The Kremlin stands on a hill, and contains the cathedral, a spacious brick edifice. There are many Russian churches and other houses for religious purposes, built by the various sects or denominations who form the population.

Manf.—Cotton, leather, silk, shagreen, gunpowder; and there are extensive salt-works in the neighbourhood.

Exp.—Among these may be enumerated fish, pig and bar iron, cochineal, and some indigo; woollen and linen cloths, Russia leather, brocades, taffetas, satin, and foreign velvets.

Imp.—Raw and spun cotton, and stuffs of the same material; raw and manufactured silk, shawls from Tibet and Cashmere, and some furs. There is a considerable trade in jewels; oriental turquoises are sold in great numbers, and at low prices, by the Astracan merchants; and the Indians deal in rubies and emeralds. The chief traffic with Persia is carried on by Armenians. The sturgeon fishery in the Volga is a most profitable industry.

Population 69,319.
Lat. 46° 21′ N. Lon. 48° E.
History—

The town was anciently the capital of a kingdom of the Tartars, who were expelled by the Russians	1554
Unsuccessfully besieged by the Turks	1569
Plundered by the Persians	1719

ASTUDILLO, as-too-dil'-lo, a town in Spain, province of Leon. It is surrounded by a wall. There are no public buildings of importance. Manf. Cloth-weaving, dyeing, shoe-making, and tanning. Pop. 4,000.

ASTURA, as-too'-ra, a maritime village of Italy, at the mouth of the river Astura, 40 miles from Rome. Pop. 300.—We notice this place on account of the historical celebrity which attaches to it. It has a small harbour and a high tower which is supposed to stand on the site of the villa of Cicero, and near which he was slain by order of Antony, B.C. 43. In 1268, after the battle of Tagliacozzo, Conradin, the last of the Hohenstauffen family, was here betrayed.

ASTURIA, or ASTURIAS, as-too're-a, one of the ancient provinces of Spain, near Oviedo. (See OVIEDO.)—The eldest son of the king of Spain takes the title of prince of Asturias, and bears the arms of the country.

ATACAMA, a-ta-ka'-ma, a district of South America, partly belonging to Chili and partly to Bolivia, embracing a large part of the coast-line on the Pacific, between lat. 21° and 25° S., the twenty-fourth parrallel being the line of demarcation. (See CHILI and BOLIVIA.)

ATAHUALPA, a'-ta-hoo-al'-pa, the last of the incas of Peru. His father dying in 1529, he became king of Quito, and his brother Huascar obtained the throne of Peru. A war broke out between them, in which Huascar was defeated. About this time the Spaniards, headed by Pizarro, invaded Peru, and had a conference with Atahualpa, who refused to accept the Christian religion, and charged the Spaniards with cruelty. A massacre of the Peruvians was the result, the king being taken prisoner. The inca offered as a ransom, to fill a room full of gold; but after the Spaniards had received the treasure, they strangled the unhappy monarch.

Died 1533.

ATALANTA, in mythology, a nymph famous for her skill in hunting and wrestling.—Another Atalanata, according to the legends of Bœotia, was so swift of foot that she would only marry the man who could outstrip her in a race, a feat achieved by a trick by Hippomenes. Having offended Aphrodite, they were both transformed into lions.

ATBARA, the Bahr-el-Asmad, or Black River, rising in the mountains of Abyssinia, and uniting with several other streams that flow into the Nile at El-Damer, in Nubia.

ATE, ai'-te, in mythology, daughter of Jupiter, and the goddess of evil. She raised such jealousy and sedition in heaven among the gods, that Jupiter dragged her away by the hair, and banished her for ever from heaven, and sent her to dwell on earth, where she incited mankind to wickedness, and promoted discord among them.

ATH, or AETH, at, a town of Belgium, in Hainault, on the river Dender, 13 miles from Mons. There are an old tower, built in the 12th century; a church remarkable for the height of its spire; a college founded in the 15th century, an old town-house, and other good public buildings. Manf. Linen, lace, cotton, soap, sugar, beer, and trinkets. Pop. 8,300. There are, besides, several bleach-fields and iron-works. Ath was ceded to France by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1668, and then pretty regularly fortified by Vauban; it was restored, however, to the Spaniards, by the treaty of Nimeguen, in 1678. The French took it in 1697, but in the same year it was restored by the peace of Ryswick. The allies took it October 1, 1706; and Ath remained in the possession of the Dutch till the year 1716, when it was given up to the emperor of Austria, with the rest of the Spanish Netherlands. It was captured by the French in 1745, and dismantled, but restored by Maria Theresa in 1748. The fortifications were finally demolished in 1820.

ATHABASCOW, ă-tha-băs'-ka, a lake in the N.W. of North America. It is 230 miles in length, and in some parts 30 miles wide. Lat. 59° N. Lon. 110° W.

ATHALIAH, ath-a-li'-ah, wife of Jehoram, king of Judah, who, after the death of her son Ahaziah, caused the male members of the royal house of Judah to be killed. Her youngest grandson, Joash, escaped, and six years afterwards Athaliah was put to death. Her history is related in 2 Kings, xi., and 2 Chron., xxii., and forms the subject of a tragedy by Racine, and musical compositions by Handel and Mendelssohn.

Died 878, B.C.

ATHANASIUS, ă-tha-nas'-she-us, archdeacon of Alexandria, who distinguished himself so much at the council of Nice, that, on the death of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, he was chosen to succeed him. He had been greatly opposed by the Arians before his consecration, and now their efforts against him were redoubled, as he refused to admit their leader into the church. (See ARIUS.) They raised against him various accusations, and at length procured his banishment. On the death of the emperor he returned to Alexandria, where he was received with great joy. When Constantine came to the throne, his enemies again prevailed; on which he fled to Rome, where Pope Julius espoused his cause, and caused him to be reinstated in his bishopric. At the end of the emperor Julian's reign, he was driven into exile again; but, on the accession of Jovian, he was restored.

Born at Alexandria, 297, died 373.

ATHBOY, ăth-boy, the "yellow ford," a town of Ireland, in Meath, 6 miles from Trim. Area, 11,884 acres. Pop. 1,826.

ATHELSTAN, ăth'-el-stan, king of England, was the son of Edward the Elder, whom he succeeded in 925. He obtained a great victory over the Danes in Northumberland, in 937, after which he reigned in tranquility. He greatly encouraged commerce by conferring the title of Thane on every merchant who had made three voyages.

Born 895; died at Gloucester, 940.

ATHENA, a-the-na, in Greek mythology, the goddess of wisdom; otherwise known as Pallas Oppa, Glaucopis (owl-headed), and Hippia (tamer of horses), and by the Romans as Minerva.

ATHENÆUS, ă-the-nē'-us, a Greek grammarian, who wrote a work entitled the "Table-talk of the Sophists," showing the results of most extensive reading, quotations being made from about 800 authors; published by Casaubon in 1657.

Born at Naucratis, Egypt, in the 3rd century.

ATHENAGORAS, a Greek writer, who defended the early Christians against the imputations made upon them. He is supposed to be the author of a discourse on the resurrection of the dead.

Lived in the 2nd century.

ATHENAIS. (See EUDOCIA.)

ATHENODORUS, a Stoic philosopher, tutor to the emperors Augustus and Tiberius, and much esteemed for his virtue.

Born at Tarsus in the 1st century.

ATHENRY, an old town of Ireland, in the county of Galway. There are traces of an old monastery, of walls, and a castle. Pop. about 3,000.

ATHENS, the capital of the modern kingdom of Greece, and which shared with Rome the honour of being the most famous city of antiquity, as it was unquestionably the most beautiful, is built on a peninsula formed by the junction of two streams, the Cephesis and Ilissus, about four miles inland from the western shore of the Gulf of Egina. The harbour is the famous Piræus, now Porto Leone or Drako. The modern city (which has been much improved since 1834, when the new kingdom of Greece was established), lies chiefly at the base of the great hill, the Acropolis, on and around which were erected the principal of the splendid edifices which were regarded as wonders of the world. Many of the narrow dirty streets of the Turkish town have given place to broad, handsome thoroughfares, the principal being Hermes street, running from west to east, and crossed at right angles by Athena and Rolus streets. Stadium street is also a good thoroughfare; but the other streets are generally narrow and winding. At the eastern extremity of Hermes street is the Royal Palace, a large building of Pentelic marble on the summit of a small eminence. It was completed in 1843. The University and the Chamber of Deputies are in Stadium street. The University has 52 professors, including many scholars and archæologists of great eminence, and over 1,000 students. There are a gymnasium, archæological museum, and a public library. A railway connects the town with the Piræus. The municipal affairs of Athens are arranged by a demarchos, whose functions are analogous to those of a mayor, and a council elected by the citizens. Very little trade is carried on in the town; but the harbour of the Piræus, or Porto Leone, is frequented by ships of all nations. Such is a brief description of the modern town; but the chief interest of Athens is derived from its ancient splendour and the place which it occupies in the history of the world, as the centre of intellectual cultivation, art, philosophy, and literature; renowned for its marvels of architecture and sculpture, and for the number of illustrious men who made it memorable. We must endeavour in a few lines to point out some of the leading features of the topography of the ancient city as it appeared shortly before the Christian era; for the marvellous buildings were the growth of many centuries. The original town or citadel occupied the summit of a rock, about 1,000 feet long, 500 broad, and 150 feet high, but gradually, as population increased, the town spread into the plain at the foot. On the summit of the Acropolis was the Parthenon, erected by order of Pericles, on the site of an older temple destroyed by the Persians, and completed 438 B.C. It was 278 feet long, 98 broad, and 65 high, in the Doric style. The sculptures of the east and west pediments, and the frieze representing a grand procession, which ran round the building, chiefly the work of Phidias, are considered to have been the finest specimens of Greek sculpture. Many of them, and casts of others, are now in the British Museum. In front of the magnificent edifice was the statue, by Phidias, of Athena Promachus, or the warlike, 46 feet high, of ivory, richly decorated with gold, the gleam of the helmet and spearhead being visible from the sea. Opposite the Parthenon, on the northern edge of the Acropolis, was the Erechtheium, a smaller, but very beautiful temple, of the Ionic order of architecture, containing temples of Athena and Poseidon, and supposed to mark the spot where they contested for the guardianship of the town. The Propylæa, or vestibules giving access on the western side of the Acropolis, formed a superb building of Pentelic marble, considered a triumph of architecture, and spoken of most enthusiastically by Greek and Latin writers. A rocky hill, opposite the western end of the Acropolis, was the Areopagus, or Mars Hill, where St. Paul preached to the Athenians. On the south of the town was the most splendid of all the Athenian edifices—the temple of Zeus Olympius, the foundations of which were laid by Pisistratus, but it was not completed till 130 A.D., 700 years afterwards. It was 354 feet long, 171 broad, and in it was the ivory and golden statue of Zeus, by Phidias. There were 120 fluted columns on the exterior. On the north-west of the city was the temple of Theseus, built in the 5th century before the Christian era. It was in the Doric style, and like most of the public buildings, of white Pentelic marble. Separated from the Areopagus by a narrow valley was the Pnyx Hill, a place of public assembly, forming two terraces. On the south-east slope of the Acropolis was the Dionysaic theatre, and farther east another theatre, the Odeium. From the neighbourhood of these theatres ran the street of Tripods, so named from the number of small votive shrines bearing the bronze tripods which had been gained as prizes in the musical contests. In the city were the octagonal Temple of the Wind, and the Gymnasium built by Ptolemæus, about 200 B.C.; and on the south bank of the Ilissus was the Stadium, or place for athletic contests, with tiers of marble seats accommodating 40,000 spectators. Athens was enclosed by walls, which were extended to Munychia (Port Stratiotiki) and the Piræus, two of the harbours belonging to Athens. At the Piræus were several temples and two theatres. At the most flourishing period of its history, ancient Athens had a population of 200,000, of whom more than 20,000 were free citizens.

Remains of the Ancient City.—Eight columns, several colonnades, and the pediment, deprived of nearly all its sculptures, remain of the Parthenon; some columns and gateway of the Propylæa, and some portions, especially the female figures, the Caryatides, of the Erechtheum, still surmount the Acropolis. Sixteen fine Corinthian columns remain of the temple of Zeus Olympus. The temple of Theseus is the best preserved of all the remnants of the ancient city. It was used for a Christian church, dedicated to St. George, and is now the national museum. The large semicircular area of the Pnyx retains probably nearly all its original features. The octagonal Temple of the Winds, or Horologium, is in good preservation; there are some fragments of the Gymnasium of Ptolemæus, of the great Thesean wall, and of the two theatres, and in the street of Tripods, the monument of Lysicrates alone remains of the many memorials of distinguished men which adorned the favourite promenade of the ancient Athenians. On the Areopagus, where Paul preached, is a Turkish burial place; a few stones mark the site of the Lyceum, in the garden attached to which Aristotle walked with his pupils; and a modern house and garden are on the spot where Plato taught, in the Academy.

Pop.—The inhabitants of modern Athens number nearly 50,000, exclusive of the population of the port of the Piræus, about 10,000.

History.—Athens was founded by Cecrops, who was either a native of Attica or Egypt, about 1556 B.C. His successors, amongst the most famous of whom were Erechtheus and Theseus, reigned for a period of nearly 500 years, Codrus being the last king of Athens. (See CODRUS.) On his death, in 1070, the government was administered by magistrates or archons; and under them we do not hear much of Athens until the time of Solon, 594 B.C., one of the seven wise men of Greece. (See SOLON.) This great lawgiver effected vast reforms, and Athens rose to such a prominent position, that Sparta, and other states of Greece, became jealous of her eminence, when the appearance of the Persians caused them to turn their attention to the common foe, who, at the great battle of Marathon, 490 B.C., were completely defeated by the Athenians. In 480 B.C., Xerxes, with an immense army, invaded Greece, and though, for a time, his progress was delayed by Leonidas at Thermopylæ, yet he made his way to Athens, which he burnt, and from which the inhabitants were compelled to flee. At Salamis, however, 480 B.C., the Athenians and other Greeks obtained a great naval victory over the Persians, and Xerxes retreated into Asia. His general Mardonius was also defeated at the battle of Platea. Themistocles now rebuilt and extended the city, and the state rose to a great height of power and influence, when, in the time of Pericles, 431 B.C., the Peloponnesian war commenced, in which Sparta and the combined Greek states were banded against Athens. For twenty-seven years the struggle was continued with various success, until, in 404 B.C., the city was forced to yield, and never recovered its former supremacy, although the Athenians ceased not to cultivate those arts which have rendered them immortal. In 87 B.C., the Romans, under Sylla, took Athens by assault, demolished the fortifications, and inflicted a final blow on its commerce. It was afterwards ravaged by the Goths, and in 1204 was given to Venice, and continued in the possession of the Christians till 1456, when it was seized by Mahomet II. Under the dominion of the Turks it fell into comparative insignificance, and in 1827, being occupied by the insurgent Greeks, it was bombarded by the sultan's troops, and much injured. In 1832 Greece was erected into an independent kingdom under Otho, son of Louis of Bavaria, and in 1835 Athens became the seat of the Greek government, hitherto held at Nauplia.

ATHENS, a county in Ohio, United States. Area, 740 square miles. Desc. Fertile, though hilly, and containing bituminous coal and salt-works. Pop. 28,411.

ATHENS, the capital of the above county, situated on the Hocking river, and the seat of the Ohio University.

ATHENS, the capital of Clarke county, Georgia, United States, on the Oconee river, the seat of the Georgia University, founded 1801. It is the centre of a large cotton-growing district. Pop. 6,099.

ATHERSTONE, ăth'-er-stun, a market-town of Warwickshire, 12 miles from Coventry. A new Corn Exchange has been recently erected. Manf. Ribbons and hats. There are quarries and collieries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 14,390.—It is a station on the London and North-Western Railway.

ATHERTON, or CHOWBENT, ăth'-er-tun, a township of Lancashire, 7 miles from Newton. Manf. Cotton, and in its neighbourhood are some large collieries and iron-works. Pop. 12,602.—It is a station on the Bolton and Kenyon Railway.

ATHLONE, ăth-lone', "ford of the moon," a market-town and parliamentary borough of Ireland, partly in Westmeath and partly in Roscommon, on the Shannon, by which it is intersected, 76 miles W. of Dublin. Its opposite sides are connected by a bridge erected in 1844. A fine Roman Catholic church, dedicated to St. Mary, was opened in 1861; and there is a handsome Gothic Presbyterian church on the New Quay. On the Roscommon side is the castle, the older parts of which date from the time of King John. It is strongly fortified in the modern style. Manf. Soap, and leather and woollen goods. It has several distilleries, breweries, and flour-mills; and carries on a considerable trade with Dublin by means of the Grand and Royal canals, and with Shannon harbour by Limerick steamers. There is a valuable fishery on the river. The town, however, derives its principal support from the garrison, it being the military head-quarters for the west of Ireland. There are stations of the Midland, Great Western, the Great Southern and Western, and the Great Northern lines. Pop. 6,755. Lat. 53° 25′ N. Lon. 7° 56′ 29″ W.—Athlone forms the great pass between Leinster and Connaught, and in 1691 was taken by General Ginkell from the army of King James. It gave the title of earl in the Irish peerage to the family of Ginkell.

ATHOL, ATHOLE, or ATHOLL, ath-ole, a district comprising the N. part of Perthshire, Scotland. Area, 450 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and highly picturesque. In it the celebrated mountain Cairn Gower attains a height of 3,690 feet, and many thousands of red deer still inhabit the forests of Athol. The pass of Killiecrankie, in which Grahame of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, fell in 1689, is in this district. Athol gives the title of duke to the ancient house of Murray.

ATHOL, a town of Massachusetts, U.S., 35 miles from Worcester, and 72 from Boston.

ATHOS, ai'-thos, a mountain of Macedonia, projecting like a promontory into the Ægean Sea, with an elevation of 6,780 feet. When Xerxes invaded Greece, he made a trench of a mile and a half in length at the foot of this mountain, into which he brought the sea-water, and passed his fleet through it. Vestiges of this canal have been found. Athos is now called Monte Santo, and the district is famous for the number of monasteries and hermitages, some of them the oldest in Europe. There are more than 900 churches and chapels, and some most ancient and valuable manuscripts are preserved there. No woman is permitted in the precincts of the mountain. Lat. 40° 16′ N. Lon. 24° 10′ E.

ATHY, ă'-thy, the "western ford," a town of county Kildare, Ireland. It stands on the Barrow, on an arm of the Grand Canal, 34 miles S.W. of Dublin. There are three Protestant and two Roman Catholic churches. Pop. 4,510. It is a station on the Great Southern and Western Railway of Ireland.

ATINA, ă-tī'-na, an Italian town, province of Terra di Lavoro. There are a cathedral and convent, and many ancient remains, including an aqueduct. It was, under the Romans, a place of considerable importance. Pop. 5,000.

ATLANTA, ăt-lan'-ta, the capital of Georgia, United States, 7 miles from the Chattahoochee river, at an elevation of 1,100 feet above the sea. It was incorporated as a city in 1847, and is now the centre of a large trade in grain and cotton. There are about 30 churches, three colleges, a university for coloured students, and a State library. Manf. Cast-iron, flour, and tobacco, and there are large engineering works. Pop. 37,409.

ATLANTIC OCEAN, ăt-lăn'-tik, taking its name from Mount Atlas, in Africa, lies between the continents of Africa and Europe, and the continent of America. On one side of the equator it is called the North Atlantic Ocean, and on the other, the South Atlantic Ocean. The length of the ocean basin, from the Arctic to the Antarctic circles, is about 8,700 miles. Between Greenland and Norway, the western and eastern boundaries are less than 900 miles apart. Between Florida and the coast of Morocco, the breadth is about 3,900 miles, and the distance is about the same between Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope; but between the most easterly point of Brazil and Sierra Leone in Africa, the width is not more than 1,600 miles. In no part has a greater depth than four miles been ascertained.

ATLAS, ăt'-las, an extensive and lofty chain of mountains, stretching through the greater part of Barbary, and dividing most of its cultivated territory from the vast desert of sand which fills the greater part of central and northern Africa. The mountains which form the eastern boundary of the empire of Morocco are by far the loftiest part of this chain. (See AFRICA.)

ATLAS, one of the Titans, son of Iapetus and Clymene.

ATOLL, or ATOLLAN, a'-tol, a name applied to several groups of coral islands, composing the Maldives, in the Indian Ocean. Lat. between 0° 45′ and 7° 6′ N. Lon. between 72° and 73° E.

ATOOI, or TAUAI, a-too'-e, one of the largest Sandwich Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean. Area, 500 square miles. The chief ports are Waimea and Hanalei. Lat. 21° 57′ N. Lon. 159° 40′ W. Pop. 10,000.

ATRANI, a-tra'-ne, a maritime town of Naples, 1 mile from Amalfi, on the Gulf of Salerno. Manf. Principally woollens and maccaroni. Pop. 3,000.

ATRATO, a-tra'-to, a large river of New Granada, S. America, which, after a course of about 250 miles, enters the Gulf of Darien, by nine mouths, to the W. of the Bay of Choco. It is navigable to within 140 miles of its source. It disembogues itself at Lat. 8° 10′ N.; Lon. 77° 0′ W.

ATREUS, a'-tre-us, a son of Pelops, by Hippodamia, daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, was king of Mycenæ, father of Agamemnon and Menelaus.

ATRIA, or ATRI, a'-tri-a, an Italian town in the province of Abruzzo Ulteriore I., 18 miles S.E. of Teramo, is situated on a steep mountain, five miles from the Adriatic. It is the see of a bishop, and there are a cathedral and several convents. It was the ancient Hadria, once a great commercial port, and remains of the ancient city have been discovered. Pop. 10,000.

ATRIDÆ, a-tri'-dæ, a patronymic given by Homer to Agamemnon and Menelaus, as being the sons or descendants of Atreus.

ATRIPALDA, at-ri-pal'-da, an Italian town, province of Avellino. There is a collegiate church. Manf. Cloth, paper, nails, iron, and copper. A large trade in pork is carried on. Pop. 3,800.

ATROPOS, ăt'-ro-pos, in Greek mythology, one of the Parcæ, daughters of Nox and Erebus. According to the derivation of her name, atrepos, 'unchangeable,' she is inexorable, and her duty among the three sisters is to cut the thread of life, without any regard to sex, age, or quality. (See PARCÆ.)

ATTALA, at'-a-la, a county of the United States, in the middle of the state of Mississippi. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 119,988.

ATTAR FERID-UD-DIN, a famous Persian poet and mystic. He was murdered by the barbarians under Zengin-Khan.

Born 1119; died 1221.

ATTERBOM, DANIEL AMADEUS, a Swedish poet, Professor in the University of Upsala. As a lyric poet, his reputation is great.

Born in Ostergöthland, 1790; died at Upsala, 1855.

ATTERBURY, FRANCIS, ăt-er-bur'-e, an English prelate, who, after studying at Westminster school, was in 1681 elected to Christchurch, Oxford. In 1687 he took his degree of M.A., and in the same year vindicated the character of Luther against Obadiah Walker. He had for a pupil the Hon. Charles Boyle, afterwards earl of Orrery, whom he assisted in his controversy with Bentley respecting the spurious "Epistles of Phalaris." In 1691 he came to London, where his eloquence brought him into notice. He became chaplain to William and Mary, lecturer of St. Bride's, and preacher at the Bridewell chapel. In 1700 he engaged in a dispute with Dr. Wake on the rights of Convocation, and was presented with his doctor's degree by the university of Oxford; the same year he was installed archdeacon of Totnes. In 1704 he was promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, and in 1707, Bishop Trelawney appointed him canon residentiary of Exeter. In 1709 he had another dispute with Hoadly on passive obedience. In 1710 he assisted Dr. Sacheverel in drawing up his defence, for which the doctor left him a legacy. The same year he was chosen prolocutor of the lower house of Convocation. In 1712 he was made dean of Christchurch, and in the year following promoted to the bishopric of Rochester and the deanery of Westminster. The death of Queen Anne put a stop to further advancement. On the breaking out of the rebellion in Scotland, in 1715, he and Bishop Smalridge refused to sign the declaration of the bishops; besides which, Atterbury drew up some violent protests in the House of Lords. In 1721 he was apprehended on suspicion of being engaged in a plot to bring in the Pretender, for which he was committed to the Tower. Before his trial, he raised a difficulty as to whether he should appear in person or by counsel. This point produced a warm debate in the upper house. It was, however, ultimately decided that a bishop is not a peer of the realm, but only a lord of parliament, and that, therefore, the honour of the peerage could not be touched by his being tried before the Commons. He was then banished for life, and left the kingdom in June, 1723, for France, where he remained until his death. His remains were brought to England, and interred in Westminster Abbey, but no inscription marks his grave. Bishop Atterbury was a man of brilliant talents, and as a speaker, a preacher, and a vigorous political writer, has had few equals.

Born at Middleton, Bucks, 1662; died at Paris, 1732.

ATTICA, ăt'-i-ka, a country of Achaia, or Hellas, at the south of Bœotia, west of the Ægean Sea, north of the Saronicus Sinus, and east of Megara. It received its name from Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus, but was originally called Acte, which signifies "shore," and Cecropia, from Cecrops, the first of its kings. With Bœotia, Attica now forms a government or "nomarchy" of the kingdom of Greece. The most famous of its cities is Athens, with its port the Piræus, and the towns Megara and Marathon. Its chief mountains are Elatea and Oxea, respectively attaining the heights of 4,629 and 4,636 feet above the level of the sea. Pentelicus, famous for the beautiful white marble, used in the construction of the chief buildings of Athens, and Hymettus (famous in classical lore for honey), are of scarcely inferior elevation. It is watered by the Ilissus and Cephissus. Pro. Principally oil, honey, and marble. Pop. 185,364. Lat. between 37° 39′ and 38° 20′ N. Lon. between 23° 5′ and 24° 5′ E.

ATTICUS, ăt-i-cus, TITUS POMPONIUS, a Roman, who was descended from an ancient family, and whose manners were so affable that he preserved the good-will of opposite parties in times of the greatest dissensions. Whilst assisting Marius the younger in his schemes of ambition, he preserved the friendship of his adversary Sylla. In the contest between Cæsar and Pompey, he maintained the friendship of both these generals, as well as that of Brutus and of Antony. Notwithstanding, likewise, the contentions between Antony and Augustus, he enjoyed the esteem of both. He was greatly beloved by Cicero, and effected a reconciliation between him and Hortensius. Atticus never attempted to aggrandise himself, and to his moderation may be attributed the tranquillity and influence he enjoyed. Being attacked by an illness believed to be incurable, he voluntarily starved himself to death.

Born 109 B.C.; died 32 B.C.

ATTICUS, HERODES, a wealthy Athenian, and teacher of rhetoric. He built many splendid edifices at Athens, Corinth, Delphi, Thermophylæ, and other places, and restored many of the ruined cities of Greece. His great wealth caused jealousy, and he withdrew from Athens.

Born 104; died at Marathon, 180.

ATTILA, or ETZEL, ăt'-i-la, king of the Huns, who ascended the throne with his brother Bleda in 433, and afterwards caused his associate to be assassinated. He obliged Theodosius II. to sue for peace, and laid him under tribute. He invaded the eastern empire, and laid waste the country around Constantinople. In 451 he entered Gaul at the head of a numerous army, and committed great ravages. The imperialists, however, attacked him at Châlons, and after a bloody contest forced him to retreat. Having devastated the greater part of Italy, he retired, on condition that Valentinian should pay him a large sum of money. Soon after his return home he married a beautiful maiden, Hilda, and died the same night by the bursting of a blood vessel, and with him expired the empire of the Huns. Attila rejoiced in the name of the "scourge of God," and, expressing a wish to extend his conquests over the whole world, often feasted his barbarity by dragging captive kings in his train. His body, deposited in a golden coffin, cased by another of silver and a third of iron, was buried in the midst of a large plain; and, like that of Alaric, his grave was filled with the most magnificent spoils obtained by conquest and war. After the ceremony, the barbarous Huns, desirous of concealing the tomb of their monarch, slaughtered all those captives who had dug the grave.

Born 406; died 453.

ATTIRET, JEAN DENYS, at'-e-rai, a French painter attached to the Jesuit mission at Pekin, who, after completing his studies at Rome, went to China, and obtained the favour of the emperor Kien-Long. Amongst others of his works was a portrait of the emperor, surrounding whom were many of his distinguished officers, some of whom had to travel miles merely to have their likenesses taken.

Born at Dole, in Franche-Comté, 1702; died at Pekin, 1768.

ATTLEBOROUGH, a market-town in Norfolk, 15 miles S.W. of Norwich. St. Mary's Church is a fine cruciform structure, the greater portion dating from the 15th century. A corn-market hall has been recently erected. Pop. 2,324. A station on the Great Eastern Railway.

ATTOCK, or ATTOCK BENARAS, at-ok, a town and fort of the Punjaub, British India, on the Indus, where it becomes navigable, and is crossed by a bridge of boats 40 miles from Peshawur. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 33° 54′ N. Lon. 72° 20′ E. The fortress was built in 1581 by the emperor Acbar, and the town is supposed to be the ancient Taxila, fallen into decay, but is still a place of some importance, as it is on the route to Afghanistan, by way of the Khyber Pass.

ATTON, at-on, the largest of the Aleutian islands, in the Pacific Ocean. Ext. 70 miles long by about 30 broad. Desc. Volcanic and sterile Lat. 52° 58′ N. Lon. 172° 17′ W.

ATTOOR, at-oor, a town of Hindustan, in Barramaul, presidency of Madras, 70 miles from Pondicherry. Another in Dindigul, 6 miles from Dindigul.

ATTWOOD, THOMAS, ăt'-wood, an eminent musical composer, who, for the coronation of George IV., produced "The King shall rejoice," and for that of William IV., "O Lord, grant the King a long life," both of which were deservedly esteemed. He also composed a number of glees and songs of great merit. At the time of his death he was composer to the Chapels Royal, and organist of St. Paul's, and was buried in the vaults of the cathedral, under the organ which he was in the habit of playing.

Born in London, 1767; died 1838.

ATWOOD, an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher, educated at the university of Cambridge. Author of several treatises of great value. Mr. Pitt gave him a sinecure office.

Born 1745; died 1807.

ATWOOD'S KEY, four or five small islands among the Bahamas. The highest hill of the group is in lat. 23° 5′ N., and lon. 63° 43′ W.

ATZGERSDORF, atz'-gers-dorf', a town of Austria, 5 miles from Vienna. Manf. Principally chemicals. Pop. 2,000. It is a station on the railway from Baden to Vienna.

AU, ou, a market-town of Bavaria, in the circle of the Iser. Pop. 1,000. This is the name of several other small villages in Germany.

AUBAGNE, o-ban', a town of France, in Provence, department of Bouches-du-Rhône, 10 miles from Marseilles. Manf. Paper, earthenware, leather, and coarse cloth; and there are some tanneries. Pop. 7,000.

AUBE, obe, a river of France, rising in the department of the Upper Marne, and, after a course of 90 miles, falling into the Seine.

AUBE, a department of France, bounded N. by the department of the Marne, E. by that of Haute Marne, S.E. by that of the Côte d'Or, S.W. by that of the Yonne, and N.W. by that of the Seine-et-Marne. It comprehends part of the south of Champagne and a small part of Burgundy. Ext. 70 miles long from E. to W., and 54 from N. to S. Area, 2,317 square miles. Desc. In the north and north-west the surface is bare, but affords excellent sheep-pasture, and the flocks are numerous. In other portions of the department wood abounds, and the soil is in general fertile. As timber is dear, however, the houses of the peasantry are very inferior to those in other parts of France, being mostly built of turf, or sods dried in the sun, and their roofs covered with straw. The west of the department is soft and swampy. Forests. Clairvaux, Montmorency, Orient, and Soulaines. Rivers. The Seine, Aube, Ource, Troyes, the Yonne, and the Varines. Pro. All the usual cerealia, fruits, pulse, hemp, and considerable quantities of honey are gathered There are some large vineyards laid out, and excellent wine is produced. Towns. The chief are TROYES, ARCIS-SUR-AUBE, NOGENT-SUR-SEINE, BAR-SUR-AUBE, and BAR-SUR-SEINE. These are the capitals of the five arrondissements of which the department is composed. Manf. Cottons, hosiery, broadcloths, yarns, blankets, leather, straw hats, gloves, pottery, porcelain, glass, paper; and there are numerous distilleries, large beetroot-sugar factories, vinegar-yards, and dyeing and bleaching establishments. Pop. 255,000. Lat. between 47° 55′ and 48° 42′ N. Lon. between 3° 24′ and 4° 48′ E.

AUBENAS, obé-na, a town of France, department of the Ardèche, 14 miles from Privas. It is surrounded by an old wall, and there is an old Gothic castle, now occupied by the municipal authorities. Manf. Silk, woollen cloths, and paper. Two great silk fairs are held annually. Pop. 7,700.

AUBER, DANIEL FRANÇOIS ESPRIT, o-bair', a modern French musical composer, the son of a printseller, in which trade he was initiated, but which he did not long pursue. His abilities were originally displayed in the composition of small pieces; but he soon became known by more important productions, although his first operas, "Le Séjour Militaire" and "Le Testament et les Billetsdoux," were not at all successful. "La Bergère Châtelaine," however, produced in Paris 1820, was a complete success; and after that he rose gradually in public favour, discovering a marvellous facility of composition, and writing about forty operas in the same number of years. Auber's style is light and graceful, and amongst his best-known works are—"Fra Diavolo," "Le Cheval de Bronze," "Le Domino Noir," "Les Diamans de la Couronne," "L'Enfant Prodigue," and "Muetto de Portici," better known as "Masaniello." He wrote a march for the opening of the London International Exhibition of 1862. He succeeded Cherubini as director of the Conservatoire; was a member of the Institute, and a commander of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Caen, 1782; died 1871.

AUBIGNÉ, THEODORE AGRIPPA D', do-been'-yia, a celebrated French soldier and historian, greatly esteemed by Henry IV., who was desirous of advancing his fortunes. After the death of that monarch he retired to Geneva, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. His chief work is a Universal History, in 3 vols. folio, which was condemned by the parliament of Paris. His son, Constant d'Aubigné, was father of the celebrated Madame de Maintenon.

Born near Pons, in Saintonge, 1550; died at Geneva, 1630.

AUBIGNÉ, D. MERLE. (See D'AUBIGNÉ.)

AUBIGNY, or AVIGNE, o-been'-ye, a town of France, department of the Cher, 28 miles from Bourges. Manf. Chiefly woollens and hardware. Pop. 2,500. There are several small towns of this name in France.

AUBIN, o-ban', a town of France in the department of Aveyron. There are a church dating from the 12th century, and the ruins of an old castle. A great trade is carried on in sheep and iron-ware, and in the vicinity are extensive coal, sulphur, and alum mines. Pop. 8,800.

AUBIN, ST., aw'-bin, a small town in the island of Jersey, on the W. side of a beautiful bay of the same name, 4 miles from St. Heliers. There is an excellent pier here, running out from a rock, and above which is a fortress called St. Aubin's Castle. Pop. 2,500.

AUBREY, JOHN, aw'-bre, an English antiquary, who, in 1646, was entered of the Middle Temple, but did not continue the study of the law; and his means, which had been ample, began gradually to decline. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society; but, being reduced to poverty, was supported at the close of his life by Lady Long, of Draycot, in Wiltshire. His works are:—1. "Miscellanies, on Apparitions, Magic, Charms, &c.," 1696, and 1721, 8vo. 2. "A Perambulation of the County of Surrey," 1719, 5 vols. 8vo. Besides which he left several curious MSS. to the museum at Oxford, some of which were subsequently printed.

Born at Easton-piers, Wiltshire, 1626; died at Draycot, 1700.

AUBRIOT, HUGH, o'-bre-o, mayor of Paris, who built the Bastille, in 1369, it being intended as a fortification against the English. He being accused of heresy, was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment within the very building he had raised. In 1381 he was released by the Maillotins, a mob of insurgents who had risen against taxation, and named him as their chief; but, quitting them, he retired into Burgundy, where he died. Besides building the Bastille, he designed and improved many public edifices, bridges, and canals in Paris.

Died 1382.

AUBRY DE MONTIDIER, a French soldier, supposed to have been assassinated by his comrade, Richard de Macaire, in 1371. He is the hero of many dramatic compositions, founded on the details of the discovery of his murderer. Aubry's faithful dog persisted in pursuing and harrassing Macaire; and this coming to the ears of king Charles V., he ordered a combat to be tried between them. In this singular battle the dog was the victor; and he has been celebrated ever since in the play of the "Dog of Montargis," and the "Dog of Aubry, or the Forest of Bondy."

AUBRY DE LA BOUCHARDERIE, boo-shar'-de-re, Claude Charles, Count, an able French artillery officer, who, entering the army at an early age, was present at all the great battles on the Rhine, from 1792 to 1796. He afterwards joined Napoleon's army of Italy, and had the charge of the artillery during the perilous crossing of the Alps. Subsequently he served in St. Domingo; and, returning to France, performed great engineering feats with the army, and was present at the battle of Essling, where he was severely wounded. He accompanied Napoleon in the expedition to Russia, having the command of the artillery of the second division of the army, and greatly distinguished himself at Smolensko, Polotsk, and Beresina. At Lutzen and Bautzen, also, in 1813, he displayed great skill and bravery; and finally at Leipsic received his death-wound.

Born 1773; died 1813.

AUBURN aw'-bern, capital of Cayuga county, New York, U.S., and 174 miles from Albany. It has numerous mills and manufactories of cotton and woollen goods, agricultural implements, paper, and flour. Here is a very large prison conducted on the silent system. Pop. 21,924.

AUBURN, formerly Lisoy, a hamlet in Westmeath, 6 miles from Athlone, Ireland, remarkable as being the supposed scene of Dr. Goldsmith's poem entitled "The Deserted Village," which begins with the words, "Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain."

AUBUSSON, o-boos'-sawng, a town of France, on the Creuse, 20 miles from Guéret, in the department of the Creuse. Manf. Woollens, carpets, tapestry, yarns, velvets, and cotton thread. Pop. 6,600.

AUBUSSON, PIERRE D', grand master of the Knights of St. John, who, in 1480, vigorously repulsed the attack made upon the island of Rhodes by the Turks, and which was called the first siege of Rhodes, and lasted eighty-nine days. This was in the time of Mahomet II., who on this occasion is said to have had 9,000 slain and 15,000 wounded. Prince Zizim, brother of Bajazet, and son of Mahomet II., having escaped to Rhodes to avoid the vengeance of the sultan, d'Aubusson was, with much difficulty, prevailed on to deliver him to the pope; and for this and his other great services, both in the defence of Rhodes and in aid of the Christian religion against the Turks, he received a cardinal's hat. In 1501 he was appointed general of the united German and French armies against the Turks, and sailed to attack Mitylene, but the expedition failed.

Born at La Marche, 1423; died at Rhodes, 1503.

AUCH, or AUSCH, oshe, a town of France, capital of the department of the Gers, 42 miles from Toulouse. It has a very fine cathedral dedicated to St. Mary, founded in 1489, though not completed till the reign of Louis XV. The older part of the town is on the left bank of the Gers, on the steep slope of a hill, the upper and lower parts of the town being connected by long flights of steps. On the opposite side of the river is a considerable suburb, connected with the town by a bridge. The town, once the capital of Tuscany, is the seat of an archbishopric. There are a college, an agricultural society, a museum, and other public institutions, and a very fine prefecture, formerly the archiepiscopal palace. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics, leather, and hats; and there is a considerable trade in wine, and Armagnac brandy. Pop. 13,000. The town nearly occupies the site of the ancient Augusta Auscorum, the chief town of the Ausci.

AUCHMUTY, GENERAL SIR SAMUEL, awk-mu'-te, an American, who, in 1776, entered the British army as a volunteer under Sir William Howe, and was present at several actions during the first American war. In 1801, 1802, and 1803, he served in Egypt, and on his return to England, had the grand cross of the Bath conferred upon him. He subsequently commanded in South America, and on the 3rd October, 1807, attacked and took Monte Video, the Gibraltar of America, for which he received the thanks of both houses of parliament. In 1810 he sailed for India as commander-in-chief in the presidency of Fort St. George, and in 1811 commanded at the reduction of the island of Java. For this service he also received the thanks of both houses of parliament. On his return he was made a lieutenant-general, and subsequently a commander of the forces in Ireland.

Born in New York, 1756; died in Dublin, 1822.

AUCHTERARDER, awk-te-rar'der, a town of Scotland, 15 miles W.S.W. of Perth. In 1716 the town was burned by order of Prince Charles Edward Stuart. In more recent times, this parish originated the litigation between the Earl of Kinnoul and the Scotch Presbytery, regarding the Veto Act, the result of which being in favour of his lordship, led to the formation of the Free Church of Scotland. Near the town is an ancient castle. Pop. 2,599.

AUCHTERMUCHTY, awk-ter-muk'-te, a royal borough of Scotland, in the county of Fife, 8 miles W.S.W. of Cupar. Manf. Woollen shawls, and linen and cotton goods. Pop. 1,082. It is a station on the North British Railway.

AUCKLAND, BISHOP. (See BISHOP AUCKLAND.)

AUCKLAND, the most northern province of New Zealand, and occupying about one half of the northern island of the group. The greatest length is about 400 miles, and its greatest breadth 200 miles, but the shape is very irregular, and between Hauraki Gulf, on the east coast, and Manukau Harbour, on the west, near the town of Auckland, the distance is only 6 miles. There is a coast line of nearly 1,200 miles, and there are numerous good harbours. The surface of the country is very varied. There are several mountain ranges, extensive fertile plains, richly wooded tracts, large wastes and swamps, and in some parts the characteristics of a volcanic district. There is an active volcanic island in Hauraki Gulf. There are geysers, mud volcanoes, hot springs and lakes, especially Lake Taupo in the southern part of the province. The Kauri pine, the most valuable of the trees of New Zealand, sometimes attaining a height of 150 feet and a diameter of 15 feet, abounds in the northern part of the province. More than one half of the province is occupied by the native Maories. (See NEW ZEALAND.)

Area.—26,563 square miles.

Rivers.—There are numerous navigable streams. The chief river system is that of the Waikato, or "rushing water," which rises in Lake Taupo, and, after a course of about 35 miles, chiefly in a north-westerly direction, is joined by the Waipa ("peaceful water"), beyond which it turns in a westerly direction to the sea. The mouth is encumbered with sandbanks, which prevent the entrance of ships. Farther east the Waitoa, the Waino, and other streams, fall into an estuary south of the Hauraki Gulf, known as the Firth of Thames; and still farther east are the Whakatan and the Waikari, divided by the Te Whaiti range, at the northern extremity of which they unite and fall into the Bay of Plenty. The Waikaritabeki, rising in the little Lake Waikari, and some smaller streams, flow southward into the northern extremity of Hawke Bay.

Minerals.—Gold is known to exist in considerable quantities; and in the Thames district some of the gold fields are equal in richness to any in the world. There are plentiful coal supplies; and there are lead, iron, and tin.

Commercial Products.—The timber trade is rapidly increasing; the yearly export of wool is of the value of nearly £90,000. Kauri gum is a fossil deposit of great value, and nearly 4,000 tons are exported yearly; and phormium, or New Zealand flax, is also largely exported. The value of the gold annually exported is about £1,800,000.

Chief Towns. AUCKLAND, Tauranga, Ngaruawahia (or Newcastle), Shortland, and Grahamstown.

Pop. 99,451, in addition to which there are numerous aborigines, who cannot be accurately enumerated or stated usefully.

AUCKLAND, the capital of the above province, and the largest town in New Zealand, on a narrow isthmus separating Hauraki Gulf and Manukau Harbour, and on the southern shore of Waitemata Harbour, an inlet of the Firth of Thames. The city is most picturesquely situated, and its position for commercial purposes is equally good, as, in addition to the harbour of Waitemata, there is a western harbour, Manukau, the two being only 6 miles apart. There is a wharf, nearly the third of a mile in length, with facilities for the loading and discharge of vessels. The principal thoroughfares are Queen, Albert, Hobson, Shortland, Princes, Wyndham, Victoria, and Wellesley Streets. There are also numerous public buildings, of which the Government House, Post Office, Custom House, Government Offices, and the places of worship are the chief. These latter comprise the cathedral, several Church of England buildings, and chapels for all the leading Dissenting bodies. There are several banks and insurance offices. The suburbs of Auckland comprise the North Shore, East and West Newton, Parnell, and Epsom. In Parnell is the Auckland College and Grammar School. The Episcopal College is about 4 miles from the town. There is a well laid-out botanical garden in the "domain," and there are several public gardens and other places of amusement. The city is in telegraphic communication with all the chief centres of both islands by means of submarine cables laid in Cook's Straits. A railway connects Auckland with Onehunga on the Manukau harbour; and a railway to Waikato will bring the country for 80 miles south of Auckland into direct communication with it. The town was founded in 1840; became a burgh in 1851; and was the seat of the government of New Zealand until 1865, when Wellington was made the metropolis. Fires in Auckland have, unfortunately, been of not unfrequent occurrence. One in November, 1871, did considerable damage, and one in October, 1873, caused a loss of property to the value of 60,000*l*. Pop. Including the inhabitants of the suburbs, about 50,000. Lat. 36° 51′ S. Lon. 174° 50′ E.

AUCKLAND ISLANDS, a group lying to the S. of New Zealand, in the South Pacific Ocean. They are of volcanic origin, and well-wooded and fertile. Lat. 50° 24′ S. Lon. 166° 7′ E.

AUCKLAND, WILLIAM EDEN, Baron, English statesman, the third son of Sir Robert Eden. He entered the House of Commons as member for Woodstock in 1771; was plenipotentiary in Paris, in 1784, and negotiated a commercial treaty; and afterwards was ambassador to Spain. In 1789, he became a peer of Ireland, and in 1793 was raised to the British Peerage. He was postmaster general between 1798 and 1801. He wrote a treatise on the penal law, and several political pamphlets.

Born at West Auckland, Durham, 1744; died 1814.

AUCKLAND, GEORGE EDEN, Earl of, governor-general of India, second son of the preceding. Having held office as president of the Board of Trade and first lord of the Admiralty, he was appointed governor-general of India in 1835. The war in Afghanistan, which resulted in such disasters to the British troops, was entered upon by him, and caused him to be superseded in 1841. He was again appointed first lord of the Admiralty in 1846.

Born 1784; died 1849.

AUDÆUS, or AUDIUS, o-dé-us, a native of Mesopotamia, and church reformer, who was expelled from the Syrian Church for his censure of the irregular lives of the clergy, and was banished into Scythia, when he had many followers, and established the monastic system.

Died 370.

AUDE, ode, a river of France, which rises in the Eastern Pyrenees, and after a course of 90 miles, falls into the Mediterranean, 6 miles from Narbonne. It is connected with Narbonne and Cette by the canal of Narbonne.

AUDE, a maritime department of France, including the S.W. part of Languedoc. It has the department of the Hérault to the N.E., that of the Tarn to the N., the Mediterranean to the E., the department of the Eastern Pyrenees to the S., and that of the Ariège to the W. Ext. Eighty miles from E. to W., and 60 from N. to S. Area, 2,341 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected with numerous valleys running north and south, and highly productive. Near the coast are many large lagunes. Rivers. The principal are the Aude, of which there are thirty feeders; the Robive, and the Bère, which falls into the shore-lake of Sigean. Pro. Wheat, maize, millet, and barley. Both red and white wines are produced in considerable quantities, and chestnuts, walnuts, almonds, and olives are extensively cultivated. Great attention is paid to the rearing of bees, and large quantities of honey are collected. Minerals. Antimony, manganese, copper, silver, iron, and lead. Coal, gypsum, and marble of great beauty, in association with slate, and lithographic stone, are found. Manf. The principal are fine broad-cloth, leather, hosiery, paper, hats, combs, jet ornaments, and pottery. There are numerous flour-mills, saw-mills, distilleries, and iron furnaces and foundries. Towns. The chief are CARCASSONNE, LIMOUX, NARBONNE, and CASTELNAUDARY, which are the capitals of the several arrondissements of which the department is composed. Pop. 327,942. Lat. between 42° 40′, and 34° 30′ N. Lon. between 1° 41′ and 3° 13′ E.

AUDEBERT, JEAN BAPTISTE, ode-bair, a talented French naturalist, draughtsman, and engraver (originally a miniature painter), who excelled in elegant representations of animals. His productions in this respect are esteemed the most valuable of their kind.—His first performance was "l'Hist. Nat. des Singes, des Makis et des Galéopithèques," 1 vol. folio, 1800; a work which, from the general excellence with which it was produced, created a great sensation among naturalists. He was engaged upon other works of equal magnificence when he died.

Born at Rochefort, 1759; died 1800.

AUDENSHAW, awd'-den-shaw, a township in Lancashire, 5 miles from Manchester. Manf. Cottons, silks, and hats. Pop. 5,930. It is a station on the Sheffield Railway.

AUDIGUIER, VITAL D', o'-dé-gui-aire, a French author, the descendant of a noble, but poor family of Guienne. He attained some reputation in Paris by his novels, poems, and translations, which were specially noticed by the Academy; but he led a dissolute life, and was killed in a duel.

Born 1569; died 1624.

AUDLEY, JAMES, lord, awd'-le, an English knight, who distinguished himself under Edward III. in France, and was one of the first knights of the Garter. He was present at the battle of Poictiers, where he was so badly wounded, that his esquires were obliged to bear him from the field. For his services a pension was assigned him, and he was appointed constable of Gloucester castle, governor of Aquitaine, and seneschal of Poitou.

Born in Staffordshire, 1314; died at Fontenay-le-Comte, Poitou, 1369.

AUDLEY, or AWDELY, THOMAS, lord, chancellor of England, was born of a noble family in Essex, and in 1529 was chosen speaker of the parliament, in which capacity he was very subservient to Henry VIII., who, on the resignation of Sir Thomas More, gave him the seals, and the priory of Christchurch, with all its church plate and lands. He sat in judgment on his predecessor, Sir Thomas More, and on Bishop Fisher. In 1538 he was created Baron Audley, of Walden.—Audley appears to have been a mere tool of King Henry, and to have been rapacious in the seizure of Church property. He was a great benefactor to Magdalen College, Cambridge.

Born at Earl's Colne, Essex; died in London, 1544.

AUDOUIN, JEAN VICTOR, o'-doăn, a French entomologist and comparative anatomist, who added many important facts to the science of which he was an ardent investigator.

Born at Paris, 1797; died 1841.

AUDOUIN, FRANCIS XAVIER, took an active part in the French Revolution, was a member of the Jacobin Club, was ordered by the Directory to write the history of the Revolutionary War, and afterwards held office under Napoleon. Author of a work on the administration of the navy.

Born at Limoges, 1766; died 1837.

AUDRAN, o'-dra, the name of a family of French artists. Charles, the elder, produced a great many excellent works, known by a letter K.

Born at Paris, 1594; died 1673.

AUDRAN, CLAUDE, a nephew of the preceding, studied under his uncle. He was employed by Le Brun, in painting part of the pictures of Alexander's battles, at Versailles, and became professor of painting in the Royal Academy of Paris.

Born at Lyons, 1639; died at Paris, 1684.

AUDRAN, GÉRARD, the brother of the last-mentioned, and the most celebrated of the family, studied under Le Brun at Paris, and engraved that artist's pictures of Alexander's battles in a masterly manner.

Born at Lyons, 1640; died at Paris, 1703.

AUDRAN, CLAUDE, nephew of Gérard, became famous for painting ornaments. He was appointed king's painter.

Born at Lyons, 1685: died 1734.

AUDUBON, JOHN JAMES, aw'-doo-bon, a distinguished American naturalist, whose father was the first to inspire him with that love of natural objects with which his pursuits were to be afterwards so prominently associated. The study of birds especially became a passion with him; and, in order that he might become a good draughtsman, his father sent him, at the age of 15, to Paris, and placed him in the studio of the celebrated David. By his seventeenth year he had applied himself so diligently, that he had become a skilful artist, when he returned to his native country; and his father gave him a farm on the banks of the Schuylkil. Here ornithological studies employed a great deal more of his time than farming employments. He married, and continued to explore the American forests in search of new specimens of the feathered tribes to enlarge his collections; these excursions were prolonged to nearly fifteen consecutive years. Having removed to Louisville, he met Wilson, the celebrated Scotch ornithologist, whose conversation still added to his ardour in his favourite pursuits. In 1810, with his wife and child, he set out on an expedition down the Ohio; next went through Florida; and so continued, as long as he lived, to extend his knowledge of American birds. He visited England twice, and was everywhere received with the attention and distinction due to so truthful a naturalist. He became a fellow of the Zoological and Linnæan Societies in London; of the Natural History Society of Paris, and of numerous other societies of smaller note. His book on American ornithology is the largest and grandest that has ever been published.

Born in Louisiana, 1781; died at Minniesland, near New York, 1851.

AUENBRUGGER, or AVENBRUGGER, LEOPOLD, ow'-en-broog'-er, an eminent German physician, the inventor of percussion as a means of discovering diseases of the chest.

Born at Gratz, in Styria, 1722; died at Vienna, 1798.

AUERBACH, BERTHOLD, ow'-er-back, a popular German author. Being of a Jewish family, he first studied Jewish theology, but abandoned it for general literature. He wrote a life of Spinoza, and edited his works. His best known work is "Village Tales of the Black Forest."

Born at Nordstettin, 1812.

AUERBACH, a town of Saxony, circle Zwickau. Manf. Muslin, lace, needles, and paper. Pop. 3,600.

AUERSTADT, ow'-er-stat, a village of Prussian Saxony, 10 miles from Naumburg. On the 14th Oct., 1806, the Prussians were here defeated by the right division of the French army, under Davoust, on the same day that the battle of Jena was won by Napoleon with his left division. For his service on this occasion, Davoust received from Napoleon the title of Duke of Auerstadt.

AUGE, VALLEE D', ozhe, a county of France, in the department Calvados. The county is distinguished for producing the finest horses and cattle of Normandy.

AUGEEAS, or AUGEIAS, aw'-ge-as, in Greek mythology, son of Eleus, was one of the Argonauts, and afterwards ascended the throne of Elis. He had an immense number of cattle, and the stables in which they were kept had never been cleansed, so that the task seemed an impossibility. Hercules undertook it, on promise of receiving the tenth part of the herds of Augeeas. The hero changed the course of the river Alpheus, which immediately carried away the filth from the stables. Augeeas refused the promised recompense, on pretence that Hercules had made use of artifice, and had not experienced any labour or trouble. The refusal was considered as a declaration of war. Hercules conquered Elis, put to death Augeeas, and gave the crown to Phyleus. The proverb of the Augean stable is now applied to any arduous and difficult undertaking involving the removal of anything abominable.

AUGER, ATHANASE, ozh-ai, French scholar and historian. He took clerical orders, but devoted himself entirely to the study of Greek and Roman literature. When the Revolution broke out he wrote several pamphlets on the subject of constitutional liberty; and was also the author of educational manuals.

Born at Paris, 1734: died 1792.

AUGER, EDMUND, a French Jesuit, who is said to have converted 40,000 Protestants to the Roman communion by the force of his arguments.

Born 1530; died 1591.

AUGEREAU, PIERRE FRANÇOIS CHARLES, ozh'-e-ro, duke of Castiglione, and marshal of France, entered the French carabineers at 17, but subsequently became a soldier in the Neapolitan service. Having obtained his discharge in 1792, he volunteered into the revolutionary army of his country, and so rapidly distinguished himself, that when Napoleon invaded Italy, he considered Augereau one of his most daring and successful officers. At the bridge of Lodi he headed his brigade, and carried it in the face of the batteries of the enemy; he captured Bologna, and gave Lugo up to pillage and massacre, on account of the stout resistance which its inhabitants made to his arms. At Castiglione, Augereau covered himself with glory, and had the title of duke conferred on him. At Arcola he particularly distinguished himself, and had his bravery rewarded and acknowledged by the Directory. The coup d'etat of the 18th Fructidor, planned by Barras, was intrusted to his execution, and carried out with perfect success. For this service he had the command of the army on the German frontier given him; but, on account of the violence of his revolutionary principles, he was deprived of it and removed to Perpignan. When Napoleon returned from Egypt he was in Paris, but was slighted by that great general. In the campaign of Marengo he had the command of a division, and in 1804 was created a marshal. In 1806 he fought at Jena, and at Eylau commanded the left of the French. In this great battle he was suffering from a wound and from fever; but he had himself tied upon his horse, and remained to the last on the field. In 1809 and 1810 he commanded in Spain. In 1812, when Napoleon set out for Russia, he was left behind to form a corps of reserve at Berlin. In 1814 he was appointed to defend the south-east of France against the Austrians, but gave way before superior numbers. This irritated Napoleon, who viewed his conduct as approaching to treachery. On the fall of Napoleon, Augereau made his peace with the Bourbons, and was created a peer. On the return of the emperor from Elba he offered his services to Napoleon, but they were not accepted, and after Waterloo he sat on the council which condemned Marshal Ney. Soon after this his own life terminated.

Born in Paris, 1757; died 1816.

AUGIER, GUILLIAUME ARDOR EMILE, o-ge'-a, French dramatic poet, commander of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Valence, 1820.

AUGILA, aw'-ge-la, a district and town of Africa, on the route between Siwah and Fezzan. Lat. 29° 35′ N. Lon. 22° 25′ E.

AUGLAIZE, aw'-glaiz, a county of Ohio, U.S. Area, 396 square miles. Pop. 25,444. The Miami and Erie Canal intersects this county.

AUGSBURG, ougs'-boorg, an ancient city of Bavaria, capital of the circle of Suabia and Neuberg, at the conflux of the Lech and Wertach, 36 miles W.N.W. of Munich. The Catholics have several churches and monasteries, and the Lutherans have also several churches. The tower of St. Ulrie's church is 350 feet high. There are an academy, a lyceum, a picture gallery, museum, observatory, gymnasium, botanical gardens, and a polytechnic school. Of the public edifices, the cathedral (some portions dating from the 10th century), the town hall (a splendid building), the Fugger House, the bishop's palace, the Perlach tower, a belfry of considerable height, and the beautiful bronze fountains are worthy of attention. The "Fuggerei," built by the brothers Fugger, in 1519, consists of more than 100 small houses for the use of poor Roman Catholics. (See FUGGER.) Maximilian street is remarkable for fine buildings and breadth. Manf. Fine cotton, linen, silk, watches, jewellery, mathematical instruments, looking-glasses, tobacco, coloured papers, carpets, ribbons, chemicals; and there are considerable dyeing and bleaching works. A large trade is carried on in printing and bookbinding, and the celebrated Allgemeine Zeitung, the leading journal of Germany, is here published. Next to Frankfort, Augsburg is the most influential money-market on the continent. Pop. 65,476.—Here the celebrated "Augsburg Confession," which, under the auspices of Luther, was drawn up by Melanethon, was, in 1531, presented to the emperor Charles V. In 1806, Augsburg, by the treaty of Presburg, was merged into the dominions of Bavaria, and was surrendered by the French general René into the hands of his Bavarian majesty. It is the birthplace of Holbein, Holl, and other eminent artists. It is connected by railroads with Munich and Lindau, on Lake Constance; and northward with Nurnberg and Bamberg, whence a line runs north-east, connecting Bavaria with the Saxon and Prussian railway system; and another westward to Frankfort-on-the-Rhine.

AUGUSTA, capital of the State of Maine, United States of America, situated 43 miles from the mouth of the Kennebec river, on the right bank. The chief public buildings are the State House, asylum for the insane, and arsenal. The city suffered greatly from fire in 1865. Pop. 8,665. Lat. 44° 19′ N. Lon. 69° 50′ W.

AUGUSTA, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 860 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing the usual cerealia. Pop. 35,710.

AUGUSTA, the capital of Richmond county, Georgia, U.S., on the Savannah river, 127 miles from Savannah, and the centre of a cotton district. The streets are wide, and the public buildings handsome. Manf. Cotton, flour, and tobacco. The Augusta canal, constructed in 1815, supplies abundant water power. Pop. 21,891. It is a station of the Charleston and Milledgeville railway.

AUGUSTI, JOHN CHRISTIAN WILLIAM, a distinguished German theologian, of Jewish descent. He was an earnest Christian writer, and held successively professorial chairs at Jena, Breslau, and Bonn. His most important work is a "Manual of Christian Archæology."

Born at Eschenberga, near Gotha, 1772; died at Coblentz, 1841.

AUGUSTIN, JEAN BAPTISTE JACQUES, French miniature painter, who painted in admirable style most of the celebrities of his time.

Born at Saint Die, 1759; died at Paris, 1832.

AUGUSTINE, ST., aw-gus'-tine, a cape in Brazil, 25 miles from Pernambuco. Lat. 8° 21′ S. Lon. 34° 56′ W.—This was the first point of land in S. America discovered in 1500 by Penzon.

AUGUSTINE'S, ST., a port and river on the Labrador coast.—Also a number of small islands on the same coast.

AUGUSTINE, ST., (AURELIUS AUGUSTINUS), one of the fathers of the Christian church, who, although he had all the advantages of a good education, lived, when young, an irregular life, but studied much and exhibited great talents. In 371 his father sent him to Carthage, where he became a convert to the Manichees, and taught rhetoric with great reputation, but still continued his course of life, notwithstanding the great efforts his mother made to reclaim him. Wearied with his African life, Augustine removed to Rome, where he taught rhetoric with great applause, and was appointed its professor at Milan. Here the sermons of St. Ambrose effected his conversion; and, renouncing his heretical opinions, he was baptized in 387. The next year he returned to Africa, and was ordained a priest. He was at first the coadjutor of Valerius, bishop of Hippo, and afterwards his successor. He took a leading part in the great Pelagian controversy. His writings have always been held in veneration by the Catholic Church; and from them was formed that system commonly called scholastic divinity.

Born at Tagaste (Numidia), 354; died at Hippo, 430.

AUGUSTINE or AUSTIN, ST., the first archbishop of Canterbury, was a Benedictine monk of Rome, sent, about 596, by Gregory I., with forty others, to preach the gospel in England. On landing in Thanet, they informed King Ethelbert of their purpose, when the king assigned them Canterbury for their residence, with permission to exercise their function. The monarch himself embraced Christianity, but never attempted to bring over his subjects by force. Augustine was consecrated, at Arles, archbishop and metropolitan of the Church, and fixed his seat at Canterbury. He now endeavoured to convert the Welsh bishops to his tenets, but met with great opposition from them, and died without accomplishing his object.

Died at Canterbury, 607.

AUGUSTOVO, a city in Russian Poland, in the government of Suvalki, on the river Netta. Linen goods are manufactured, a considerable trade in cattle and horses is carried on. Pop. 9,300.

AUGUSTULUS, or ROMULUS AUGUSTUS, aw-gus'-tu-lus rom'-u-lus, the last of the Roman emperors in the West, was the son of Orestes, who, having deposed Julius Nepos, refused the throne for himself, but in 475 placed his son upon it. Shortly after, Odoacer, king of the Heruli, invaded Italy, slew Orestes, and deprived the young emperor of his dignity. He was, however, suffered to live a private life in Campania, and a pension of 6,000 pieces of gold annually was allowed him. With him ended the Roman empire in the West.

AUGUSTUS, CAIUS OCTAVIUS, aw-gus'-tus, second emperor of Rome, was son of Octavius, a senator, and Alia, niece to Julius Cæsar. He was born during the consulship of Cicero, and was adopted by Julius Cæsar, the greatest part of whose fortune he inherited. At the age of twenty he was made consul, and though his youth and inexperience were ridiculed by his enemies, yet he rose by his prudence and valour, and made war against them, on pretence of avenging the death of his uncle. With Antony and Lepidus he was triumvir. He waged, with success, five civil wars,—Mutina, Perusia, Philippi, Sicily, and Actium. The first and last were against M. Antony, the second against L. Antony, the brother of the triumvir. The third was against Brutus and Cassius, and the fourth against Sext. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. He united his forces with those of Antony at the battle of Philippi; but had he not been supported by the activity of his colleague, he would have been totally defeated in that engagement. In his triumvirate with Antony and Lepidus, he obtained the western parts of the Roman empire, and, like his two colleagues, more firmly to establish his power, he proscribed his enemies and cut them off. The triumvirate lasted ten years. He had given his sister Octavia in marriage to Antony, to cement their alliance; but when Cleopatra fascinated Antony, Octavia was repudiated. Augustus immediately took up arms, ostensibly to avenge the wrongs of his sister, but, perhaps, rather from a desire to remove a man whose existence and power kept him in continual alarm. Both parties met at Actium, 31 B.C., to decide the fate of Rome. (See ANTONY.) Augustus having established peace all over the world, he closed the gates of the temple of Janus, in the same year which saw the birth of our Saviour. He resolved to lay down the supreme power immediately after the victory obtained over Antony, on account of his failing health; but his two faithful friends, Mecœnas and Agrippa, dissuaded him, and observed that he would leave the empire the prey of the most powerful, and expose himself to the greatest dangers. He exercised supreme power in Rome for nearly half a century. He was an active ruler, and consulted the good of the Romans with the most anxious care. He visited all the provinces except Africa and Sardinia, and his consummate prudence and experience gave rise to many salutary laws. He is, however, accused of licentiousness; but the goodness of his heart, the fidelity of his friendship, and the many excellent qualities which the poets whom he patronized have, perhaps truly, celebrated, should be taken into account. He was ambitious of being thought handsome, and, as he was publicly reported to be the son of Apollo, he wished his flatterers to represent him with the figure and attributes of that god. He distinguished himself by his learning, was a master of the Greek language, and wrote some tragedies, besides memoirs of his life, and other works, none of which are extant. He married four times, but he was unhappy in his matrimonial connections, and his only daughter, Julia, disgraced herself and her father by the debauchery and licentiousness of her manners. He recommended at his death his adopted son, Tiberius, as his successor. Virgil wrote his scarcely-surpassed epic poem, the "Æneid," at the desire of Augustus. The name of Augustus, which was selected by Octavius as expressing all that was noble, venerable, and sacred, was afterwards given to succeeding Roman emperors.

Born at Rome, 63 B.C.; died 14 A.D.

AUGUSTUS I., elector of Saxony, reigned in general peace, and was, by some, esteemed a prince so wise as to be called the Justinian of Saxony. He greatly embellished Dresden, and built the splendid palace of Augustenburg.

Born at Freiburg, 1526; died 1586.

AUGUSTUS, FREDERICK II., king of Poland and elector of Saxony. To the former dignity he was elected in 1697, out of many competitors. He formed a strict alliance with Peter the Great against Sweden and Turkey; and from this time may be dated the origin of Russian influence in Poland. In his wars with Sweden he may be said to have been unsuccessful, although his troops gained some victories; and at length, completely defeated at Klissof, 1702, he was forced by Charles XII. to abandon his claim to the Polish throne. The Swedish monarch, however, being beaten by Peter at Pultowa, Augustus was reinstated, and continued in possession of his kingdom, although it remained in a state of great disorganization, from which it never recovered. Augustus was possessed of great personal beauty, and his physical strength was so great that he was popularly known as "the Strong." His habits were luxurious and licentious, and one of his many natural children was the famous Marshal Saxe.

Born at Dresden, 1670; died 1733.

AUGUSTUS, FREDERICK III., elector of Saxony and king of Poland, was the son of Augustus II. He was an indolent, idle, and pleasure-seeking prince, and his politics were entirely dependent on Russia. In 1755, he joined the alliance against Frederick the Great of Prussia, and by doing so gave rise to the disastrous Seven Years' War. His daughter Maria Josepha was married to the Dauphin of France, from which alliance sprung Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X.

Born at Dresden, 1696; died 1763.

AULDEARN, awl-dern, a village and parish of Scotland, in the county of Nairn, on the Moray Frith. Pop. 1,500.—Here, in 1645, Montrose gained a victory over the Covenanters.

AULUS, GELLIUS, awl'-lus, jel'-e-us, a Greek grammarian, whose "Noctes Atticæ," or Attic Nights, has gone through a variety of editions, and been translated into English by Mr. Beloe. Lived in the 1st century, during the reign of Trajan.

AUMALE, o'-mal, formerly Albemarle, a town of France, department of Seine Inférieure, on the Bresle, 13 miles from Neufchâtel. Manf. Earthenware, woollens, and yarns; the town has a trade in wool and cattle. Pop. 2,300.—Here, in 1592, a battle was fought between the Spaniards and Henry IV., in which the latter was wounded.

AUMALE, a town of Algeria, North Africa; an important military position, established by the French in 1846, on the site of a ruined Arab town. Pop. 1,500.

AUMALE, CHARLES DE LORRAINE, duc d', one of the leaders of the League, or Catholic party in Paris, after the assassination of the duke of Guise, in 1588. He was sentenced to be broken on the wheel for high treason by the parliament of Paris. The sentence was carried out in effigy in July, 1595.

Born 1554; died at Brussels, 1631.

AUMALE, HENRI EUGÈNE PHILIPPE LOUIS, duc d', fourth son of Louis Philippe, king of the French. He early entered the army, and served in Africa under the duke of Orleans and Generals Bugeaud and Baraguay d'Hilliers. Weakened by fever, he returned to Paris in 1841; and here an unsuccessful attempt was made to shoot him. Rejoining the forces in Algeria, he gained some considerable successes, and in 1847 was appointed governor-general, and in that capacity received the submission of Abd-el-Kader. The news of the revolution in Paris, of February, 1848, reached him in Algeria, and in the following month, embarking with his brother, he sailed to England, and resided there until the downfall of Napoleon III., after which he returned to Paris, and was returned to the National Assembly. He has written a history of the house of Condé, and other works.

Born at Paris, 1822.

AUMONT, JOHN D', o'-mawng, count of Chateauroux, a French general, who displayed great abilities, and was made, by Henry III., marshal of France. Henry IV. appointed him governor of Champagne, and afterwards of Brittany. He was shot at the siege of Camper, near Rennes, 1595. He had served six monarchs, Francis I., Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., Henry III., and Henry IV.

Born 1522.

AUNGERVILLE, RICHARD, generally known as Richard de Bury, bishop of Durham, and lord high chancellor of England. He was tutor to Edward III. He founded a library at Oxford, and corresponded with Petrarch and other eminent literary men of the time.

Born at Bury St. Edmunds, 1281; died at Auckland, 1345.

AUNOY or AULNOY, MARIE CATHERINE, countess of, o'-noi, a French authoress, who, at the close of the 17th century, was a distinguished ornament of the French court, and contributed largely to the light literature of her day. She is principally known through the success of her "Fairy Tales," which were imitations of a style of composition introduced in France by Charles Perrault, and which achieved an amount of popularity equal to those of her master. The titles of her stories will, to some extent, indicate their character. Some of these are, "The White Cat," "The Yellow Dwarf," "The Fair One with the Golden Locks," "Cherry and Fair Star;" several of which have formed the basis of successful spectacles and pantomimes, and other extravaganzas. This lady left four daughters behind her, one of whom, Madame de Hère, inherited similar talents to those by which her parent was distinguished.

Born 1650; died 1705.

AURAY, o'-rai, a town of France, department of Morbihan, 10 miles W. of Vannes. There are some interesting old churches and public buildings, and near the town is the church of St. Anne d'Auray, to which many pilgrims resort. Manf. Cotton-spinning, silk-weaving, tanning, and shipbuilding, and there is a considerable trade done in fish. Pop. about 4,000.

AURELIAN, LUCIUS DOMITIUS, aw-ré-li-an, a Roman emperor, was the son of a peasant in Illyricum. He displayed such skill and valour as a soldier, that Valerian, having raised him to very high rank in the army, at last invested him with the consulate. On the death of Claudius II., in 270, who recommended him as his successor, he ascended the imperial throne. He delivered Italy from the barbarians, defeated Tetricus, who had assumed the title of emperor in Gaul, and conquered Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, 273, and destroyed her splendid city. After these victories he entered Rome in triumph, and next turned his attention to the improvement of Rome, and to the reformation of public manners. His manners were austere, and although a wise and able ruler, he was unpopular. On his march against Persia, he was assassinated by his mutinous troops.

Born about 212; died 276.

AURELIUS, aw-ré-lius, a post township of the United States, New York, on Cayuga lake. Pop. 1,954.

AURELIUS, ANTONINUS MARCUS, Roman emperor, esteemed the noblest of Pagans, nephew of Antoninus Pius, whom he succeeded in 161. He was engaged in long and harassing wars with the German tribes. He was the most eminent of the Stoics, and his "Meditations" abound in admirable moral sentiments, and there is a spirit of tenderness in them which places them in the very first rank of ethical compositions. Strange to say, however, he persecuted the Christians with great severity, and exhibited an intense hostility to their doctrines. The Antonine Column at Rome was erected to his memory.

Born at Rome, 121; died 180.

AURELIUS, VICTOR SEXTUS, a Roman historian, who, though born of mean parents, in Africa, raised himself by his talents to distinction. In 361 Julian made him prefect of the second Pannonia, and in 369 he was chosen consul with Valentinian. His Roman history has been several times printed, and is considered both faithful and minute.

Lived in the 4th century.

AURIA, VICENZO, o-ré'-a, Sicilian antiquary. He took the degree of doctor of law in the university of Catania; was appointed keeper of the national archives 1679. He had great practical talent, and was spoken of as the Sicilian Patriarch, but his fame rests on his historical and antiquarian works. He received a public funeral.

Born at Palermo, 1625; died 1710.

AURICH, ou'-reesh, a town of Prussia, in the province of Hanover, 15 miles N.E. of Emden, with which it is connected by a canal. The town is built in the Dutch style, and has a handsome old palace, in which the former princes of East Friesland resided. Manf. Brandy, paper, leather, tobacco and pipes; there is a considerable trade in cattle and a large horse-market is held. Pop. 4,300.

AURIGNY, o-reen'-ye, one of the Channel Islands. (See ALDERNEY.)

AURIGNY, GELLES D', French jurist and poet. His works are chiefly of a romantic and amatory character; his style is valued for its elegance and correctness.

Died 1553.

AURILLAC, o-ree'-yak, the chief town in the department of Cantal, France, on the right bank of the river Jordanne, which is crossed by a handsome bridge. The town is mostly modern, but there are portions of an ancient castle, church, and abbey, to which was attached one of the most famous schools in France. Manf. Jewellery, copper utensils, paper, woollens, carpets, tapestry, and blonde lace. There are tanning, dyeing, and brewing works, and a good trade is carried on in horses, mules, and cattle. Pop. 11,000.

AURIOL, o'-re-ole, a town of France, in the department of Bouches-du-Rhone, 15 miles E.N.E. of Marseilles. The town is irregularly built, though many of the houses have an elegant appearance. Manf. Cloths, paper, soda, bricks; and in the neighbourhood there are some collieries, and beds of gypsum. Pop. 5,000.

AURISPA, GIOVANNI, Italian scholar, who visited the East and collected many valuable Greek manuscripts. In 1441 Pope Eugenius IV. appointed him apostolic secretary. He was one of the restorers of learning in Italy.

Born at Noto, in Sicily, 1369; died 1459.

AURORA, aw-ror'-a, in mythology, daughter of Hyperion and Thia, or Thea, or, according to others, of Titan and Terra. She married Astræus, by whom she had the winds, the stars, &c. She is generally described by the poets as drawn in a rose-coloured chariot, by white horses, and opening with her rosy fingers the gates of the east, pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow. She is covered with a veil. Nox and Somnus fly before her, and the stars of heaven disappear at her approach. She always sets out before the sun, and is the forerunner of his rising. The Greeks called her Eos.

AURORA, a town of Dearborn county, Indiana, United States, on the Ohio river, 26 miles below Cincinnati. It is a place of considerable business. Pop. about 4,500.

AURUNGABAD, aw-rung-a'-bad', a city of India, in the native state of Hyderabad, or the Nizam's dominions. It was founded in 1620, and subsequently became the capital of the Mogul power in the south of India; the name is derived from AURUNGZEBE. The Nizams transferred their seat of government to Hyderabad, and the town has fallen considerably from its previous importance. In the bazaars a good trade is carried on in silks, shawls, and other valuable articles. Pop. 30,219; of the district, 356,777.

AURUNGZEBE, aw-rung-zeeb', emperor of Hindostan, known as the Great Mogul, was the youngest son of Shah Jehan, of the dynasty of Timur, and early in his youth affected religious sanctity; but, in 1658, he and his brother Morad seized Agra, and made their father prisoner. Soon afterwards he put Morad and another brother, Dara, to death, still, however, acting with kindness towards his father, who died in 1666. Aurungzebe greatly enlarged his dominions, and became so formidable that all the eastern princes sent him ambassadors. His latter days were embittered by jealousy of the ambitious views of his sons, and he constantly resided in his camp, which was prodigiously large, and resembled a populous city. By his will, Aurungzebe divided his possessions among his sons. He was the last of the energetic sovereigns who sat on the Mogul throne during the 17th century.

Born 1618; died 1707.

AUSCHWITZ, or OSWIECIM, a town in Galicia, Austria, on the right bank of the river Sola, 33 miles W.S.W. of Cracow. A trade in salt is carried on. Pop. 3,800.

AUSONIUS, DECIUS MAGNUS, aw-so'-ne-us, a teacher of grammar and rhetoric, and also a writer of Latin poems, at Burdiglia (Bordeaux). His fame reached Rome, and Valentinian, the emperor, appointed him tutor to his son Gratian. In 379 he was raised to the consular dignity, and was subsequently prefect of Latium, Libya, and Gaul. His poems, though unequal, have great merit.

Born at Burdiglia, 310; died 394.

AUSPITZ, ous'-pitz, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Brunn, 42 miles from Olmutz. Pop. 3,000. It is a station on the railway from Vienna to Brunn.

AUSSA, aus'-sa, a town of Abyssinia, on the left bank of the Hawash, formerly the capital of the kingdom of Adel. A perpetual market is held, to which the neighbouring tribes resort. Near the town is a lake of the same name, 14 miles long, 7 wide, and said to be 260 feet deep. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 11° 30′ N. Lon. 41° 40′ E.

AUSSEE, ous-see, a town of Styria, Austria, 8 miles from Hallstadt. Pop. 1,400.—The rock-salt mines of this place have been worked for upwards of 1,000 years.

AUSSIG, AUSSYENAD, or LABEM, a town of Bohemia, Austrian empire, in a mountainous district of the confluence of the Bila and the Elbe. Manf. Woollens, linen, paper, and chemicals; boat-building is also carried on, and there is a large trade in grain, fruit, and mineral waters. There are coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 11,000.

AUSTELL, ST., aws'-tel, a market-town of Cornwall, 13 miles N.N.E. of Truro. Near it are several tin-mines, and large quantities of porcelain clay are exported to different places for the potteries. Pop. 3,824. Station on the South Devon Railway.

AUSTEN, JANE, the authoress of several popular novels, which have appeared in different editions. She was the daughter of the rector of Steventon, Hampshire, and began at an early age to write sketches of novels. She was an amiable, cheerful, attractive woman. All her portraitures are the delineation of characters of every-day English life, being marked by no very strong traits either morally or intellectually. The chief of her productions are "Sense and Sensibility," "Pride and Prejudice," "Mansfield Park," "Emma," and "Persuasion."

Born at Steventon, 1775; died at Winchester, 1817.

AUSTEN, JOHN, writer on jurisprudence. He entered the army at an early age, but relinquished the military profession and was called to the bar in 1814. In 1826 he was appointed Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of London, but resigned the chair in 1832. He was Royal Commissioner of Malta in 1837. He wrote several works on his favourite science. He associated with Romilly, Sir G. Lewis, J. S. Mill, and other eminent men, who united in intense admiration of his great abilities.

Born 1790; died 1859.

AUSTEN, SARAH TAYLOR, translator and miscellaneous writer, wife of the preceding. She was a member of the talented Taylor family, of Norwich. Among other works, she translated Falke's "Characteristics of Goethe," and Ranke's "History of the Popes." She edited the "Memoirs of Sydney Smith," and her daughter, Lady Duff Gordon's, "Letters from Egypt." She also wrote on the subject of education for girls.

Born at Norwich, 1793; died at Weybridge, 1867.

AUSTERLITZ, aws'-ter-lits, (Ger. ows'-ter-litz), a small town of Moravia, circle of Brunn, 12 miles E.S.E. of Brunn. Pop. 2,500. This town is noted for being the scene of a great battle fought on the 2nd December, 1805, between the French and the allied armies of Austria and Russia, in which the former gained a decisive victory. This battle was followed by the peace of Presburg, which was concluded on the 26th of the same month, and which stripped Austria of nearly 24,000 square miles of territory and 2,786,000 subjects. The fight was subsequently called the "battle of the three emperors," from there being present in the field, the emperors of France, Austria, and Russia.

AUSTIN, aws'-tin, the capital of Texas, United States, on the left bank of the Colorado. Pop. 4,500. Lat. 30° 15′ N. Lon. 97° 47′ W.

AUSTIN, a county of Texas. It is drained by the Brazos river. Capital, Belleville. Pop. 15,500.

AUSTONLEY, aws'-ton-le, a township in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Huddersfield. Area, 1,760 acres. Pop. 2,300.

AUSTRALASIA (SOUTH ASIA), aws'-tral-ai'-she-a, in modern geography, the fifth great division of the globe. It comprises Australia, Van Diemen's Land or Tasmania, Papua or New Guinea, and New Zealand, together with a large number of small islands surrounding them in all directions.

AUSTRALIA, the largest island in the world, containing the most important and rapidly growing of the British colonies, lies to the south of the Asiatic Archipelago, between lat. 10° 47′ and 39° 11′ S., and lon. 113° and 153° 30′ E. The Indian Ocean is on the west, and the South Pacific on the east. On the north, Torres Strait, 80 miles broad, divides it from New Guinea, and the Arafura Sea from the islands of the Archipelago. Bass's Strait, 140 miles wide, separates it on the south from Tasmania (Van Diemen's Land). The form of Australia is very compact, there being very few inlets, except on the northern shores, where there are several large gulfs, and the coast line is very broken. The most northerly point is Cape York, at the head of the promontory forming the east side of the Gulf of Carpentaria, the largest inlet on the entire coast, which is nearly 400 miles wide from east to west, and the eastern side measures about 450 miles. In it, on the western and southern sides, are Great, Wellesley's, Bentinck's, and several smaller islands. Further west is Van Diemen's Gulf, across the entrance to which is Melville Island. On the north-west the coast line is much broken, the chief indentations being, Admiralty Gulf, York Sound, Collier Bay, and King Sound. On the west coast, Exmouth Gulf and Shark Bay are the largest inlets. In Shark Bay are Dirk Hartog, Dorre, and several small islands. Dirk Hartog Island is the most westerly point of Australia, and thence the coast line gradually recedes in a south-easterly direction to about the 35th parallel of south latitude, when it turns abruptly to the east, and takes a bold sweep, with a northerly curve, forming the Great Australian Bight, which extends to Flinder's Land, on the eastern side of Spencer Gulf, a stretch from King George's Sound of more than 1,200 miles, the coast line being chiefly formed of tall cliffs. The base of this curve is the 35th degree of south latitude, the indentation to the head of the Bight being about 250 miles. Spencer Gulf, between Flinder's Land and Yorke Peninsula, is a deep indentation about 180 miles in length, and farther west, is the Gulf of St. Vincent, reached by Investigation Straits between Yorke Peninsula and Kangaroo Island. The eastern shore of Encounter Bay runs nearly in a southerly direction, turning west to Cape Otway, between which and Wilson's Promontory, the extreme south of Australia, are Port Phillip Bay, and another inlet, Western Port, in which are Phillip and French Islands. To the north of the Wilson's Promontory is Corner Inlet, and the coast line makes a bold curve in a north-easterly direction to Cape Howe, the extreme eastern point of the colony of Victoria. There are no gulfs of large size on the eastern coast, although there are several small bays affording good harbourage. The best known are Botany Bay, near which is the town of Sydney; Moreton Bay, partially enclosed by Moreton Island; Keppel Bay, Broad Sound, Edgecumbe Bay, Halifax Bay, and, farther north, Princess Charlotte Bay. Lennox Head, about S. lat. 29°, is the extreme eastern point of Australia. Running in a direction nearly parallel to the eastern coast from Torres Straits to about lat. 22° S. is the Great Barrier Reef of coral, in some cases approaching within 20 miles of the coast, but receding farther south. From west to east, the extreme length of Australia is 2,500 miles, and the breadth from north to south 1,950 miles, and the circumference about 8,000 miles. The island, or rather continent, is more than two-thirds the size of Europe, and about half as large as South America. A range of mountains of considerable altitude extends along the eastern side of Australia, commencing in the eastern part of the colony of Victoria, where the eastern portion is known as the Australian Alps, running from east to west, at 60 or 70 miles from the coast, varying in height from 1,000 to 7,000 feet, with several minor ranges running at right angles in a northerly direction. The Great Dividing Range, or the Narragonga (the native name) may be divided into seven main branches. 1. The New England Range (highest point, "Ben Lomond," 5,000 feet); 2. the Liverpool Range (highest point, "Oxley's Peak," 4,500 feet); 3. the Blue Mountain Range (highest point, "Mount Beemarang," 4,100 feet); 4. the Cullarin Range (highest point, "Mundoonen," 3,000 feet); 5. the Gourock Range (highest point, "Jindulian," 4,300 feet); 6. the Manero Range (highest point, "Head of Kybean River," 4,010 feet); and 7. the Muniong Range (highest point, "Mount Kosciusko," on the Australian Alps, 7,308 feet). Many of these peaks reach far above the snow-line. Eastward of these main ranges are the Coral ranges, forming the edge of the great eastern table-land, and attaining a considerable altitude. Mount Seaview, in New South Wales, is 6,000 feet high, and there are several other peaks little inferior in elevation. Westward of the Great Dividing Range are the Interior Range and numerous isolated ountains; and farther west extensive table-lands or downs extending almost to the centre of the island, and sinking gradually into the great depression of the desert of Central Australia, which extends from a slightly elevated district at the head of the Great Bight to about the 20th degree of South latitude, and westward to the settled districts of Western Australia. This immense desert, nearly a million square miles in extent, through which no rivers flow, where vegetation is coarse and scanty, was probably at some remote period the bed of an inland sea. There are salt-marshes and small lakes; but adventurous explorers, who suffered great hardships in their endeavour to traverse the desolate region, discovered no place suitable for settlement. To the south-east of the desert are Lakes Torrens and Gairdner and others, which will be more fully described when treating of each colony in detail. The Western seaboard of Australia is generally flat, and of a sandy character. Ten rivers of very considerable size discharge into the sea, many of them being absorbed before they reach it. On the East coast are numerous small streams rising on the slope of the mountain ranges; but on the South coast there is not a stream of any kind falling into the sea for more than 1,500 miles. The volume of all the rivers varies considerably, according to the season. Long periods of drought reduce them to little more than water-courses, and dry up the smaller streams; and the wet seasons frequently cause disastrous floods. Except in the Eastern part of the island, among the mountain ranges, the scenery of Australia is not striking. The hilly districts are generally well wooded, and the extensive table-lands give excellent pasturage to immense flocks of sheep, one of the principal sources of Australian wealth. (See NEW SOUTH WALES, VICTORIA, SOUTH AUSTRALIA, WESTERN AUSTRALIA, and QUEENSLAND.)

Rivers.—The most important river is the Murray, which rises in the Australian Alps, and flows westward, discharging into Lake Alexandrina, near Encounter Bay, in South Australia. It has a course of 1,100 miles, and forms the boundary between the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria. On the right bank it receives the Murrumbidgee and the Darling, each of which has numerous small tributaries. The Darling, which receives the drainage of the western slope of the mountains in New South Wales before it reaches the Murray, sends off many branches, which lose themselves in lagoons. Between this absorption and rapid evaporation, the volume of the river is greatly diminished. On the left bank the Murray receives the Ovens and the Goulburn, and other streams. The Barcoo is a large stream rising about 400 miles from the east coast, nearly under the tropic of Capricorn, and flowing generally in a south-westerly direction till it is lost in Lake Torrens, in South Australia. The other chief rivers are the Hunter, Hawkesbury, and Shoalhaven, which fall into the Pacific on the E.; the Blackwood and Glenelg on the S.; the Swan and the Canning on the W.; and the Victoria, the Adelaide, the Liverpool, and the Alligator, on the N.: few of these, however, are open to internal navigation. The river systems will be more fully described under the headings of the several colonies.

Climate.—Generally good and healthy, but of course, in such an extensive territory, varying considerably. The average temperature of Sydney is about equal to that of Portugal. The hot winds blowing from the desert interior are sirocco-like in intensity.

Vegetation.—In describing the general appearance of Australian tree-life, travellers say that, amid its apparent sameness, spots may be found teeming with a luxuriant and gigantic vegetation, sometimes laid out in stately groves, divested of copse or underwood, and at other times skirting an open country of hill and dale, gracefully sprinkled with isolated clumps of trees covered with the richest tufted herbage. Sometimes, again, they appear in immense thickets, interwoven with innumerable creepers, and forming bowers as impenetrable and picturesque as those which are found amid the forests of Brazil. The trees are mostly evergreens, and have a hard and horny species of leaves, which grow from the branches vertically, and not horizontally, as is the case with the trees of this country. Pines of the genus Araucaria grow to a great height and yield excellent timber. There are about 400 specimens of the gum-tree, the wood of which is durable and takes a fine polish. Oak, rosewood, tulip-wood, sandal-wood, and satin-wood are also abundant, especially in Queensland. It has been estimated that there are 10,000 distinct species of Australian plants. There are no indigenous cereal plants, and very few of the roots that supply food. The European cereals and fruits are cultivated, and in the northern parts cotton and sugar are raised.

Minerals.—Coal, slate, potters' clay, and beautiful marbles, suitable for the purposes of the statuary. Iron, tin, lead, and copper abound; and, as is well known, Australia is one of the most productive gold fields of the world.

Zoology.—Wild animals are not numerous, but peculiar, many of them being the order Marsupialia, or having a pouch; the kangaroo, wombat, and the ornithorhynchus, being the principal. The kangaroo is the largest native animal, and often attains the weight of from 160 to 200 lb. Australia has many varieties of it, the smallest and most beautiful being the kangaroo rat. The wombat is about the size of a badger, burrowing in the sand-hills of the interior, and feeding exclusively on vegetables. It is social in its habits, and, like the most of the Australian mammals, it is nocturnal, sleeping in its burrow during the day, and moving about in search of food only in the night. The dingoes, or wild dogs, do not bark like the common dog, but only yelp, and are the most frequently met with. When hard pressed by hunger they devour each other, and, being very destructive to the sheep, they are eagerly hunted by the settlers. The ornithorhynchus is one of the most remarkable animals in existence. It has the bill of a duck, a body covered with fur, and resembling an otter. It is about thirteen inches long, from the tip of its beak to that of its tail. It is an aquatic animal, laying eggs, and frequenting the margins of rivers and lakes. The hare and rabbit have been introduced from this country. The most remarkable birds are the emu, the black swan, and a kind of thrush called the laughing jackass. Birds of paradise are numerous in the north, and many of the songsters are exceedingly gorgeous in their plumage. The most magnificent, perhaps, are the rifle-bird and the ring oriole. The lyre-bird has a tail shaped like a lyre, and is most superbly plumaged. The parrots, of which 60 species are known, are very handsome. Of game birds, pheasants and partridges were in the autumn of 1858, introduced from this country. Many of the songbirds of England have been introduced and acclimatised. Reptiles are numerous, but not dangerous. The most formidable is the alligator, which abounds in the north. There are many kinds of serpents; amongst which may be named the diamond-snake, the black snake, the grey, brown, yellow, and whip snakes, the bites of which are all more or less dangerous: that of the yellow snake especially is almost instantly fatal. Lizards, of which 50 species are known, and frogs abound; and scorpions, centipedes, and tarantulas exist in considerable numbers. Insects are also numerous, although requiring no special notice here on account of peculiarity. Fish are also plentiful along the coasts. The domestic animals are the same as in this country. Sheep are very abundant, and their wool is very fine.

Aboriginal Population.—The aborigines are of a chocolate colour, wandering in their habits, and exceedingly disgusting in the food which they eat. Their number is not great, and is steadily decreasing. There are many different languages and dialects. A few of the natives have partially adopted civilized habits, but in their wild state they do not cultivate the ground, rear domestic animals, or attempt to make any regular kind of dwelling. They are fierce and cruel, and some of them at least have the reputation of being cannibals, eating the bodies of their deceased relations and of enemies taken in battle. Infanticide is common; the rite of circumcision is generally practised, and various ceremonies of a revolting character are regularly performed. Their religious notions are of the vaguest character. In stature they are of the average size of Europeans; but in the northern districts they are taller and better developed.

Area, 3,000,000 square miles.

Pop.—According to the latest estimate about 3,000,000, exclusive of natives, of whom probably there are about 70,000. The bulk of the white population is of British descent; but the gold discoveries brought a considerable number of Americans, and Chinese form a noticeable element of the population.

Territorial Divisions.—The English colonies of NEW SOUTH WALES, VICTORIA, SOUTH AUSTRALIA (including the Northern Territory), QUEENSLAND, and WESTERN AUSTRALIA. No other nation but Great Britain has any settlements in Australia.

History of Discovery and Settlement.—It is probable that Australia was partially known to the Portuguese very early in the 16th century, under the name of Great Java, and "Australis Terra" is mentioned as "the most southern of all lands" in a geographical work printed at Louvain in 1598.

AUSTRIA, EMPIRE OF, or AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, a central State of Europe, bounded on the N. by Russia and the German Empire; on the W. by the German Empire, Switzerland, and Northern Italy; on the E. by Prussia and Moldavia; on the S. by the Adriatic, Turkey, and Roumania. The only sea coast is on the Adriatic, including the Gulfs of Venice and Trieste, the numerous islands and channels of the Dalmatian coast, and the Gulf of Cattaro, at the extreme south. The extent, therefore, of its coast-line may be taken at about 700 miles. The country is extremely mountainous, the plains not occupying more than a fifth part of the whole surface. The Rhætian or Tyrolese, the Noric, the Carinthian, the Julian or Carniolian, and the Dinaric Alps, occupy the south-western portion, and in the Rhætian Alps several of the peaks are more than 12,000 feet in height. (See ALPS.) The great Carpathian range forms the northern boundary of Hungary: it separates it from Galicia, and terminates a course of nearly 700 miles on the banks of the Danube, near the Wallachian frontier. (See CARPATHIANS.) The Waldgebirge, or Forest Mountains, well wooded, and of moderate elevation, extend from south-eastern Galicia in a north-westerly direction across Hungary to the banks of the Hernad. The Transylvanian Alps, a series of parallel ranges, stretch from the Banat into the province whence they take their name, and subside in the plains of Moldavia, seldom reaching 4,000 feet in elevation. An extensive mountain-range, the Sudetes, or Hercynian chain, rises in the low country between the Vistula and the Oder, and follows a north-westerly direction of about 200 miles through Moravia, Silesia, and the north of Bohemia, until it reaches the Elbe at the borders of Saxony. On the lower slopes of the mountains are pastures or fields of cereals; above are forests of oak, elm, and ash, and the yew and fir grow at greater elevation. The snow-line is at about 8,000 feet above the sea level. In Tyrol are glaciers, perpetual snow, and avalanches. The plains lie in Lower Hungary, Upper Hungary, Lombardy, and in N. Italy. They are remarkable for the uniformity of the level which they present. That of Lower Hungary occupies 36,000 square miles. The productive land is estimated at 87 per cent. of the whole country.

Area, 241,000 square miles.

Rivers.—The Danube and the Dniester, falling into the Black Sea; the Po and the Adige, debouching into the Adriatic; the Vistula into the Baltic, and the Elbe into the German Ocean. Some of these have several tributary streams of great extent and importance.

Lakes.—The principal in the mountain regions are Como, Maggiore, Lugano, Garda, and Iseo; in the plains, the Platten See and Lake Nieusiedel.

Forests.—Everywhere extensive, except in the lowlands of Lombardy, Hungary, and Lower Austria. They are estimated to cover an eighth part of the productive soil of the empire, and form a considerable source of its wealth. In Transylvania the forests abound with oak and other trees well adapted for ship-building and all other kinds of carpentry.

Zoology.—The black bear, the fox, the wolf, and the lynx are plentiful; the chamois is getting rare; but herds of wild swine haunt the forests, and wild deer roam over the plains. Birds are more numerous than in any other part of Europe. The white heron is especially abundant amongst the marshes of Hungary, and the vulture and golden eagle are numerous amongst the Alpine ranges. Leeches are abundant, and form a considerable article of trade. Fish are abundant in the rivers, the Theiss being considered the most plentifully supplied with fish of any river in Europe. The domestic animals are the same as those of Britain. In Hungary and Galicia cattle-raising is extensively pursued, and in the mountains large herds of goats are reared.

Climate.—Various, but generally healthy. In general the eastern part of the country receives less rain than the western. There is excessive rainfall in the Alpine regions, and the storms are frequent there and along the coast.

Pro.—In the mountain districts in the N. the produce is nearly the same as in Britain; in the S. maize, millet, mulberries, and grapes are produced. The Hungarian wine, called Tokay, is deemed the finest in the world; and the hops of Bohemia are considered of the very best quality. In Lombardy the mulberry-tree is extensively cultivated for the support of the silkworm. As a matter of course, in the high Alps there is much land that cannot be reduced into productiveness; but in Lombardy, Galicia, and Hungary, the soil is as rich as any in Europe.

Minerals.—Abundant and valuable; comprising gold, silver, copper, iron, native steel, quicksilver, lead, zinc, antimony, manganese, bismuth, nickel, sulphur, coal, petroleum, salt, marble, and precious stones. Transylvania may be pronounced the gold region, and Hungary the silver. Copper in both Hungary and Moravia; iron and coal in Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia; lead and quicksilver in Carinthia and Carniola; native steel in Styria; and salt in Transylvania, Galicia, Upper Austria, and Hungary. The Bohemian carbuncle and the Hungarian opal are both much esteemed; and the chalcedony, emerald, jasper, ruby, amethyst, cornelian, and beryl are frequently found.

Provinces and Population.—The Austrian empire comprises five countries, each bearing the name of kingdom — Hungary, Bohemia, Galicia, Illyria, and Dalmatia; one archduchy, Austria; one principality, Transylvania; one duchy, Styria; one margraviate, Moravia; and one county, Tyrol. These are now divided into provinces, or "crown lands," of which there are 18, 14 being in Austria proper (or the German monarchy), and 4 in Hungary. The following table enumerates the provinces and gives the population according to the latest official return. The rate of increase is rather more than one per cent. per annum:—

German Monarchy, or Cisleithan Austria—
Lower Austria	2,330,621
Upper Austria	759,620
Salzburg	163,570
Styria	1,213,597
Carinthia	348,730
Carniola	481,243
Coast land	647,934
Tyrol and Vorarlberg	912,549
Bohemia	5,560,819
Moravia	2,133,407
Silesia	565,475
Galicia	5,958,907
Bukowina	571,671
Dalmatia	476,101
Total, German Monarchy	22,144,244
Kingdom of Hungary, or Transleithan Austria—
Hungary	11,644,574
Croatia and Slavonia	1,892,499
Transylvania	2,084,048
Town of Fiume	209,81
Total, Hungary	15,642,102
Total, Austria-Hungary	37,786,346

The population is made up of several distinct races, differing in customs, language, and religion. The most numerous race is the German, forming about one-quarter of the entire population. They are most numerous in Lower and Upper Austria, Carinthia, Salzburg, Styria, and Northern Tyrol. The people of the Slavonian races (Czechs, Moravians, Slovacks, Poles, Ruthens, Croats, Slovens and Serbians) form 49 per cent. of the population in the Cisleithan, and 16 per cent. in the Transleithan division. The race third as to numbers, the Magyars, constitute 38 per cent. of the population of the kingdom of Hungary, one-half per cent. of the district of the Military frontier, and one-tenth per cent. of the Cisleithan part of the empire. There are also Roumani, Italians, Jews, Armenians, Bulgarians, and Albanians.

Constitution and Government.—Since the year 1867, the Austro-Hungarian monarchy has formed a bipartite state, consisting of a German, or "Cisleithan," monarchy, and a Magyar, or "Transleithan," kingdom, the former officially designated as Austria, and the latter as Hungary. Each of the two countries has its own parliament, ministers, and government, while the connecting ties between them consist in the person of the hereditary sovereign, in a common army, navy, and diplomacy, and in a controlling body known as the Delegations. The Delegations form a parliament of 120 members, one-half of whom are chosen by and represent the legislature of Austria, and the other half that of Hungary.

Religion.—The State religion of Austria is the Roman Catholic, but there is complete toleration for all dissenters from it, of whatever form of belief. According to the returns of the last census, rather more than 66 per cent. of the inhabitants of the empire are Roman Catholics, while of the remainder 11 per cent. are Greek Catholics; 10 per cent. Evangelical Protestants, and 9 per cent. Byzantine Greeks. There are eleven Roman Catholic archbishops, two archbishops of the Greek Church, and one of the Armenian Church.

Manufactures.—The principal manufacturing districts of the empire are the provinces of Lower Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia; the manufactures include cotton, woollens, silks, flax, hemp, leather, paper, beer, brandy, beetroot sugar, glass, chemicals, tobacco, jewellery, cabinet-work, musical and scientific instruments, porcelain, iron, and earthenware. (See each province under its proper heading.)

Commerce.—The annual value of the exports is about £39,000,000; and of the imports, £60,000,000.

Railways and Telegraphs.—There are more than 10,000 miles of railway now open; and about 30,000 miles of telegraph lines.

Army and Navy.—The strength of the army in peace is fixed at 252,000 men, to be raised during war to 800,000. The military forces are divided into the standing army, the Landewehr, or the militia, and the Landsturm, or volunteers. Military service is compulsory on all capable of bearing arms. The number of sailors in time of peace is about 5,700; to be raised in case of war to 11,500.

Principal Towns.—VIENNA, INNSPRUCK, LINZ, GRATZ, LAYBACH, PRAGUE, KLAGENFURT, TROPPAU, BRUNN, LEMBERG, BUDA-PESTH, KLAUSENBERG, AGRAM, PETERWARDEIN, CZERNOWITZ, and ZARA. The chief seaports are TRIESTE and FIUME. There are 25 fortresses of the first and second rank, namely, Comorn, Carlsburg, Temesvar, Peterwardein, Eszek, Brod, Carlstadt, Castelnuovo, Arad, Munkács, Cracow, Gradisca, Olmütz, Leopoldstadt, Prague, Brixen, Theresienstadt, Kufstein, Linz, Salzburg, Buda, Ragusa, Zara, Cattaro, and Pola. The last-named is the chief naval fortress of the empire.

History.—Austria takes its name from "Oesterreich," or eastern kingdom, which word designated the limit of the emperor Charlemagne's dominions. After the death of Charlemagne, it became a dependency of Bavaria, and then came into the possession of the counts of Babenberg, in whose family it continued till 1246. On the demise of the last of this line, a war broke out, and, in 1276, Rudolph of Hapsburg, emperor of Germany, from whom sprang the present royal race, conquered Austria, and, seven years afterwards, invested his son Albert with the kingly dignity. In 1437 Albert II. was elected emperor of the German empire; and from that date till 1806, when Francis II. laid down the imperial dignity, and the great German empire was dissolved, it remained in the Hapsburg family. In 1526, Ferdinand I. became possessed, by marriage, of the kingdom of Hungary. The partition treaty of 1772, by which Poland was dismembered, added Galicia to the dominions of the empress Maria Theresa, and, in 1778, the Bukowine, or south-eastern portion, was ceded by the sultan. The Italian provinces were annexed in 1713 by the treaty of Utrecht; but many vicissitudes occurred, and it was not till the treaties of Paris and Vienna, in 1814 and 1815, that this great empire, formed of so many antagonistic elements, was consolidated. The following are the dates of some of the leading events of the modern history of Austria:—

The Lombardo-Venetian kingdom established	1815
Revolution in Hungary	1848
The Emperor Ferdinand abdicated in favour of his nephew, Francis Joseph	1848
The Hungarian general, Gorgei, surrendered, and the revolution was at an end	1849

War with France, defeat of Austria, and surrender of Lombardy 1859
War with Prussia 1866
Venetia surrendered 1866
The emperor and empress of Austria crowned king and queen of Hungary 1867

(See the various places mentioned in this article under the proper headings.)

AUTAUGA, aw-taw'-ga, a county of Alabama, U.S., with a rich and fertile soil. Pop. 13,000.

AUTEUIL, o-tu(r)le. (See PARIS.)

AUTOLYCUS, aw-tol'-i-kus, in mythology a son of Mercury, by Chione, a daughter of Dædalion, and one of the Argonauts. His exploits as a thief have been greatly celebrated.

AUTOLYCUS, OF PITANE, IN ÆOLUS, one of the earliest Greek writers on mathematics and astronomy. Latin versions of his treatises are extant.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

AUTUN, o-tuh(r)n', an ancient town of France, 28 miles from Châlons-sur-Saône, on the Arroux, in the department of the Saône and Loire. It is picturesquely situate at the foot of a lofty range of mountains covered with wood. It has a fine cathedral, founded in the 11th century, a museum, library, and other buildings of interest. Manf. Carpets, cotton goods, hosiery, leather, and paper; and has a trade in cattle, timber, and hemp. Pop. about 11,500.—Julius Cæsar mentions this place under the name of Bibracte, and under Augustus its name was changed to Augustodunum, of which there are some fine ruins, especially of the walls and gates. It was the see of the great French diplomatist Talleyrand.

AUVERGNE, o-vairn', an ancient province of France, now chiefly divided into the departments of the PUY-DE-DÔME, the CANTAL, and a small portion of HAUTE-LOIRE. It is divided into Upper and Lower Auvergne, separated by the river Rue. Upper Auvergne is mountainous, a branch of the Cevennes range occupying a great portion of the territory. The culminating points of some of these are Puy-de-Dôme, 4,806 feet; Cantal, 6,093; and Mont-d'Or, 6,188. Many of them have the appearance of being extinct volcanoes. Lower Auvergne is fertile and well watered.

AUVERGNE, THEOPHILUS DE LA TOUR D', a distinguished French soldier and scholar, who early entered the service, distinguishing himself by his military bearing and by his devotion to study. He was present in many actions during the American war, and was offered a pension by the king of Spain, which, however, he refused. The French revolution found him a captain, and he was one of the first volunteers to defend the territory of France against its enemies, without any wish for promotion; and it was only as captain of the longest standing that he accepted the command of all the grenadier companies, called the Infernal Column. In every conflict he was ever foremost, and he introduced more generally the bayonet into the French army. He was taken prisoner by the English, and after regaining his liberty, resumed his career by replacing a simple conscript, the son of an old and feeble friend. He served in many battles under Bonaparte, who offered him higher rank, but which he refused, and was declared by Napoleon "the first grenadier of the French republic."—He was the author of a French-Celtic dictionary, a glossary of forty-five languages, and other philological works of merit. The following anecdote is told of him:—A person connected with the government was boasting of his influence, and desired to know what he could do for Auvergne, whose clothes were in a deplorable condition. "What do you wish to have, the command of a battalion, or a regiment? you have only to speak." "Oh no!" said La Tour, "I only want a pair of shoes."

Born 1743; killed at the battle of Neuburg, 1800.

AUXENTIUS OF CAPPADOCIA, awx-en'-shi-us, an Arian theologian of the 4th century, bishop of Milan, and famous for his share in the great Nicene controversy.

AUXERRE, okes-air', an ancient town of France, department of the Yonne, on the river Yonne, 90 miles from Paris. It has a fine Gothic cathedral, an ancient palace, and an abbey in which are the tombs of the early counts of Auxerre. Manf. Woollens, serges, druggets, blankets, hosiery, hats, yarns, violin-strings, and earthenware. Pop. about 15,500.—This was the ancient capital of the Auxerrois, or county of Auxerre, of which the district of that name is now the chief part.

AUXON, okes-ong', a town of France, on a river of the same name, department of the Aube, 15 miles from Troyes. Manf. Chiefly hosiery. Pop. between 2,000 and 3,000.

AUXONNE, okes-on', a town of France, on the Saône, department of Côte d'Or, 18 miles from Dijon. It has a castle, is fortified, the seat of a court of commerce, and has an artillery school. Manf. Woollen, serges, muslins, and hardware. It trades also in fruit, wine, brandy, flour, grain, coal, wood, and iron. Pop. about 6,000.—It was the capital of a small sovereignty, the monarchs of which took the title of Sires d'Auxonne.

AUZOUT, ADRIAN, o-zoo', a French mathematician, who is said to have invented the micrometer, which is still in use amongst astronomers to measure the apparent diameter of celestial bodies, and his treatise on which was printed in 1667.—He was the first who thought of applying the telescope to the astronomical quadrant.

Born at Rouen; died 1691.

AVA, a'-va, the former capital of Upper Burmah on the Irrawady, which is here joined by the Mytnge, which passes the city on the east side; and a deep and rapid river, the Myttha, forms the defence of the south and west faces of the town. It is skilfully fortified, but many of its defences are in bad condition. The town is generally wretchedly built, but there are several splendid temples, one of them containing a statute 24 feet high of the God Gautama. The country round Ava is well cultivated; but there is little industry in the town, which is gradually deteriorating. Pop. from 25,000 to 30,000. Lat. 21° 52′ N. Lon. 96° 1′ E. (See BURMAH.)

AVAL, AWAL, or BAHREIN, a'-val, the largest of the Bahrein islands, in the Gulf of Persia. Ext. 30 miles long and 12 wide. Desc. Hilly towards its centre. Pro. Wheat, barley, dates, and other fruits. Pop. uncertain; perhaps 40,000. Lat. 26° 12′ N. Lon. 50° 40′ E.—In the 16th century this island was occupied by the Portuguese, who, in 1622, were expelled by the Persians. These again were driven from the island by the Arabs, who in 1790, became its possessors. Since 1819, the fishermen along its coasts have been protected by British cruisers.

AVALLON, a'-va-long, a town of France, department of the Yonne, 26 miles from Auxerre. It is situated on a rock, at the foot of which flows the river Voisin, and is well built. There are a church, built in the 12th century, in the Burgundian Gothic style, a court of commerce, a commercial college, and an agricultural society. Manf. Woollen cloths, paper, leather, mustard, and hosiery. It has some fulling mills and tanneries, besides a trade in wine, coals, and grain. Pop. 6,000.—It is the ancient Aballo.

AVALOS, FERDINAND FRANCIS D', a'-va-los, marquis of Pescara, a Neapolitan who served with great distinction in the army of Charles V.; and in 1512 was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna. He beguiled the hours of captivity by writing a "Dialogue on Love," which he dedicated to his wife, the beautiful and accomplished Vittoria Colonna. On being released, he again entered into active service, and contributed greatly to the gaining of the battle of Vicenza over Alviano and the Venetian forces. Subsequently he took Milan, gave up Como to pillage, and in 1522, in the campaign against the French, assisted in relieving Padua, and was present at Lodi and Pizzigetthone, as well as at the reduction of Cremona. In 1524 he played a foremost part in the battle of Pavia, which was so disastrous to Francis I., and his conduct to the captive king showed much magnanimity. He revealed to Charles V. a plot of the Italians to drive out the Spaniards.

Born 1489; died at Milan, 1525.

AVARES, AWARES, or OAR, a-var-es, a town and district of Persia, in the province of Lesghistan, in the eastern part of the Caucasus. Area, 2,287 miles. Desc. Mountainous, and infested by predatory tribes, who are nominally subject to Russia. Pop. uncertain; the province is said to contain 30,000; but, as they live mostly by plunder and the chase, this cannot be obtained with accuracy.

AVATCHA, a-vat-cha, a spacious bay on the eastern coast of Kamchatka, into which the rivers Avatcha and Paratounka discharge. The entrance is in lat. 52° 51′ N., lon. 158° 49′ E. There is in this bay a mountain of the same name, about 10,000 feet high, which is volcanic, and, in 1827, was in a state of violent eruption. The town of Avatcha also stood here, but its name was changed to Petropaulovski, which has been strongly fortified, and was, in 1854, unsuccessfully attacked by a small squadron of French and English vessels.

AVEBURY, ABURY, or ABERY, a'-bur-e, a village of Wiltshire, 29 miles from Salisbury. Pop. 768.—In its neighbourhood are the remains of what was once the largest Celtic or Druidical structure in Europe.

AVEIRO, a-vai'-e-ro, a seaport town of Beira, Portugal, 35 miles S. of Oporto, the seat of a bishopric and college. It trades in fish, salt, oil, wine, and oranges. The oysters taken off the coast are said to be the best in Portugal. Pop. 6,500. Lat. 40° 39′ N. Lon. 8° 37′ W.

AVELLA, a town of Italy, province of Principato Ultra, beautifully situated about 20 miles from Naples. Near it are the ruins of the ancient Abello. Pop. 3,800.

AVELLINO, a'-vel-ē'-no, a fortified city of Italy, province of Principato Ultra, 28 miles E. of Naples. It is mostly composed of narrow, crooked, and gloomy streets, with a cathedral, royal college, and several churches. Manf. Paper, woollens, sausages, and maccaroni, and there are large dye-works. The neighbourhood abounds in chestnuts and hazelnuts. Pop. 20,500.—In 1694 and 1731 this town suffered considerably by earthquakes. Not far from it is the famous Val di Gazzano, where the Samnites forced a Roman army to lay down their arms, and pass singly under the yoke, 321 B.C.

AVELLONI, FRANCESCO, Italian dramatist, said to have written 600 plays, generally of a sentimental kind.

Born at Venice, 1756; died at Rome, 1837.

AVEMPACE, or ABEN PACE, a'-vem-pa-ce, the name given by Latin writers to Ibn Badja, one of the most distinguished of the Arabian philosophers in Spain. He was a physician, mathematician, astronomer, musician, poet, and metaphysical philosopher. In the most important of his treatises he professed to lay down rules for attaining a perception of the divine thought which sustains the world.

Born at Saragossa towards the close of the 11th century; died at Fez, in Morocco, 1138.

AVENCHES, a-vanzh', a town in Switzerland, 18 miles from Berne. Pop. 1,500.—This was the ancient Aventicum, of which there are some remains, and the capital of the Helvetii, which became a flourishing Roman colony, and was destroyed in 447 by the Huns.

AVENTINUS, av-en-tī'-nus, historian. His real name was Johann Thurmayr. Having attained great distinction as a scholar, he was appointed tutor to the sons of Duke Albert, of Bavaria. He wrote the "Annals of Bavaria," which led to his imprisonment, on suspicion of heresy, but was soon released.

Born at Abensburg, 1466; died at Ratisbon, 1534.

AVERANI, GUISEPPE, Italian jurist and man of science, professor in the University of Padua. He wrote legal works of great value, and published results of experiments in optics, electricity, and acoustics.

Born at Florence, 1662; died at Pisa, 1738.

AVERDY, CLEMENT CHARLES DE L', a-vair-de', a French statesman and finance minister under Louis XV. He was counsellor of parliament; but, through his propositions for reform, lost his position, and, in 1764, received his dismissal. He retired to his estate, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits, but was guillotined in 1793 on an absurd charge.

Born at Paris, 1723.

AVERNO, ă-ver'-no, "without a bird," a lake of Campania, near Baiæ, in Italy, the waters of which were so unwholesome and putrid, that no birds ever visited its banks. The ancients made it the entrance to the infernal regions. In the time of Virgil, a communication between it and the neighbouring Lucrine lake was made by Agrippa; but, in 1538, the latter was filled by a volcanic eruption, when Monte Nuovo rose in its place, rendering the Averno again a separate lake. It is about a mile and a half in circumference.—It is now called AVERNO (a-vair'-no), and on its banks, instead of pestilential marshes, are now beautiful gardens and vineyards. The grotto of the Cumæan sibyl is still to be seen here.—It may be observed, that all lakes whose stagnant waters were putrid and offensive to the smell, were indiscriminately called Averna.

AVERROES, or IBN ROSHD, a-ver-ō'-es, an Arabian philosopher and physician, who succeeded his father in the chief magistracy of Cordova, the capital of the Moorish possessions in Spain. He was afterwards made chief judge in Morocco, and having appointed deputies there, he returned to Spain. The freedom of his opinions, however, gave offence to the more zealous Mussulmans, and he was degraded from his office and thrown into prison; but on doing penance, and making a recantation, he was released. The admiration of Averroes for Aristotle was almost enthusiastic, and his commentaries on that philosopher's works procured him the name of the commentator. He also wrote a treatise on the art of physic, an epitome of Ptolemy's "Almagest," and a treatise on philosophy and theology.

Born at Cordova, 1126; died at Morocco, 1198.

AVERSA, a-vair'-sa, a town of Italy, in the Terra di Lavoro, 8 miles from Naples. It is situate in a very fine plain, covered with vineyards and orange-trees, and is a sort of nursery for the artists and artisans of the kingdom. Its sweetmeats are in great repute in Naples. The foundling hospital and the lunatic asylum, the latter founded by Murat, are well known. Pop. about 21,000.—This place had formerly a castle, which served for an occasional palatial residence of the kings of Naples; it was replaced by a convent, in which Andreas of Hungary, the husband of Queen Joanna I., was strangled, in September, 1345.

AVES, or BIRD ISLANDS, ai'-vees, a small group of the Lesser Antilles, belonging to Holland, in the West Indies. Lat. 15° 30′ N. Lon. 63° 15′ W.—These islands received their name from the great number of birds which frequent them.

AVESBURY, ROBERT OF, aivs'-bur-e, an English historian who wrote the history of the reign of Edward III. as far as 1356.—This personage styles himself registrar of the archbishop of Canterbury's court. The principal excellence of his work consists in the accuracy of its dates, and the simplicity with which he works his facts into a plain narrative.

Died 1356.

AVESNES, or AVENNES, a-vain', a fortified town on the river Helpe, in the department of the Nord, France, 50 miles S.E. of Lille. It is generally well built, and has a cathedral with a tower 330 feet high. Manf. Hosiery, serges, and soap. It has some tanneries, breweries, and marble-sawing works. Pop. about 3,700.—The name of several other smaller places in France.

AVEYRON, or AVEIRON, a'-vai-rong, a department in the S. of France, bounded N. by the department of the Cantal, N.E. by Lozère, E. by Gard, S.E. by Hérault, S.W. by Tarn, and W. by Lot. It is 70 miles long with an average breadth of 40, and corresponds with a large portion of the ancient district of Romergne in Guienne.

Area.—3,385 square miles.

Desc.—Mountainous, especially in the N., where are numerous offshoots of the Cevennes and Cantal ranges. The W. consists chiefly of plains, well cultivated and productive, while the S. may be regarded as a high table-land connecting the Cevennes with the mountains of Cannes.

Rivers.—The Lot, with its feeders, the Truyère and the Dourdon; the Aveyron, with its affluents the Serre, Alson, and Caude on the right, and on the left the Viaur, the Ceron, and the Verre; the Tarn, with its tributaries the Dourbie, the Lorgue, and the Rance.

Pro.—Oats, rye, wheat, truffles, chestnuts, and, where the soil is good, vineyards are planted. A great many horses, mules, and cattle are raised. Goats, sheep, and swine are numerous; and oxen and cows are used for ploughing.

Minerals.—Silver, copper, zinc, antimony, sulphur, alum, coal, iron, marble, rock-crystal, serpentine, marl, and gypsum. The department is rich in coal-mines.

Towns.—There are five arrondissements, of which the capitals are RODEZ, ESPALION, MILHAU, SAINT-AFFRIQUE, and VILLEFRANCHE.

Manf. Woollen stuffs, cotton goods, paper, leather, and iron wares.

Pop. 415,075.

Lat. between 43° 51′ and 44° 45′ N Lon. between 1° 50 and 2° 25′ E.

AVEYRON, a rapid river of France, rising from the springs of the Cevennes mountains, and after a course of 130 miles, falling into the Tarn a little above Moissac. Like most of the rivers of France, it is liable to sudden floods from the melting of snows and heavy rains.

AVICENNA, or IBN-SINA, a physician and philosopher of Bokhara, who was a prodigy of youthful learning, and rose from a very humble position to be vizier. His scholarship was most extensive, but he ruined his health by indulgence in licentious pleasures. His works on medicine and philosophy greatly influenced the schoolmen of the Western world.

Born at Afshena, in Bokhara, 980; died at Hamadan, 1037.

AVIENUS, RUFUS FESTUS, a Latin poet, and writer on geography.

Lived in the latter half of the 6th century.

AVIGLIANO, a-veel'-ye-a'-no, a town of Italy, in the province of Basilicata, 11 miles from Turin. In the neighbourhood of this town the finest and largest oxen in the kingdom are raised. Pop. 16,000.—In 1824, from a continuous fall of rain, a landslip carried away a considerable portion of the town.

AVIGNON, a-veen'-yong, a large and beautiful city of France, the capital of the department Vaucluse, situate on the left bank of the Rhone, just above the junction of the Durance, has narrow streets, but contains elegant churches and other public buildings. The palace formerly occupied by the popes is built in the old Gothic style, erected in the latter half of the 14th century, on the southern slope of the rock of Doms, and near it is the cathedral of Notre Dame, erected in the 12th century. Among the churches, those of St. Agricol, St. Didier, and St. Pierre are the most interesting. There are two museums, two convents, a town-hall, Hôtel des Invalides, a royal college, barracks, and other public buildings. The tomb of Petrarch's Laura, in the church of the Cordeliers, has been destroyed, and only a fragment of the church is left. The ancient walls still surround the town, and beyond this runs a fine avenue of trees, fully three miles long. Manf. Silk stuffs, leather, paper, jewellery, saltpetre, oil of vitriol, and aquafortis, with several printing-establishments and copper-works. Its trade consists of wine, brandy, almonds, dried fruits, olives, oil, saffron, truffles, corn, and wool, all the products of the district in which it stands.—A railway connects the city with Cette, and the great trunk line connects it with Lyons and Paris. Constant communication is kept up by steamers with Marseilles, Lyons, and Arles.

Pop.—26,919.

AVILA, a-vé'-la, a town of Spain, capital of the province of the same name, on the river Adaja, at the termination of the Guadaramma mountains, 3,000 feet above the sea level. This was once one of the richest cities in Spain. There is a Gothic cathedral and several interesting churches, monasteries, and schools, and a foundling hospital. The ancient wall still exists. Manf. Chiefly the spinning of wool. Pop. 7,000.

AVILA, a province of Spain, one of the modern divisions of the kingdom of Old Castile, near the centre of the peninsula. Area, 2,570 square miles. Desc. Level in the N. and mountainous in the S. Rivers. The Alberche, Adaja, and several smaller streams. Pro. Grapes, mulberries, and other fruits, and the usual cerealia. A great many sheep of the Merino breed, pigs, and horned cattle are reared. Minerals. Not plentiful; but silver, copper, lead, iron, and coal are found and partially wrought. Manf. Cloth, paper, earthenware, hardware, soap, combs and copper utensils, and leather. Pop. 186,413.

AVILA, LUIS D', a Spanish historian, and commander of the order of Alcantara. He wrote the history of the war carried on by Charles V. against the German Protestants, and "Memoirs of the War in Africa."
Lived in the 16th century.

AVILA, GIL GARZALES D', a Spanish biographer and antiquary, who was appointed historiographer royal. His works are learned and voluminous.
Born at Avila, 1577; died 1658.

AVILA, SANCHO D', a Spanish commander, who served under the duke of Alva and Requesens in the Netherlands, and equalled the ferocious Alva in his atrocities. He defeated Louis of Nassau, and gave up Antwerp to what is called the "Spanish fury." He was killed at the seige of Maestricht.
Died 1570.

AVILES, SAN NICOLAS D', a-vee'-les, a town and port of Spain, province of Oviedo, near the sea coast. Manf. Copper vessels, earthenware, glass, linen, damasks, and cambric. There are copper and coal mines, and stone quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 3,200. Lat. 43° 35' N. Lon. 5° 51' W.

AVIZ, a-veez', a walled town of Portugal, on the river Aviz, 27 miles from Portalègre. Pop. 1,415.—This was the principal place of the order of Military Knights of Aviz, founded by Alphonse I. in 1146.

AVLONA, or VALONA, av-lo'-na, a town and seaport of Albania, Turkey in Europe, in the eyalet of Yanina. It is pleasantly situated on an eminence near the Gulf of Avlona, an inlet of the Adriatic; is visited by Austrian steamers and carries on a regular intercourse with Brindisi. Pop. about 8,000. Lat. 40° 27' N. Lon. 19° 26' E.

AVOCA, or OVOCA, a-vo'-ka, a valley and river of county Wicklow, Ireland, celebrated as the scene of one of the many beautiful lyrics of Thomas Moore—"The Meeting of the Waters."

AVOLA, a-vo'-la, a seaport town of Sicily, 12 miles from Syracuse. Manf. Home-grown sugar, and it does a considerable trade in cattle, corn, wine, fruit, and oil. Pop. about 12,000.—This town occupies the supposed site of the ancient Ibla, and was built after an earthquake, which, in 1693, destroyed the ancient Avola.

AVON, ăv'-on, a name common to several rivers in both England and Scotland. 1. A river of Scotland, which rises in the county of Banff, and falls into the Spey. 2. Another in the county of Lanark, which falls into the Clyde, near Hamilton. 3. Another which falls into the Frith of Forth west of Borrowstounness. 4. A river of England (Shakspeare's Avon), rises in Northamptonshire, and after passing Warwick and Stratford, falls into the Severn at Tewkesbury. 5. A river, rising in Wiltshire, and falling into the English Channel. 6. Another of South Wales, which runs into the Bristol Channel. 7. Another of North Wales, which flows into the Irish Sea. In France, there are two Avons in the system of the Loire, and two in the system of the Seine.

AVON, a river of Nova Scotia, which falls into the Atlantic, eastward of Halifax.—It is the name of some small places in the United States, AVONDALE, or AVENDALE, ăv'-on-dail, a parish of Lanarkshire, Scotland, not far from Strathaven. Area, 40,000 acres. Pop. about 7,000. Here, at the battle of Drumclog, fought June 1, 1679, Claverhouse was defeated by the Covenanters.

AVOYELLES, av-oi-elz', a county of Louisiana, United States, at the mouth of the Red River. The surface is nearly level, and the eastern part is subject to periodical overflow. In the west are prairies. Sugar cane, cotton, and Indian corn are grown. Marksville is the chief town. Pop. 16,747.

AVRANCHES, av'-ranzh, a town of Lower Normandy, France, in the department of Manche, 30 miles from St. Lô. The cathedral church, founded in 1120, was destroyed in the time of the first French Revolution; but a new cathedral is in course of erection. St. Saturnin's church has a remarkable gateway. There are an episcopal palace, now used as a museum, and a public library. The site of the old cathedral is an open place, and a stone marks the spot where Henry II. of England received absolution for the murder of Thomas à Becket. Manf. Chiefly lace; but it trades in grain, flax, hemp, cattle, butter, wheat, salt, and cider. Pop. about 8,000.

AWASI, or AWADSI, a-wa'-se, a Japanese island, off the south coast of Niphon. Area, about 520 square miles. The principal town is of the same name. Lat. 34° 30' N. Lon. 134° 31' E.

AWE, LOCH, aw. (See ARGYLE.)

AX, aks, a town of France, department of the Ariège, 20 miles from Foix. Much frequented on account of its thermal springs. Pop. 2,000.

AX, or AXE, ăks, a river of England, which falls into the sea a little below Axmouth.—Another which falls into the Bristol Channel, about 8 miles lower down.

AXEL, aks'-el, a town of Holland, 27 miles from Antwerp, and the capital of a canton of the same name, in an island in the Scheldt. Pop. 2,200, chiefly devoted to agricultural pursuits.

AXHOLME, or AXELHOME, ISLE OF, ăks'-home, Lincolnshire, is formed by the rivers Trent, Idle, and Don. Ext. 17 miles long and 5 broad. Area, 47,800 acres. Desc. Fertile, and large quantities of hemp, flax, rape, and turnip-seed, are cultivated. Pop. upwards of 12,000.—In 1747 the body of a woman was found buried in a peat moss in this island, and, as she had antique sandals on her feet, it is supposed that she had lain there for ages. Her hair, her nails, and her skin showed scarcely any signs of decay.

AXIM, a part of the fertile country of Ahanta, on the Gold Coast.

AXMINSTER, ăks'-min-ster, a market town of Devonshire, on the Ax, 24 miles from Exmouth. Manf. Druggets, woollen cloths, cotton, gloves, tape, and leather. Pop. 5,186. A station on the London and South Western Railway. The abbey church, or minster, in the centre of the town, is a very ancient edifice, and contains some antique monuments. It was founded by Athelstan to commemorate a battle fought with the Danes in the neighbourhood.

AXTEL, DANIEL, ăks'-tel, a colonel in the Parliamentary army during the civil war, who was originally a grocer, but becoming a follower of the Puritans, was persuaded to engage against the king. He had the principal charge of Charles I. on his trial, and behaved with singular brutality. He accompanied Cromwell to Ireland, where his courage procured him the governorship of Kilkenny. In 1659 he returned to England, to prevent, if possible, the restoration of Charles II. In 1660 he was seized by the royalists, tried for high treason, and executed.

AXUM, ăks'-um, the capital of the kingdom of Tigré, in Abyssinia, near the site of the ancient capital of Abyssinia, of which there are some remains. The church of Axum appears to have been built in 1657, and is considered as the finest in the province of Tigré, except that of Chelicut.

AY, or AI, ai, a town of France, on the river Marne, celebrated for its wine. Pop. 3,300.

AYACUCHO, a'-ya-koo'-cho, a town of Peru, in the department of the same name. Here, on December 9, 1824, the Spaniards were totally defeated by the Peruvians; and with this battle ended the dominion of Spain in America.

AYALA, PEDRO LOPEZ DE, a-ya'-la, the most popular of Spanish chroniclers, and a great favourite of several of the kings of Castile. He was made prisoner at the battle of Najera, in 1367, brought to England, where he was cast into a dark dungeon, and fettered with chains. His sorrows and sufferings in this state of "durance vile" are described in his poems. He was set at liberty after the payment of a large ransom; and, returning to Castile, was again actively engaged in the service of the crown. He was the contemporary of Froissart, and his chronicle embraces that period of history when Spain was most nearly connected with the political action of France and England.

Born at Murcia, 1332; died at Calahoma, 1407.

AYAMONTE, a'-ya-mon'-tai, a fortified town of Spain, in the province of Huelva, near the mouth of the Guadiana. There is a good harbour. Manf. Soap and silk weaving, but the principal employment of the inhabitants is in connection with the fisheries. Pop. about 6,000.

AYESHA, ai-ē'-sha, wife of Mahomet, and daughter of Abubeker, one of the first and warmest supporters of the prophet. Though she bore her husband no children, yet he loved her better than his other wives; and in his last illness had himself conveyed to her house, where he died in her arms. She opposed the succession of Ali, and levied an army against him. After a severe contest she was taken prisoner, but was treated by the conqueror with great lenity.

Born at Medina, 610; died 677.

AYLESBURY, ails'-bur-e, a borough and market-town of Bucks, 39 miles N.W. of London, situate in the fertile vale of Aylesbury. The parish church, recently restored, is a large cruciform structure, combining the Early English and the Perpendicular styles of architecture, and there are a county-hall, corn exchange, market house, and jail, all handsome buildings; a free grammar school, county infirmary, and several places of worship. Manf. Chiefly lace and straw-plait. The rearing of ducks for the London market is a profitable branch of industry. A branch canal connects the town with the Great Junction Canal. Pop. 10,086. It is a station on the London and North-Western and Great Western Railways.

AYLESFORD, ails'-ford, a town of Kent, on the Medway, which is here crossed by a stone bridge, 3 miles from Maidstone. The church stands on an adjoining eminence. Area, 3,330 acres. Pop. 12,734.—In this parish is the cromlech called Kit's Coity house, which is supposed to indicate the burying-place of Catigern, who, in 455, was here slain, with his enemy Horsa, in the third battle fought between the Saxons and the Britons.

AYLMER, JOHN, ail'mer, an English prelate, who was tutor to Lady Jane Grey. In 1553 he was made archdeacon of Stow, in Lincolnshire, and exerted himself strenuously against popery. On the accession of Mary he was forced to leave his country, but found a quiet retreat amidst the beautiful scenery of Zurich. Whilst here he answered a pamphlet published by the celebrated John Knox against government by women. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, he returned to his native country, was appointed archdeacon of Lincoln, and was a member of the famous synod of 1562, and in 1576 was made bishop of London. He was a very energetic prelate, and severe against the Puritans, for which he has been severely censured by their writers. He was "the bad shepherd" of Spenser's "Shepherd's Calendar," and appears to have been of a harsh and violent temper; but it is said that he was learned in the languages, a deep divine, and a ready disputant.

Born at Telney, Norfolk, 1521; died 1594.

AYLOFFE, SIR JOSEPH, ai'-lof, of Framfield, in Sussex, an eminent antiquary, and fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. In 1737 he was appointed secretary to the commissioners for building Westminster bridge, and became one of the keepers of the state papers in the Paper-office. He printed in 1772 calendars of the ancient charters, &c., in the Tower of London. He also edited "Leland's Collectanea," in 9 vols. "Liber Niger Scaccari," and "Hearne's Curious Discourses," besides other works. There are many curious papers of his in the "Archæologia."

Born at Framfield, Sussex, 1709; died 1781.

AYMAR, or AIMAR, JACQUES, ai'-mar, a French impostor, who gained considerable wealth at the close of the 17th century by pretending to have a divining-rod, whereby he could discover hidden treasure. The fraud being detected, he returned to his former obscurity; but it gave occasion to De Vallemont's learned book on the powers of the divining-rod.

Born at St. Veran, Dauphiné, 1662.

AYR, air, a river of Scotland, which rises on the borders of Lanarkshire, and, after a westward course of 33 miles, falls into the sea, and forms a harbour at the town of Ayr.

AYR, a royal burgh and seaport of Ayrshire, of which it is the capital, situate at the mouth of the river of the same name, 40 miles by railway S.S.W. of Glasgow. The town is remarkably clean, well paved, and lighted with gas. The "Twa Brigs" of Burns connect the town with the suburbs, Newton and Wallace-town, both on the right bank of the river, which is also crossed by a railway bridge. In the High street there is an erection called Wallace's Tower, 113 feet high, standing on the site of an old structure, in which it is said that Wallace occasionally lived. The chief public edifices are the Town's Buildings, containing assembly rooms, and surmounted by a very fine spire 217 feet high; the County Buildings, a jail, and a large academy, besides two parish churches and other places of worship for the various denominations in the town. Manf. Shipbuilding, rope and sail-making, carpets, woollen goods, and leather. There are foundries and engineering establishments; and a large trade in timber, iron, and coal is carried on, and there is a good coasting trade. The harbour is protected by two piers and a breakwater. Pop. of the royal burgh, 85,25. Large docks are in the course of construction. Alloway Kirk, and Burns's Monument and birthplace are about two miles from the town. Lat. 55° 28′ N. Lon. 4° 37′ W. The Glasgow and South-western Railway connects Ayr with all the principal lines of Scotland and England.

AYRSHIRE, air-shire, a maritime county of Scotland, bounded N. by Renfrewshire, E. by the counties of Lanark and Dumfries, S. by Wigtownshire, and W. by the Irish Channel and Frith of Clyde. Ext. 70 miles, with a varying breadth of from 12 to 26. Area, 1,149 square miles. Desc. Hilly to a considerable extent, but much of the county is fertile and productive. The insular rock of Ailsa, and the two Cumbraes, belong to it. Rivers. The Stinchar, Lugar, Girvan, Doon, Irvine, Garnock, and Ayr; most of these rivers rise in the shire and fall into the sea or the Clyde. There are several fresh water lochs, the largest of which is Loch Doon. Minerals. Copper, lead, and iron are found; also black-lead and antimony. There is a vast abundance of coal of different kinds, in successive seams, limestone, freestone of the best quality, agates, porphyry, jasper, and calcareous petrifactions. Manf. Woollen, cotton, muslin, thread, iron, and chemicals; the iron trade is of great importance. Towns. The principal are Ayr, Kilmarnock, Irvine, Maybole, and Ardrossan. Pop. 217,504.—In the parish of Alloway, in this shire, Burns the poet was born, in 1759.

AYR HEAD, or POINT OF, the northern point of the Isle of Man, on which is a revolving light, 106 feet high. Lat. 54° 24′ 59″ N. Lon. 4° 21′ 59″ W.

AYRER, JACOB, ay'-rair, German dramatist, originally a dealer in iron; he studied the law, and achieved a good position. He adapted some of Shakspeare's plays to the German stage.
Born 1560; died 1605.

AYSCUE, SIR GEORGE, ais'-ku, a brave admiral, descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire, and knighted by Charles I. He early declared for the Commonwealth, and distinguished himself greatly in the wars against the Dutch. In 1651 he and Admiral Blake reduced the Scilly Isles, and afterwards, proceeding to the West Indies, Sir George effected the conquest of Barbadoes and other islands. After the Restoration, he was appointed rear-admiral of the Blue, and in 1666 he hoisted his flag on board the Royal Prince, the finest ship then in the world. He was engaged in the great fight with the Dutch, in 1666, which lasted four days; but, on the third day, striking on the Galloper Shoal, his crew forced him to yield to the enemy. After remaining in Holland a prisoner for some time, he was permitted to return to England, where he spent the remainder of his days in retirement. The date of his birth and death are unknown.

AYTON, or AYTOUN, SIR ROBERT, a native of Fifeshire, in Scotland, and the author of poems in the Latin, Greek, French, and English languages. He was employed, both at home and abroad, by James I. and Charles I.; and Aubrey says that "he was acquainted with all the wits of his time in England." He was very intimate with Hobbes, as well as with "rare Ben Jonson." It is affirmed that the poems attributed to him in his own vernacular were greatly admired by Burns, who founded his "Auld Lang Syne" upon one of them.
Born at Kinaldie, 1570; died at Whitehall, 1638.

AYTOUN, a'-toon, WILLIAM EDMONSTOUNE, professor of literature and belles-lettres in the University of Edinburgh, and editor of "Blackwood's Magazine." To this celebrated periodical he was a long time a contributor, under the nom de plume of Augustus Dunshunner; and he married the daughter of Professor Wilson, the former editor of Blackwood. Aytoun studied for the law, but adopted literature as his profession. His "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" are chiefly illustrations of the stirring scenes of the mediæval history of Scotland, and place before us in vivid representation, some of the most striking incidents and events that have occupied the best historical pens. In conjunction with Mr. Theodore Martin, he wrote the "Bon Gaultier Ballads," and was also the author of "Firmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy," designed to ridicule a false and extravagant taste in some of the modern followers of the muses; "Poland, and other poems;" "Bothwell," a long poem; "The Life and Times of Richard Cœur de Lion;" "Ballads of Scotland;" "Norman Sinclair," a novel, &c.
Born at Edinburgh, 1813; died near Elgin, 1865.

AZAIS, PIERRE HYACINTHE, a-zay', French author, who, having been persecuted for attacking the principles of the Revolution in a pamphlet, obtained the favour of Napoleon by a treatise in favour of a fixed government. He elaborated a system of philosophy, in which he maintained that the whole of existence is the product of two elements, matter and force. He also wrote on phrenology and magnetism.
Born at Sorreze, 1766; died at Paris, 1845.

AZARIAH, or UZZIAH, az-a-ri'-a, king of Judah, succeeded Amaziah about 810 B.C. He began his reign with great reputation, but at the close of it turned idolator, and died a leper.—Many persons of this name are mentioned in the Scriptures, but the most celebrated was the above king.

AZAUGHAL, a-zaw'-gal, a town of Spanish Estremadura, 24 miles S.S.E. of Badajoz. It is enclosed in a valley by three hills. Pop. about 3,000, employed in the manufacture of brandy, weaving, and the pursuits of agriculture.

AZAY, a-zay, the name of several small parishes and towns in France.

AZCOITIA, ath-koi'-te-a, a town of Biscay, in Spain, at the foot of the mountain Itzarriz, 20 miles from Tolosa. Manf. Hardware and iron nails. There are some flour-mills in the neighbourhood, which is rich in the production of grain, fruits, chestnuts, and vegetables. Pop. 3,795.

AZERBIJAN, or ADERBEITZAN, a'-zer-bi-jan', a fertile province of Persia, part of ancient Media. It is mountainous, some of its ranges varying between 7,000 and 9,000 feet high; one of its peaks, Mount Savalany, attaining an elevation of between 12,000 and 13,000 feet.

Area.—25,280 square miles.
Rivers.—The Aras, or Araxes, and its affluent the Karasu, on the N.; the Kizil-Ozein, with its numerous tributaries, on the S.; and several others which fall into Lake Urumiyah.
Lakes.—Urumiyah, which, being salt, is one of the most remarkable features of the province.

Pro.—Maize, rye, barley, flax, rice, hemp, madder cotton, honey, wax, fruits, and grapes. A great number of horses, camels, cattle, and sheep are reared.

Minerals.—Iron, lead, copper, salt, saltpetre, and sulphur.

Manf.—Velvets, carpets, woollens, silk stuffs, arms, copper utensils, and some cutlery. There are several large tanneries, and dressing skins and furs is a general employment.

Climate.—Generally healthy, though intensely cold in the winter and hot in the summer and autumn months.

Towns.—The principal are TABREZ, the capital, Mcanna, Shebuster, Shar, Shelmast Khoi, Urumiyah, and Maragha.

Pop.—2,000,000.

Lat. between 36° and 40° N. Lon. between 44° and 48° 44′ E.—On account of the grinding system of taxation pursued by the government, in 1832 a colony of 40,000 Armenians left this province and settled in the Russian territories.

AZEGLIO, MASSIMO TAPARELLI, marquis d', a-zay'-le-o, Italian statesman and author, descended from a noble Piedmontese family. He was a constitutional monarchist, and opposed to the conspiracies and insurrections fostered by the revolutionary party. His advice is said to have influenced Pope Pius IX. to adopt liberal measures. He was a member of the first Sardinian parliament, and in 1849 president of the Cabinet of Victor Emmanuel.

Born at Turin, 1798; died 1866.

AZERGUE, BAHR-EL, or the BLUE RIVER, a'-zer-goo, the principal stream of Abyssinia, which, after a winding course through Abyssinia and Sennaar, falls into the Nile above Gerri.

AZIMGHUR, or AZIMGARH, a'-zim-gur', a town in the Benares division of British India, 60 miles from Benares. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 26° N. Lon. 83° 14′ E.

AZIMGHUR, or AZIMGARH, the district of which the preceding is the capital. The soil is fertile, and highly cultivated, bearing large crops of rice, sugar-cane, and indigo. Manf. Principally cotton and silk. Pop. 1,604,654. nearly all Hindoos.

AZINCOURT. (See AGINCOURT.)

AZMERIGUNGE, az'-mer-i-goonj, a town of further India, in the presidency of Bengal, 76 miles from Dacca. It has a considerable inland trade, and a place for the construction of native boats.

AZOF, or AZOV, az'-of, the ancient Palus Mæotis, an inland sea of Asiatic Russia, on the confines of Tartary, communicating with the Black Sea by a narrow channel, called the Straits of Yenikale. Ext. About 235 miles from N.E. to S.W., with a breadth of 110 at its greatest part. The soundings in general give from 35 to 40 feet in depth; therefore it is not very deep; but a great portion of the produce of Siberia is transported by it from the Don, which debouches into it at its N.E. extremity. The whole surface, except a portion towards the centre, freezes during about a month in winter. Lat. 45° 20′ to 47° 18′ N. Lon. 35° to 39° E.

AZOPH, AZOF, or AZOV, a fortified town of Asiatic Russia, on the eastern extremity of the above sea, at the mouth of the river Don. It is situate on a high ridge, on the same site where it is supposed that the ancient Tanais stood. The town was formerly of much greater importance than at present, owing to the silting up of the harbour. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the fisheries. Pop. about 16,000. Lat. 47° N. Lon. 39° 14′ E.

AZORES, or WESTERN ISLANDS, a-zores', a group of nine islands in the Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Portugal, from which they are distant 800 miles. They are divided into three groups, of which the most eastern consists of the island of ST. MICHAEL, with the small adjacent one of ST. MARY; the middle and largest is composed of the five islands of TERCERA, GRACIOSA, ST. GEORGE, PICO, and FAYAL. The small islands of Corvo and Flores lie considerably further west, and appear almost detached from the others. All the islands are volcanic, with rugged perpendicular coasts, subject to earthquakes, of which the most remarkable is that of 1591, which continued twelve days without intermission, and destroyed entirely the flourishing town of Villa Franca. Besides these occasional and dreadful explosions, the existence of subterraneous fire is constantly indicated by numerous hot springs throughout the islands. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, however, the soil throughout the islands may be considered as exceedingly fertile.

Area.—700 square miles.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, and Indian corn, besides fruits of all kinds, sugar-cane, coffee, tobacco, and rocella. The best vines are raised on the lofty sides of the Pico, which attains an elevation of 1,869 feet.

Pop.—Upwards of 260,000, being a mixed race of negroes and Portuguese.

Lat. between 36° 55′ and 39° 55′ N., and between Lon. 25° and 1° 16′ E.

History.—The Azores were first colonized by the Portuguese in the 15th century. Their name is derived from Azor, the Portuguese word for hawk, many of that species of bird having been seen in them at the time.

AZPEYTIA, ath-pi'-te-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Guipuscoa, 15 miles S.W. of San Sebastian. Manf. Nails, iron utensils, and shoes. Pop. 2,300.—About a mile from this place, on the banks of the Urola, in a house which is still preserved within the marble walls of a convent that bears his name, Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was born.

AZTECS, az'-teks, the name of a tribe of Indians who last settled in that part of America now called Mexico. In the 15th century it is conjectured by Humboldt that by success in war they had extended their conquests over 60,000 square miles of country. (See AMERICA and MEXICO.)

AZUN, VAL D', a'-zu(r)n, a lovely valley in the south of France, called the "Eden of the Pyrenees," reaching to the base of the Pic du Midi, and crossed by an important road into Spain.

AZUNI DOMENICO ALBERTI, atz'-u-nee, Italian jurist, author of works of great value on commercial and maritime law.

Born at Sassari, Sardinia, 1749; died at Caghari. 1827.

AZZANA, CASTEL D', ath-a'-na, a village of Northern Italy, 5 miles from Verona, where, in May 1799, the Austrians were defeated by the French.

B

[The population of places in the United Kingdom is given according to the Census of 1871. The rate of increase is, on the average, nearly 1 per cent. per annum.]

BAADER, FRANZ ZAVIER VON, bah'-der, German philosopher and theologian. He was the son of the court physician to the elector of Bavaria, and for a time studied and practised medicine, but afterwards adopted the profession of mining engineer, in which he greatly distinguished himself. In 1826 he was appointed professor of philosophy and speculative theology in the new university of Munich. He published many works in opposition to rationalism in theology. The influence of the mystical theories of Böhme is marked; but he occupies a very eminent position in German philosophical literature.

Born at Munich, 1765; died 1841.

BAADSTED, or BATSTED. bad'-sted, a seaport-town of Sweden, in the province of Schonen. Lat. 56° 28′ N. Lon. 12° 45′ E.

BAAGOE, ba'go, two small islands in the Baltic. Lat. 54° 56′ N. Lon. 12° 3′ E.

BAAL, or BEL, bai'-al, "lord," the title of the principal idol among the Chaldeans; and the "sun-god" of the Phœnicians and Syrians.

BA'ALBEC, bai'-al-bek, the ancient Heliopolis, a town of Syria, situate in a fertile valley, at the foot of Antilibanus. It is about 35 miles N.N.W. from Damascus, and is small and meanly built, surrounded by ruinous walls, flanked by square towers, and four miles in circuit. Pop. about 1,000. Lat. 34° 1′ N. Lon. 36° 11′ E. Here are to be found some splendid remains of antiquity, particularly a magnificent temple, said to have been built by the emperor Antoninus Pius, in the 2nd century. It stands on an elevated platform, and consisted of an octagonal and great court, the latter occupying nearly four acres, leading to the temple, which was 290 feet long by 161 wide. Some of the massive walls and six of the 54 stupendous columns of the peristyle remain. Near it are the ruins of the temple of the sun, which, though smaller than the other, was larger than the Parthenon of Athens; and to the east a very beautiful circular temple. Until the time of the Moslem invasion Baalbec was a place of considerable importance and great splendour. In 1401 it was taken by Tamerlane, and in 1759 it was visited by an earthquake, which nearly reduced it to ruins.

BAAL-ZEBUB, ze-bub, "lord of the fly," an idol worshipped as a protector against swarms of flies.

BAAN, JAN DE, bahn, Dutch portrait-painter, who resided some time in England. He refused to paint the portrait of Louis XIV. of France, who was at war with his country. His son, Jacobus, who died young, was an admired painter.

Born at Haarlem, 1633; died at the Hague, 1702.

BAARLE, barl, a village of the Netherlands, in Brabant, 12 miles from Breda. Pop. about 2,000.

BAB, or "the gate," the title assumed by Seyed Mohammed Ali, a remarkable modern religious reformer of Persia. After a pilgrimage to Mecca, in 1843, he produced a new commentary on the Koran, and engaged in an active controversy with the mollahs. He announced himself as the recipient of a new revelation, and the focus in which all previous dispensations converged. The attempts of the authorities to repress his doctrines led to a civil war, and Seyed was taken prisoner and condemned to death. With one of his followers, he was suspended from a lofty wall, and then fired at by a company of soldiers. The bullets cut the cords which held Seyed, and he fell to the ground unharmed, but was then despatched. His doctrines are pantheistic, and his precepts inculcate morality and charity, forbidding polygamy and concubinage, and enforcing great respect for women. One of his most active disciples was a very beautiful woman, Gourred-oub-ayn ("consolation of the eye"), who suffered death in 1852.

Born 1814; died 1850.

BABA, ba'-ba, a seaport-town and cape near the W. extremity of Anatolia, in Asia Minor. Manf. Good cutlery. Pop. 4,000.

BABA-DAGH, or BABALDAG, ba'-ba-da, a town of European Turkey, 90 miles from Silistria. It has several mosques, and a considerable trade through the port of Kara Kerman, an outlet of Lake Rassein, on the Black Sea. Pop. 10,000. The town was founded by Bajazet in the 14th century.

BABAHOYO, ba'-ba-ho'-yo, the capital of a district of the same name in South America, situate on the river of the same name. Lat. 1° 47′ S.

BABAKANDA, bab-a-kan'-da, a town of West Africa. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 10° 2′ N. Lon. 2° 53′ E.

BABBAGE, CHARLES, bab'-age, an eminent mathematician, the inventor of the calculating machine, the originator of the Statistical Society, and one of the founders of the Astronomical Society. He was for many years professor of mathematics at Cambridge. The writings of this mathematician embrace a wide field of scientific knowledge.

Born at Teignmouth, 1792; died in London, 1871.

BABEC, ba'-bec, a town of Persia, on the confines of the province of Kirman, formerly a fine city, but now falling into decay. Lat. 30° 3′ N. Lon. 54° 18′ E.

BAB-EL-MANDEB, STRAITS OF, bai'-bel-măn'-deb, "the gate of tears," a channel uniting the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, 20 miles broad. The rocky isle of Perim divides the channel into two straits, the eastern named Bab Iskender; the western, Dad-el-Mayan. (See ASIA.)

BABELTHUAP, bai'-bel-thu'-ap, the largest of the Pelew Islands, in the Pacific, having a circumference of about 50 miles. Lat. 7° 30′ N. Lon. 134° 40′ E.

BABER, or BABUR, bai-ber, the, word meaning the "tiger," a surname given to Zehir-eddin-Mahomet, the conqueror of India and founder of the Mogul dynasty. He was the son of Omar Sheikh, king of Farghana, between Samarcand and the Indus. He succeeded his father when 12 years of age, in 1495, was deprived of his possessions in 1501, but captured Cabul and established a kingdom in 1504. Being unable to recover his original possessions, he invaded India, and by a series of victories established a great empire, the capital of which was Agra. He was a man of cultivated mind.

Born 1483; died 1530.

BABEUF, FRANÇOIS NOEL, ba'-buf, a French writer, who, at the commencement of the French revolution, ardently supported its principles in a journal of Amiens; and, on account of the violence of his writing, was twice tried, but acquitted. He afterwards assumed the revolutionary name of Gracchus, and conducted an incendiary journal called the "Tribune of the People;" and, joining a secret society whose plans were divulged by one of the members, he was condemned to be guillotined for conspiracy. On hearing his sentence he stabbed himself, but was nevertheless borne bleeding and dying to the scaffold. Under the name of Babouvism, his theories became the germ of modern communism.

Born 1762; died 1797.

BABILUS, bab'-i-lus, an astrologer in Nero's age, who told the emperor that he would avert the danger which seemed to hang over his head from the appearance of a hairy comet, by putting all the leading men of Rome to death. His advice was faithfully followed.

BABINGTON, ANTONY, bab'-ing-ton, a gentleman of Derbyshire, who associated with other zealous Roman Catholics to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, and to liberate Mary Queen of Scots. Babington, some say, was stimulated to this enterprise in the hopes that Mary, out of gratitude, would take him for her husband. The plot was discovered by Walsingham, and he, with thirteen other conspirators, was executed.

Died 1586.

BABINGTON, GERVASE, an English bishop; chosen for the see of Llandaff, 1591; translated to Worcester, 1597. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, and other Biblical works.

Born 1550; died 1610.

BABINGTON, WILLIAM, an eminent mineralogist, physician, and chemical lecturer at Guy's Hospital, London. He was one of the founders, if not the founder, of the Geological Society, and was the personal friend of most of the scientific men of his day.

Born at Ban, near Coleraine, in Ireland, 1756; died in London, 1833.

BABINI, MATTEO, ba-be'-ne, an eminent vocalist, who attained such proficiency as to become the most celebrated singer of his age. He introduced many improvements on the lyric stage, such as suitably dressing the actors for their parts, and singing the recitatives in operas, which had previously been declaimed, the airs only being vocalized. He amassed a considerable fortune, and retired to Bologna, his native town, where he died. Babini was as noted for the gentleness of his manners and disposition as for his excellence in music.

Born February 10, 1754; died at Bologna, 1816.

BABINOVITCHI, ba'-bi-no-vit-chi, a small town of European Russia, on the Loutchessa, in the government of Mohilev, 60 miles from Mohilev. Lat. 54° 52′ N. Lon. 30° 14′ E.

BABRIUS, bai'-bri-us, a Greek fabulist, who was supposed by Bentley and other scholars to have written metrical fables, on which some of those generally ascribed to Æsop are founded. He probably lived in the 1st century.

BABUYANES, or MADJICOSIMA ISLANDS, ba-boo'-ya-nes, a number of islands lying about 30 miles N. of the island of Luzon, and generally considered the most northern of the Philippines. Pop., united, about 12,000. Lat. 18° 58′ to 19° 42′ N. Lon. 121° 15′ to 122° 5′ E. Subject to the Loo-Choo Islands.

BABYLON, a celebrated city, the capital of the Assyrian empire, on the banks of the Euphrates, and about 60 miles from Bagdad. The modern town of Hillah is supposed to occupy a part of its site. It had 100 brazen gates, and its walls, which were cemented with bitumen, measured 60 miles in circumference, 87 feet in thickness, and 350 in height. Two other walls were along the banks of the Euphrates. There were two palaces, one called "the admiration of the world," built by Nebuchadnezzar, in the precincts of which were the famous "hanging gardens." The most remarkable edifice was the temple of Bel, on the north-east of the city. It was a pyramidal structure of eight stages, surmounted by a golden image of Bel, 40 feet high, a golden table 40 feet long, and other golden objects. The city was taken by Cyrus, B.C. 538, after he had drained the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and marched his troops by night into the town through the dried bed. It was subsequently taken by Alexander the Great, and became famous on account of its being the place of his death. From it arose the new empire, which was afterwards established under the Seleucidæ.

BABYLONIA, an ancient empire, occupying the level district about the lower course of the Euphrates, now known as El-Jezireh. It is referred to in the Old Testament as Shinar Babel, and the land of the Chaldees, and by the old Greek geographers as Chaldea, a denomination including the entire country lying between the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, and extending southward to the Persian Gulf. In the 16th century B.C. Assyria, the northern portion of this district, became an independent empire. The Babylonian territory was about 250 miles in length, interrupted only by a limestone range, named in different parts, Sarazin, Hamrin, and Sinjar, branching off from the Zagros Mountains. (See TURKISH EMPIRE.) The Euphrates, always a full stream, frequently overflows, inundating the whole district and adding to its fertility; but artificial canals and large lakes or reservoirs were constructed so as to carry off or store the surplus water. There are still traces of the great canal which connected the two rivers. It is now known as Nahr-el-Melik. The natural productiveness of the soil was increased by a most careful system of cultivation, and in the prosperous times of the empire the territory was a vast garden interspersed with many towns of great splendour and importance. Wood and stone were scarce, but there was abundance of clay, from which bricks were made, and bitumen, which was used instead of mortar. The population was very large. To the east the mountains of Elan formed the boundary; on the south were the sea marshes and the Persian Gulf; on the west the empire extended beyond the Euphrates to the confines of Arabia; on the north were Assyria and Mesopotamia. Ur, the Biblical "Ur of the Chaldees" (the modern Mugheir); Borsippa, a suburb of Babylon (the site now marked by Birs Nimroud); the two Sipparas (the Sepharvaim of Scripture), on opposite sides of the Euphrates; Erech, (now Narka); Nipur (now Niffer), Surippac; Cutha, or Tiggeba (now Ibrahim); Chilmad, (Kahvadah); Is (Hit); and Dur-aba (Akkerkuf), were among the most important towns, of which the chief traces are huge mounds in the neighbourhood of wretched little towns or scattered villages, beneath which lie buried the ruins and records of "Babylon the mighty," the earliest of the great empires of the world. The Araxes, or "River of Babylon," flowed through a deep valley into Arabia, and further south was the great lake of Nodjef, 40 miles long and 35 miles in greatest breadth. There was a considerable amount of civilization among the people of the Babylonian empire. Astronomy had its rise among the Chaldeans, and a regular series of observations were preserved by the astronomers of Babylon. Sculpture, though frequently grotesque in design, was generally colossal in size, and displayed great technical powers; gem-cutting and pottery were arts cultivated with success; and architecture was, considering the materials available, as the ruins show, greatly advanced. Manufactures and commerce were prosperous, and no doubt the great towns were among the wealthiest in the world. Education was under the control of the Chaldean priests, and there were two famous universities, at Erech and Borsippa. The earliest religion appears to have been a worship of Bel, or Baal, representing the all-pervading powers of nature, and especially the sun; but, as the inscriptions show, a most complex mythology grew out of the simple worship of the earlier Babylonians.

History.—The early history of Babylonia is involved in great obscurity. The old and long accepted chronologies have been discredited by the recent discoveries of inscriptions, and we must wait for further disclosures until more extensive investigations have been made. As in the case of Assyria, the annals of Ctesius have been resolved into myths; and it would appear that Berosus, the Babylonian priest, is in many respects a more trustworthy authority. But the chronology is wild, although his order of dynasties is supported by cuneiform inscriptions lately brought to light. He says that ten kings reigned before the Deluge, then came eight dynasties, covering a space of about 36,000 years! The Mosaic accounts, as we know, assert that Nimrod, the Cushite, was the founder of the kingdom; but the Greek writers award the honour to Belus, or Bel, afterwards deified. Our necessarily limited space will not permit us to enter on the discussion of so great and difficult a subject; but the following dates may be considered as approximatively correct for the more remote events, and rest on good historical foundation for the later incidents:—

	B.C.
Beginning of the early Chaldean empire	2234

BACALAR, bă'-ka-lar', a town of Yucatan, in Central America, 80 miles from Belize. Pop. about 5,000, consisting principally of Indians.

BACCALARY SANNA, VINCENT, bak-a-lar'-e, marquis of St. Philip, in Sardinia, and an eminent commander under Charles II. and Philip V. of Spain. He wrote the "Monarchy of the Hebrews," and "Memoirs of Philip V."
Died 1726.

BACCARAT, bă'-ka-ra, a town of France in the department of Meurthe, 15 miles from Luneville, on the Meurthe. Manf. Principally glass; there is a large export trade in timber and charcoal. Pop. 4,700.

BACCHANTES, or BACCHÆ, băk-ăn'-tes, priestesses of Bacchus, represented at the celebration of the orgies almost naked, with garlands of ivy, a thyrsus, and dishevelled hair. Their looks are wild, and they utter dreadful sounds, and clash various musical instruments together. They are also called Thyades and Menades.

BACCHIGLIONE, bă'-keel-ye-ó'-nai, a navigable river of north-eastern Italy, rising in the mountains eastward of Trent, and, after a course of 55 miles, falling into the lagunes of Venice.

BACCHIS, or BALUS, băk'-is, ba'-lus, king of Corinth, who succeeded his father Prumnides. His successors were always called Bacchidæ, in remembrance of the wisdom of his reign. The Bacchidæ increased so much that they chose one of their number to preside among them with regal authority. Cypselus overthrew this institution by making himself absolute.

BACCHIUS and BITHUS, băk'-i-us, bi'-thus, two celebrated gladiators of equal age and strength; whence the proverb to express equality, Bithus contra Bacchium.

BACCHUS, băk'-us, the Latin name of the Greek Dionysius, the son of Zeus, or Jupiter, and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. There are different traditions concerning the manner of his education, which has led some to infer that there were several of the same name. Diodorus speaks of three, and Cicero of a greater number; but among them all, the son of Jupiter and Semele seems to have obtained the merit of the rest. Bacchus is the Osiris of the Egyptians, and his history is drawn from the Egyptian traditions concerning that ancient king. In his youth he was taken asleep in the island of Naxos, and carried away by mariners, whom he changed into dolphins, except the pilot, who had expressed some concern at his misfortune. One of his first exploits was to recover his mother from the infernal regions, into which she had been cast, and by the piety of her son and the consent of Jupiter, she was raised to immortal honours under the name of Thyone. Of all his achievements, his expedition into the East is the most celebrated in poetry and legend. He marched at the head of an army composed of men and women, all inspired with divine fury, and armed with thyrsuses, cymbals, and other musical instruments. On this occasion he was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tiger, and Pan and Silenus, and all the satyrs, accompanied him. His conquests were easy and bloodless; the people readily submitted, and gratefully elevated to the rank of a god the hero who taught them the use of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the manner of gathering honey. With all his benevolence to mankind, he was, however, relentless in punishing disrespect to his divinity. As he was the god of vintage, of wine, and of drinkers, he is generally represented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrsus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joys which commonly prevail at feasts; and sometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine taken immoderately will enervate us, render us loquacious and childish, like old men, and unable to keep secrets. The panther was sacred to him, because he went on his expedition covered with its skin. The magpie was his favourite bird, because in triumphs people were permitted to speak with boldness and liberty. He is sometimes represented as an infant, holding a thyrsus and clusters of grapes with a horn; and often appears naked, riding upon the shoulders of Pan, or in the arms of his foster-father, Silenus. He also sits upon a globe bespangled with stars, and is then the same as the Sun, or Osiris, of Egypt. The festivals of Bacchus, generally called Orgies, Canephoria, Phallica, Bacchanalia, or Dionysia, were introduced into Greece from Egypt by Danaus and his daughters. The infamous debaucheries at these festivals are well known; and were so scandalous that they were suppressed by the Roman government, 186 B.C. His priestesses were called by the several names of Menades, Thyades, Bacchantes, Mimallonides, and Bassarides, according to the peculiarity of either their dress or their gestures. The Egyptians sacrificed pigs to him before the doors of their houses. The fir-tree, the yew-tree, the fig-tree, the ivy, and the vine, were sacred to him; and the goat was generally sacrificed to him, on account of his propensity to destroy the vine. According to Pliny, he was the first who ever wore a crown. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo; and, like him, he is shown with fine hair loosely flowing down his shoulders, and is said to possess eternal youth. Sometimes he has horns, either because he taught the cultivation of the earth by oxen, or because Jupiter, his father, appeared to him in the deserts of Libya under the shape of a ram, and supplied his thirsty army with water. The three persons of the name of Bacchus, whom Diodorus mentions, are, the one who conquered the Indies, called the bearded Bacchus; a son of Jupiter and Proserpine, represented with horns; and the son of Jupiter and Semele, called the Bacchus of Thebes. Those mentioned by Cicero, are, a son of Proserpine; a son of Nysus, who built Nysa; a son of Caprius, who reigned in the Indies; a son of Jupiter and the moon; and a son of Thyone and Nisus.

BACCHYLIDES, bāk-il'-i-dēs, a Greek lyric poet, nephew of the elder Simonides. His compositions were hymns, dithyrambic poems, odes in celebration of the Pythian victors, amatory poems, &c., all of which are now lost, except about twenty pieces. This was the last of the nine lyric poets, and Horace is said to have imitated him in several of his poems, particularly in the fifteenth ode of the first book.

Born in the island of Cos; flourished 452 B.C.

BACCIO, DELLA PORTA, bach'-e-o, better known as Fra Bartolomeo, a name he assumed on becoming a Dominican friar, was an eminent Italian painter, who distinguished himself chiefly by the strength of his colouring and the excellence of his representations of the human figure. The works of this painter are numerous, and are held in high estimation, and may be seen in the public galleries of Florence, Rome, the Louvre of Paris, Munich, &c. He gave instruction to Raffaelle, and was the first to use the jointed lay figure as a model.

Born in the district of Savignano, 1469; died at Florence, 1517.

BACCIO DA MONTE LUPO, Florentine architect and sculptor, whose most famous work is the fine church of San Paolino at Lucca, erected in 1522. In that church he was buried. His son, Raffaelle, was an eminent sculptor.

Born 1445; died at Lucca, 1534.

BACH, ALEXANDER, baron, bak, Austrian statesman, who resisted the independence of Hungary, and the entry of Austria into the German Confederation. After the occurrences of 1848, he was minister of justice, and assisted to remodel the system of Austrian law; subsequently, as minister of the interior, he organized the crown lands of the empire.

Born at Loosdorf, 1813.

BACH, JOHANN SEBASTIAN, an eminent German composer, who, in 1708, became musician to the duke of Saxe-Weimar, and obtained, in 1717, a victory at Dresden, over Marchand, a famous French organist, who fled, rather than endure the certainty of a defeat. Bach's reputation was greatly increased, and in 1723 he removed to Leipsic, where he held important appointments, and where his principal works were composed. For the last year of his life he was totally blind. He is said to have been equal to Handel on the organ. His compositions are works of the highest excellence; and his strains may be recognized in all the religious edifices of the world. His sons Karl and Johann were also celebrated as performers and composers; and so fertile in musical talent were the Bach family, that fifty-nine members of it have been mentioned as celebrated musicians.

Born at Eisenach, 1685; died at Leipsic, 1750.

BACHARACH, or BACARATH, bā'-ka-rak, a town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine, 22 miles above Coblentz. A brisk trade is carried on, and the wines of the neighbourhood are famous. Pop. about 2,000. Here, on the 1st January, 1814, Blucher, with his army, crossed the Rhine.

BACHAUMONT, LOUIS PETIT DE, ba-chō'-mohn, French memoir writer. His writings abound in anecdotes, gossip, and scandal.

Died at Paris, 1771.

BACHE, ALEXANDER DALLAS, an American man of science, superintendent of the great coast survey, and author of many papers on physical science. He was a great-grandson of Benjamin Franklin. For many years he held the position of professor of mathematics in the university of Philadelphia.

Born at Philadelphia, 1806; died at Newport, 1867.

BACHELIER, NICHOLAS, ba-shel'-e-ai, a French sculptor and architect, a pupil of Michael Angelo. He ornamented the churches of his native city with his productions.

Born at Toulouse; died 1554.

BACHIAN, or BATSHIAN, bat'-she-an, the largest of the Molucca islands, in the Ternate group, to the south of Gilolo. Ext. 54 miles long by 20 broad. Area, estimated at 900 square miles. Desc. Fertile and mountainous. Sago, cocoa-nuts, cloves, and nutmegs are plentiful, and there are sulphur springs. The chief town is Bachian or Amassing. Lat. 1° S. Lon. 127° E.—It was, in 1610, taken from the Spaniards by the Dutch.

BACHMAN, JOHN, bāk'-man, a distinguished American naturalist, and the assistant of Audubon, in the preparation of his great work on ornithology.

Born at Dutchess, New York, 1790.

BACICCIO, JOHN BAPTIST GAULI, bā-chitch'-e-o, a celebrated Italian painter, who excelled in portraits and scriptural subjects.

Born at Genoa, 1639; died 1709.

BACIOCCHI, MARIE ANNE ELISA BONAPARTE, bach'-e-ok'-e, the eldest of the sisters of Napoleon I., who, in 1797, at Marseilles, married a retired officer of a Corsican regiment. She subsequently rose with the fortunes of her great brother, and became princess of Piombino, and shortly afterwards of Lucca. In 1809 she became grand duchess of Tuscany, and held her court at Florence, until the fall of the first Napoleonic empire. She subsequently lived at Bologna as countess of Campagnano. Her husband was the purchaser of the magnificent palace of Ranuzzi, in Bologna, where, with the title of a Roman prince, he died in 1841.

Born in Corsica, 1777; died at Bologna, 1820.

BACK, Sir George, bāk, a distinguished voyager and explorer in the Arctic regions. In 1818 he accompanied Sir John Franklin in his northern voyage, and in 1819 and 1823 he was with the same navigator in the Arctic seas. In 1833 he undertook an overland journey in search of Captain Ross. On this occasion he descended Back River till he reached the Polar Sea, and then traced the coasts as far as Bathurst Inlet. In 1835 he was made a captain, and in 1836 examined the coasts between Cape Turnagain and Regent Inlet. In 1838 he received the honour of knighthood, and was presented, for his exertions in the paths of geographical science, with a medal from the Geographical Society. He attained the rank of admiral in 1867.

Born 1796; died 1878.

BACK'S RIVER, bāks, formerly the Great Fish River, but now named Back's River, in honour of the above commander. It takes its rise in Sussex Lake, and falls into a bay in the Gulf of Boothia, in Lat. 67° 7′ 31″ N. Lon. 94° 39′ 45″ W.

BACKER, Jacob, a Dutch portrait and historical painter, whose works are held in great esteem.

Born at Harlingen, 1609; died 1641.

BACKER, James, bā'-ker, a Dutch historical painter of great merit.—Of this family there were others who were painters.

Born at Antwerp, in 1530; died 1560.

BACKERGUNGE, bā'-ke-goonj', a district of Bengal, consisting of a part of the Sunderbund and the mouths of the Ganges and Brahmapootra. Area, 5,000 square miles. Desc. A thick impenetrable jungle, here and there relieved by some patches of fertile rice-ground. Pop. 2,377,000. It has a town of the same name at about 120 miles E. of Calcutta.

BACKHOUSE, William, bāk'-hous, an astrologer and alchemist, who was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, but left it without a degree, and settled on his estate in Berkshire, where he devoted himself to his favourite studies. He published "The Pleasant Fountain of Knowledge," a translation from the French; "The Complaint of Nature;" "The Golden Fleece." He was also the inventor of an instrument called the waywiser. Elias Ashmole was his disciple, and used to call him father.

Born in Berkshire, 1590; died 1662.

BACKHUYSEN or BAKHUYSEN, Ludolf, bak-hoi'-sen, an eminent painter of the Dutch, whose favourite subjects were shipping and sea pieces. He was accustomed, when a storm arose, to embark in a small boat, and, going out to sea, would watch, with the greatest interest, the play of the waves and breakers as they lashed the sides of the rolling vessels. This study of nature enabled him to give to his productions the admirable truthfulness which distinguishes them.

Born at Embden, Hanover, 1631; died 1709.

BACKMUTH, back'-mooth, a town of Russia, 130 miles N.E. of Ekaterinoslav. A large trade in cattle, tallow, and wheat is carried on. Pop. 7,200.

BACKNANG, bāk'nang, a town of Wurtemberg, district of the Lower Neckar, 16 miles from Stuttgart. Manf. Woollen cloths and leather. Pop. about 5,000.

BACOLOR, bac-o-lor', a town in the island of Luzon, Philippine Islands, of which it was formerly the capital. Pop. 8,500. (See Philippines.)

BACON, Francis, Baron Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, an illustrious philosopher and eminent statesman, was the youngest son of Sir Nicholas Bacon (See Bacon, Sir Nicholas) by his second wife; and, whilst yet a mere boy, gave such indications of future eminence, that Queen Elizabeth used to call him her "young lord keeper." At the age of 12, he was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he discovered the futility of the Peripatetic or Aristotelian philosophy, which then prevailed. In 1576, he was entered at Gray's Inn, and soon afterwards went to France in the suite of Sir Amyas Paulet, ambassador to that court. On his return to England he took up his residence at Gray's Inn, being compelled by the death of his father to adopt a profession. In 1584 he was returned to Parliament for Melcombe, Dorsetshire; and at the age of 28 was appointed one of the queen's counsellors; but from his attachment to the Earl of Essex, who was at enmity with Cecil, Bacon lost those advantages at court which he might otherwise have reaped. That generous but unfortunate earl, however, feeling the value of his attachment, presented him with an estate, and showed him many acts of kindness, all of which, we grieve to say, were repaid with ingratitude, which, however, has been endeavoured to be palliated from the position in which he was placed. In 1593 he was chosen member of parliament for Middlesex, and had the courage to oppose several arbitrary measures of the court; for which he incurred the queen's displeasure. At this period he was, as through life, in possession of the friendship of rare Ben Jonson, who has bequeathed to us a graphic sketch of his oratorical powers. "No man ever spoke more neatly, more pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness, in what he uttered. No member of his speech, but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. * * * The fear of every man that heard him was lest he should make an end." Ben Jonson had a noble admiration of the intellectual qualities of the chancellor. On the accession of James I. he obtained the honour of knighthood, and in 1604 was appointed one of the king's counsel, with a pension. The next year he published a great work, entitled, "The Advancement and Proficiency of Learning," for which he was made solicitor-general. About this time he married a daughter of Mr. Barnham, a rich alderman of London. In 1611 he was appointed judge of the Marshalsea court, and obtained the place of registrar of the Star Chamber, the reversion of which had been granted him twenty years before. In 1613 he was made attorney-general, and in 1616 sworn a privy councillor. At this time he contracted a close intimacy with the king's favourite, George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, to whom he wrote an admirable letter of advice. In 1617 he was made lord keeper of the great seal; and, in January, 1618, was invested with the high chancellorship of Great Britain, and created a peer by the title of Baron Verulam. He was next made viscount of St. Albans. In 1620 he gave the world the greatest of all his works, entitled the "Novum Organum," which was immediately hailed with the warmest expressions of admiration by the greatest minds of Europe, and which is "the central pile of that edifice of philosophy on which the world has bestowed his name." He had now reached the zenith of his glory, when he was accused in parliament of bribery and corruption in his high office. This heavy charge was admitted by himself. "I do plainly and ingenuously confess that I am guilty of corruption, and do renounce all defence." There is something humiliating, but, at the same time, extremely touching, in the fall of this great man. The confession, which was made by himself, could hardly be believed to have been so done. A committee, therefore, was sent by the Lords to inquire if such had been the case, and if it had been signed by him. "My lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart: I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed." He was sentenced to pay a fine of £40,000, to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and for ever rendered incapable of holding any public office. In a short time, however, he was restored to liberty, and his fine remitted, and was summoned to the first parliament of King Charles. It must not be omitted that the greatest part of the blame attaches to his servants; and of this he was sensible; for, during his trial, as he passed through the room where his domestics were sitting, they all rose up at his entrance: on which he said—"Sit down, my masters; your rise has been my fall." After this disgrace he went into retirement, where he devoted himself to his studies until his death, which was caused by a chill caught from stuffing a fowl with snow in the open air, near Highgate, for the purpose of ascertaining whether snow would act as an antiseptic. He was taken suddenly ill and was conveyed to the house of Lord Arundel, near at hand, but bronchitis set in, and he died after a few days' illness. His remains were interred in St. Michael's church, at St. Albans, whore his secretary erected a monument to his memory. His writings are an inestimable treasure of sound wisdom, and he has justly been called the father of experimental philosophy. In closing this sketch, we cannot help quoting the few pathetic lines written of him by rare Ben Jonson, his faithful friend in adversity as well as in prosperity. "My conceit of his person was never increased towards him by his place or honours; but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever by his worth one of the greatest men and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages. In his adversity I ever prayed that God would give him strength, for greatness he could not want." Bacon ranks as the very first of English philosophers, and his literary abilities were equal to his profound sagacity. He was the great apostle of what is known as the inductive philosophy. But his genius was universal, and his contributions to a knowledge of physical science was the most important of any between those of Roger Bacon and Newton. As a proof of the estimate formed by some modern writers of his wonderful abilities, it has been seriously contended that he was the real author of the plays generally attributed to Shakspeare. His most famous works are the "Essays," "Advancement of Learning," "Wisdom of the Ancients," "Novum Organum" (the most important of his philosophical works). Except in the "Essays" he generally wrote in Latin.

Born at York House, in the Strand, 1561; died near Highgate, 1626.

BACON, SIR NICHOLAS, lord keeper of the great seal, and father of Lord Bacon, studied at Benet's (now Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Gray's Inn. On the dissolution of the monastery of St. Edmund's Bury, he obtained from Henry VIII. possession of various manors in Suffolk. He subsequently received an offer of emolument, attorney of the wards. Having become a Protestant, he was on that account excluded from all employment during the reign of Mary; but, on the accession of Elizabeth, he was made a privy councillor and keeper of the great seal. In every political change his prudence seems to have preserved him from danger, whilst he made it his study never to entangle himself with any party. When the queen came to visit him at his new house at Redgrave, she observed, alluding to his corpulence, that he had built his house too little for him. "Not so, madam," answered he; "but your majesty has made me too big for my house." He was twice married: by his first wife he had three sons and three daughters; and by his second he had two sons, Anthony, and Francis the future lord chancellor of England. He was a learned and wise rather than a great man. "I have come to the lord keeper," says Puttenham, "and found him sitting in his gallery alone, with the works of Quintilian before him. Indeed, he was a most eloquent man, of rare learning and wisdom, as ever I knew England to breed." His great son has, as it seems to us, thus correctly drawn his character:—"He was a plain man, direct and constant, without all finesse and doubleness, and one that was of a mind that a man in his private proceedings and estate, and in the proceedings of state, should rest upon the soundness and strength of his own courses, and not upon practice to circumvent others."

Born at Chiselhurst, Kent, 1510; died 1579.

BACON, JOHN, an English sculptor, at first was bound apprentice to a manufacturer of china at Lambeth, where he was employed in painting on porcelain. Here he became so expert in modelling shepherds, shepherdesses, and other ornamental figures, that in less than two years he formed all the models for the manufactory. While here, he had an opportunity of observing the models of different sculptors, which were sent to the pottery to be burnt; and by them he was inspired with a strong inclination for his future profession. He immediately began to apply himself with unremitting diligence, and his progress was so rapid that he obtained nine of the first premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of the Arts. The earliest of these was in 1758, for a figure of Peace, when he was only eighteen years of age. During his apprenticeship he formed a design of making statues in artificial stone or cement, which have since been brought to great perfection. About 1763 he began to work in marble; and having invented an instrument for transferring the form of the model to the marble, he saved a great deal of his time, and brought his instrument to be adopted by other sculptors. In 1769 he obtained from the Royal Academy the first gold medal given by that society, and the year following he was chosen an associate. The reputation acquired by the exhibition of his statue of Mars induced Dr. Markham, archbishop of York, to employ him in making a bust of George III. for the hall of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1777 he was engaged to prepare a model of a monument to be erected in Guy's Hospital to the memory of the founder, which occasioned him to be employed in the execution of Lord Chatham's monument in Guildhall. The year following he became a Royal Academician. His works are too numerous to be specified; suffice it to mention the monument of Lord Chatham in Westminster Abbey, and Howard's and Dr. Johnson's in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Born in Southwark, 1740; died 1799.

BACON, ROGER, an eminent English monk, scholar, and philosopher, educated at Oxford, under the auspices of Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, who, throughout his life, continued his greatest patron. Bacon was also encouraged and instructed in learning by Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, William Sherwood, chancellor of Lincoln and an excellent mathematician, and Richard Fishacre, an able professor at Oxford and Paris. The last-mentioned university being at that time greatly frequented by students, Bacon went thither, and studied with so much diligence and success as to obtain the degree of doctor of theology. On quitting France he retired to Oxford, and about the same time entered into the order of St. Francis. He now devoted himself principally to chemistry, natural philosophy, and mathematics; and so ardent was he in their pursuit, that he spent in the course of twenty years £2,000 entirely upon them; which, taking into consideration the time in which he lived, was no contemptible sum. The discoveries he made, and the fame he obtained, excited the envy and malice of the monks. It was reported, and believed, that he had recourse to the agency of evil spirits, and that all his knowledge consisted in his profound skill as a magician. In consequence of this, he was forbidden to read lectures in the university, and was even confined to his cell, without being allowed to see his friends, or to have a proper supply of food. The bigoted conduct of the monks seems only to have extended his reputation; for, while he was suffering from their persecution, he received a letter from the cardinal bishop of Sabina, the pope's legate in England, requesting a copy of his works, which Bacon at first declined; but when that prelate was raised to the papal chair by the name of Clement IV., he collected his writings into a volume, entitled "Opus Majus," or the Greater Work, and sent it to his holiness, who promised him his protection. On the death, however, of that pope, he was exposed to new and more severe persecutions. His works were prohibited, and he was sentenced to close imprisonment, in which he remained above ten years. On being released, he retired to Oxford, where he died. —Hallam says that the mind of Roger Bacon was strangely compounded of almost prophetic gleams of the future course of science and the best principles of the inductive philosophy, with a more than usual credulity in the superstition of his own times. However this may be, he was certainly possessed of one of the most comprehensive minds of any man of his time. Bishop Bale mentions above eighty treatises written by him, of which he had himself seen near forty; and Dr. Jebb, the learned editor of his "Opus Majus," classes his writings under the heads of grammar, mathematics, physics, optics, geography, astronomy, chronology, chemistry, magic, medicine, logic, metaphysics, ethics, theology, philology, and miscellanies. His chemical tracts are in the "Thesaurus Chemicus," printed at Frankfort, in 8vo, 1620. His treatise on the "Means of avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age" was first printed at Oxford in 1590; and an English translation of it, by Dr. Browne, appeared in 1683. Several pieces of his yet remain in MS. Bacon was a deep mathematician, and from some of his MSS. it appears that he had a knowledge of the nature of convex and concave glasses; and some consider him as the inventor of the telescope. He has, besides, the credit of having been the inventor of the air-pump, the diving-bell, the camera obscura, and of gunpowder, the composition of which is expressly mentioned in his treatise "De Nullitate Magiæ." Dr. Friend thinks that since the days of Archimedes, the world has not seen a greater genius. His acquaintance with astronomy and geography was very extensive and accurate. He detected the errors in the calendar, and suggested the reformation in it which was, long afterwards, adopted by Gregory XIII., and was, on the whole, according to Gerard Joannes, a man of such vast learning, that England, nay the world beside, had not, in this respect, his equal or his second; yet, either through the envy or the ignorance of the age in which he lived, he was stigmatized as a magician.

Born near Ilchester, 1214; died 1294.

BACONTHORPE, or BACON, JOHN, a learned monk, native of Norfolk, known as "the resolute friar." He studied at Oxford, visited Paris, where he attained a great reputation, and, in 1329, returned to England, and became provincial of the Carmelites. His learning was considered to rival that of Thomas Aquinas.

Died in London, 1346.

BACS, baks, a town of Hungary, 27 miles from Zomber. It has a considerable transit trade. Pop 2,770. Lat. 45° 24′ N. Lon. 19° 20′ E.

BACS-BADROGHER, ba-drŏ'-ger, a district of S. Hungary, in the circle beyond the Danube. Area, 3,625 square miles. Desc. At some seasons almost a morass; but fertile, and producing abundance of tobacco, wheat, and wine. Pop. 500,000.

BACSANGI, batch-an'-yee, TÁNOS, Hungarian poet, who edited the "Magyar Museum," suppressed by the Government. In 1809 he translated Napoleon's proclamation to the Magyars, and in consequence was compelled to take refuge in France. After the fall of Napoleon he was given up to the Austrians, and ordered to reside under supervision at Linz.

Born at Tapoleza, 1763; died at Linz, 1845.

BACTRIA, or BACTRIANI, bac'-tri-a, an ancient country of Central Asia to the south of the river Oxus, and extending eastward to the Hindu-Kush Mountains. It was the centre of a powerful kingdom, and in the 7th century B.C. became a portion of the empire of the Medes. Alexander conquered it, but in the 3rd century B.C. it again became an independent kingdom. Of the subsequent history very little is authentically known. (See BALKH.)

BACUP, băk'-up, a town of Lancashire, 12 miles from Blackburn. There are good public buildings, and a new market-hall was erected in 1867. Manf. Cotton-spinning and power-loom weaving. There are some considerable dye-works, also some brass and iron foundries, and there are coal-mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 25,033. Station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

BADAGRY, bă-dăg-ry, a town on the Bight of Benin, in Africa, 315 miles from Cape-Coast Castle. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 6° 24′ 12″ N. Lon. 23° 5′ 15″ W.

BADAJOS, bad'-a-jos (Spanish, bad'-a-hos), a province of Spain, the southern half of the old province of Estremadura, and commonly called Lower Estremadura. Area, 8,687 square miles. Pop. 443,081. (See ESTREMADURA.)

BADAJOS, or BADAJOZ, a strongly fortified frontier city of Spain, the capital of the above province, 5 miles from the Portuguese frontier. It is a town of great antiquity, with narrow and frequently crooked streets, standing on the Guadiana, which is here crossed by a bridge of twenty-eight arches. It has a fortified cathedral, several parish churches, monasteries, now secularized and used as barracks, nunneries, and hospitals. Manf. Coarse woollens, soap, and leather. Pop. 23,000.—Badajoz was a town of some note under the Romans, who called it Pax Augusta. It was taken by the French under Soult in 1811, and stormed by the British under Lord Wellington, April 6th, 1812, after a most determined resistance and terrible conflict, the loss of the British in killed and wounded being nearly 5,000; and then for two nights and days the city was sacked by the soldiery, Wellington in vain endeavouring to check them. It was the birthplace of the painter Morales, called El Divino.

BADAKSHAN, ba-dak'-shan, a district of Central Asia, in the valley of the Kokcha, one of the least streams of the Oxus. It contains cliffs of lapis lazuli, which are peculiar to this region, and ruby-mines. The country is for the most part mountainous, and the general slope is great, from 15,600 to only 500 feet above the the sea level. It is divided into 16 districts, of which the chief is Faizabad, the others being dependencies. The district is of importance as connected with the frontier line of Afghanistan. Rivers. The Oxus, the Badakshan, and several other streams. The inhabitants are Tadjiks and Mahometans, and speak the Persian language. Lat. between 36° and 38° N. Lon. between 70° and 74° E.

BADALOCCHIO, SISTO-ROSA, bă'-da-lok'-e-o, an Italian painter and engraver, held in considerable estimation, especially as a draughtsman. His works are to be found in Bologna, Modena, and Parma.

Born at Parma, 1581; died 1647.

BADCOCK, SAMUEL. băd'-kok, an English divine, best known by his critiques in the "Monthly Review," on Madan's "Thelypthora," Dr. Priestley's "History of the Corruptions of Christianity, &c." ; and by the considerable share which he had in Dr. White's Bampton Lectures. He was a man of great liveliness, taste, and learning.

Born at South Molton, 1747; died 1788.

BADEN or BADENS, FRANCIS, bă'-den, a Dutch historical and portrait painter.—His warm colouring procured him the surname of "the Italian."

Born at Antwerp, 1571; died 1603.

BADEN, GRAND DUCHY OF, in the south-west of Germany, bounded S. by Switzerland and the Lake of Constance, E. by Wurtemberg, N. by Bavaria and Hesse-Darmstadt, and W. by Rhenish Bavaria, Alsace, and Lorraine. There are four divisions:—Lake Constance, Upper Rhine, Middle Rhine, and Lower Rhine. The surface of the country is extremely mountainous, except in the west, where there is a continuous valley, extending from Mannheim to Basle. Between the Lake of Constance and the river Necker is a portion of the Black Forest, or Schwarzwald, divided by the valley of the Kinzig.

Rivers.—The Rhine, Kinzig, Murg, Weisen-Mayn, Danube, and Neckar.

Climate.—Severe in the mountain regions, but mild in the valley.

Pro.—As the chief wealth of the state springs from agriculture, barley, maize, wheat, potatoes, flax, hemp, and tobacco are cultivated to a considerable extent, and vast numbers of sheep and cattle are reared.

Minerals.—Alum, sulphur, vitriol, silver, iron, copper, lead, and coal.

Manf.—Ribbon-weaving, straw-plait, paper, leather, tobacco, wooden ornaments, clocks, watches, mirrors, jewellery, organs, and musical boxes.

Area, 5,851 square miles.

Pop. 1 570,254.

Chief Towns.—CARLSRUHE, the capital; MANNHEIM, FREIBURG, HEIDELBURG, PFORZHEIM, RASTADT, BADEN, CONSTANCE, BRUCHSAL, and LAHR.

Lat. between 47° and 49° N. Lon. between 7° and 9° E.

BADEN, usually called Baden-Baden, a town of Germany, in the grand duchy of Baden, 22 miles from Strasburg. It is noted for its mineral baths, and is most picturesquely situate in the midst of a valley of the Black Forest, rich in vineyards and orchards, the adjacent heights being crowned with grand old ruins. In the autumn the influx of visitors from England and all parts of the continent is very great. The gaming-tables, once so notorious and attractive, have been abolished. There is an old church containing some interesting tombs. There are a pump-room, conversation-room, picture gallery, library, and other handsome buildings for the accommodation of visitors. Pop. The resident population numbers about 10,000; but there are frequently more than 20,000 visitors in the town. A treaty, known by the name of the Treaty of Radstadt, was signed here in 1714.

BADEN, Switzerland, a town in the canton of Aargau, on the Limmat, 14 miles N.W. of Zurich. The thermal springs attract thousands of visitors annually. Pop. resident, 3,500. The little town is historically memorable. The peace which put an end to the war of the Spanish Succession was concluded here in 1714.

BADEN, a town of Lower Austria, 12 miles S. of Vienna, noted for its baths, and beautifully situated near the Schwachat. There are a theatre, casino, and military hospital. The town was nearly destroyed by fire in 1812, but was handsomely rebuilt. The springs have been famous since the time of the Romans. Pop. resident, 6,000. There are many places of this name on the Continent, it being the German word for "bath."

BADENOCH, băd-e-nok, an extensive Highland district in the north of Scotland, forming part of Inverness-shire, and traversed by the Spey. There are large forests.

BADENWEILLER, bă'-den-vai-ler, a town of Germany, 2 miles from Mullheim. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, nails, and earthenware. Pop. 2,500.

BADEW, RICHARD DE, băd'-u, the founder of Clare Hall, Cambridge, who, in 1326, was chancellor of Cambridge. In the same year he laid the foundation of a building, to which he gave the name of University Hall; which, being burnt down, was rebuilt by the daughter of Sir Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, who named it Clare Hall.

Lived in the 14th century.

BADIA y LEBLICH, DOMINGO, bă'-de-a, a Spanish traveller, who assumed the name of Ali Bey, and visited Egypt, Morocco, Arabia, and Syria, disguised in Mussulman costume. He entered the service of Napoleon, and again visited Syria, but being suspected of being a French spy, was, it is supposed, poisoned.

Born in Biscay, 1766; died 1818.

BADILE, ANTONY, bă'-de-lai, an Italian portrait-painter, the master of Paul Veronese and Zelotti.

Born at Verona, 1480; died 1560.

BADONG, bă'-dong, a state in the island of Bali, in the Asiatic Archipelago. Area, 100 square miles. Desc. Fertile, cultivating and exporting maize, rice, coffee, tobacco, cattle, and pigs to the Mauritius, Singapore, and Australia.

BADRINATH, băd'-ri-nath', a town of British India, in the district of Garwhal, on the right bank of the Vishnuganga, famous for the temple dedicated to an incarnation of Vishnu, to which immense numbers of pilgrims resort, especially every twelfth year. Lat. 30° 44′ N. Lon. 79° 32′ E.

BAENA, or VAENA, ba-ai'-na, a town of Spain, province of Cordova, picturesquely situated near the river Marbello. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics; and there are several oil-mills and tanneries. Pop. 13,328.

BAEPENDI, bă'-ai-pain'-de, a town and district of Brazil, 180 miles from Rio de Janeiro. Pop. of district, 9,000.

BAER, KARL ERNST VON, bă'-air, Russian naturalist, for many years professor of zoology at Konigsberg; but removed in 1834 to St. Petersburg.

He is one of the first authorities on the subject of the development of organic bodies, and in 1837 greatly distinguished himself by a survey of the northern coast of Russia.

Born in Esthonia, 1792; died at Dorpat, 1876.

BAERSTRAT, bar'-strat, a Dutch painter, who excelled in sea-pieces and fish. His works are highly esteemed.

Died 1687.

BAEZA, or BAEÇA, ba-aï'-tha, a town of Spain, in the Andalusian province of Jaen, on the right bank of the Guadalquivir. There are a cathedral and university, and some fine remains of the old fortifications; and the streets and squares are handsome and spacious: one of the latter is adorned with a beautiful fountain. Pop. about 11,000.—This was formerly a considerable place, having been the residence of several Moorish kings.

BAFFA, băf'-a, a seaport-town on the west coast of the island of Cyprus, 56 miles from Nicosia. It is situate on a rocky eminence close to the sea; and its harbour, once good, is now choked up with sand. Lat. 34° 48′ N. Lon. 32° 18′ E.

BAFFIN, WILLIAM, băf'-in, an English navigator, of whose early life little or nothing is known. In 1612 he made a voyage to the north-west, of which he wrote an account, and which was the first in which a method was adopted by Baffin of determining the longitude at sea, by observations made upon the heavenly bodies. In 1613 he made a voyage to Greenland, and in 1615 made another with Bylot, and in the following year acted as pilot to the same commander, and discovered the large inlet which bears his name. In 1621 he joined the British expedition which, acting in concert with the Persians, was to eject the Portuguese from the Persian Gulf, where, at the siege of Kismis, a small fort near Ormuz, he was killed.

Born 1584; died 1621.

BAFFIN'S SEA, erroneously called a bay, is a long strait or inlet situate between Greenland and the lands or islands on the north of Hudson's Bay. On the N. is Smith Sound, leading to the Polar Sea; on the S. Davis Strait from the Atlantic Ocean; and on the W. Jones Sound and Lancaster Sound from the Arctic Ocean. Lat. extending from 69° to 78° N. Lon. from 54° to 72° E.

BAGDAD, or BAGHDAD, băg'-dăd, a Turkish pashalic or government of Asia, sometimes called the Arabian Irak; bounded on the N. by the pashalics of Van and Diarbekir, on the S. by Syria and Arabia, on the E. by Persia, on the S.E. by the Persian Gulf, and on the W. by the Euphrates. It comprehends ancient BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA. A portion of the country consists of deserts destitute of vegetation of any kind, except along the banks of the streams and rivers. The plains between the Tigris and the Euphrates are fertile, and produce grain and fruit, and in the drier parts it is productive of fine dates. Near the upper waters of the Euphrates are extensive marshes, where plentiful crops of rice are obtained. In the more elevated parts of the same district, some of the finest fruits grow abundantly.

Rivers.—The Euphrates and the Tigris are the principal, and there are the Kalour and Gozan (or Hermas) which loses itself in a salt marsh at the foot of the Singar Hills.

Zoology.—The wild animals are lions, jackals, gazelles, hogs, and hares; and the domestic are horses, asses, mules, buffaloes, dromedaries, and single-humped camels. The horses are especially beautiful, and as beef is not eaten, oxen are raised, not for slaughter, but for agricultural purposes. The principal wild birds are blackcock, partridges, wild-doves, and snipes; ducks, geese, widgeons, and pelicans haunt the lakes and marshes; whilst the only domestic birds are the pigeon and common fowl.

Produce.—Wheat, barley, dates, apples, pears, oranges melons, cucumbers, and onions are all grown; but the heat of the climate in June, July, and August burns up almost everything that is green, whilst the winter is similar to a northern summer.

Population 1,200,000.

Lat. between 30° and 37° N. Lon. between 38° 40′ and 47° 30′ E.

BAGDAD, or BAGHDAD, the capital of the above province, intersected by the Tigris, but principally situate on the east side of the river, 200 miles above its junction with the Euphrates, situated in the midst of a desert plain. Old Bagdad, on the western bank of this river, is much inferior in extent to the newer city on the opposite bank. The towns are connected by a pontoon-bridge. Each town is protected by walls, showing good specimens of Saracenic brickwork. The streets are dirty and unpaved, and so narrow that two horsemen can scarcely pass each other abreast. The houses of the rich, however, are very handsome, having windows of Venetian glass, ornamented ceilings, and courtyards in the front, with small plantations of orange-trees. There are said to be about 100 mosques in the town, the most ancient being that erected by the Caliph Mustansir in 1235, which is in a ruinous state. A more perfect and beautiful building is the Mosque of Merjaneeah, erected 1682, but containing sculptures of much earlier date. The governor's palace is a spacious edifice. The baths and coffee-houses, though not kept in good repair, are well frequented; the markets are well supplied with provisions, and the expense of subsistence is moderate. The bazaars consist of a magnificent display of shops, wherein every description of eastern merchandise may be found.

Manufactures.—The principal are red and yellow leather, which is much esteemed; silk, cotton, and woollen stuffs.

Population about 180,000, consisting chiefly of Turks and Arabs.

Lat. 33° 19′ 10″ N. Lon. 44° 22′ 45″ E.

History.—Bagdad was founded in 766. In the 9th century the famous Haroun-al-Raschid reigned here. In a large burial-ground outside the walls of the town there is a tomb erected to the memory of Zobeide, the wife of this caliph, and the famous lady of the "Thousand and One Nights." Amongst other tombs, it is said that that of the Jewish prophet Ezekiel is here. Bagdad has undergone many revolutions, and was nearly destroyed in 1638, by Amurath IV., to whom it surrendered. Since then it has been nominally subject to the Porte.

BAGGESEN, JENS EMMANUEL, bag-gă'-sen, Danish author, who wrote in various styles prose and verse, in Danish and German, and was greatly admired for his elegance, wit, and humour. He was of a restless, wandering disposition, and his irritable temper and egotism made him many enemies.

Born at Korsör, 1765; died at Hamburg, 1826.

BAGHERMI, or BAGIRMI, bag'-ir-mi, a kingdom of Central Africa, to the south of Lake Tchad, about 240 miles from N. to S., and 150 miles from E. to W. The people profess Mahometanism, but the king exercises authority over several heathen tribes.

BAGLIVI, GIORGIO, bag-lē'-ve, Italian physician and anatomist of great reputation for his skill and writings.

Born 1667; died 1706.

BAGNA CAVALLO, băn'-ya ka-văl'-o, a neat town of Italy, States of the Church, 24 miles from Ferrara. Pop. 4,000.

BAGNA CAVALLO, BARTOLOMEO, so named from being born in the above town. His veal name was Ramenghi. He was a pupil of Raffaelle, and one of the foremost painters of the Bolognese school.

Born 1484.

BAGNALSTOWN, a town in the county of Carlow, Ireland, on the river Barrow, 10 miles S. of Carlow. There is a handsome courthouse. Granite is quarried in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,309. Station on the Great Southern and Western of Ireland Railway.

BAGNARA, ban-yar'-a, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 16 miles from Reggio. In its neighbourhood excellent wine is produced. Pop. 5,000.—In 1783 this town was almost wholly destroyed by an earthquake.

BAGNERES EN BIGORRE, ban'-yair ang be-gor', a town of France, on the Adour, department of Hautes Pyrenees, 13 miles S.E. of Tarbes. This town is well built, containing several squares and numerous handsome streets. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, pottery, and crape called barège. It is celebrated for its bathing establishments, of which there are about twenty. Pop. Permanent residents number about 9,500.

BAGNERES DE LUÇON, loo-zong, a town of France, department of Haute Garonne, at the foot of the Pyrenees. It has sulphurous thermal springs, and a bath establishment, frequented from May to October. Pop. Resident, 3,600.

BAGNES-LE-CHABLE, ban le(r)-shabl, a parish and village of Switzerland, 7 miles from Martigny. They are situate in the valley of Bagne, which has an elevation of 2,716 feet. Pop. of parish, 9,000.—In 1818, the river Dranse being blocked up with ice, a lake was formed; and, when it burst, the torrent swept away 400 cottages, and 34 lives were lost.

BAGNI, ban'-ye, a name common to several Italian villages, on account of their being bathing-places.

BAGNOLS, ban'-yols, a town of France, department of the Gard, 12 miles from Uzès. Manf. Various kinds of silk and serges. Pop. about 5,000.

BAGOLINO, ba'-go-le'-no, a town of Italy, in the territory of Venice, 24 miles from Brescia. In its vicinity are the sulphurous thermal springs of St. Giacomo. Pop. about 4,000.

BAGRATION, PETER IVANOVITCH, Prince, bă-grat-she-on, a celebrated Russian general, who commenced his military career under Potemkin, and in 1794 served under Suwarov in Poland, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1799, in Italy, under the same leader, he proved himself so able a soldier that Suwarov called him his "right arm." He took Brescia and Tortona, and defeated the French under Moreau near Marengo. At the taking of Turin, in the actions of Trebbia and the Adda, at the taking of Alessandria and of Serebasso, and at the battle of Novi, he added to his former reputation. In 1805 he commanded the vanguard of the allied Austrian and Russian army, under Kutusoff, and in that capacity displayed great abilities. He was present at the battles of Austerlitz, Eylau, and Friedland, and at all showed his skill and courage. In 1807 he served in the campaign in Finland; and, gaining considerable successes, he was mainly instrumental in detaching from Sweden a large portion of Finland. He afterwards had the command of the Russian army in Turkey; and in 1812, when Napoleon invaded Russia, was appointed to the western army, and made a masterly retreat on Smolensko, where he joined his forces with those of Barclay de Tolly. After the battle there, he commanded the left wing at Borodino, where he was struck by a shell, of which wound he shortly afterwards died.

Born 1765; died at Semæ, 1812.

BAGSHOT, băg'-shot, formerly Holy Hall, a village of Surrey, 10 miles from Windsor. It gives its name to an extensive heath in its neighbourhood, once notorious as the haunt of highwaymen.

BAGULCOT, ba-gul-kot, a subdivision of the district of Darwar, in the presidency of Bombay, Hindostan. Ext. 54 miles long and 44 broad. Area, 1,230 square miles. It is deficient in a general supply of water, on which account the villages are mostly built on the banks of rivers. Pop. about 100,000.

BAHADURPOOR, ba-ha'-dur-poor', the name of two towns in India. 1. In the province of Goojerat, 81 miles from Surat. 2. In the district of Chendaree, Malwa.

BAHAMA, or LUCAYO ISLANDS, ba-ha'-ma, in the Atlantic Ocean, situate opposite the coast of Florida, and belonging to Great Britain. They comprise all that chain of West-India islands lying to the north of Cuba and St. Domingo. There are 29 islands, and 3,048 "cays," or keys, and rocks. They stretch more than 600 miles from the northern coast of San Domingo to the eastern coast of Florida, and there are only three navigable channels. Area of the whole, from 4,400 to 5,500 square miles. The following are the principal:—Abaco, Andros, Atwood's Key, Great Bahama, Crooked Island, Eleuthera, Exumas, French Keys, Hog Island, Hog Key, Harbour Island, Great Island, Long Key, Mayaguana, New Providence (which contains the chief town, Nassau), Ragged Island, Rose Island, Royal Island, San Salvador, and Watling's Island. There are numerous lighthouses in the group. Desc. Mostly flat, barren, and rocky, chiefly producing cotton, maize, Guinea-corn, pineapples, and vegetables. The soil is mostly light or sandy, but is here and there spotted with patches of wood-land. In general, the islands are ill supplied with fresh water; but this is found by digging wells in the rocks to the depth of the sea-level. Climate. Salubrious. The more northern islands, during the winter months, are rendered cool and agreeable by the north-west breeze from the continent of America; the more southern are hotter throughout the year, being low, flat, barren, and rocky. Pop. about 40,000, a great proportion of whom are blacks and people of colour. Lat. between 22° and 28° N. Lon. between 73° and 79° W. The Bahama Islands were first settled by the English in 1629, possessed by Spain in 1781, but, in 1783, restored to Britain, when the seat of government was fixed at New Providence, upon which island Fort Nassau was built. This place is famous as having been the resort of some of the most desperate of the pirates who infested the seas. From this period a regular colonial administration has been maintained. In 1848 Turk's and Caicos Islands, formerly considered as belonging to the Bahamas, were politically separated from the group. The Great Bahama Island is near the N. extremity of the group; and San Salvador was the first land discovered by Columbus in his voyage of 1492.

BAHAMA BANK, GREAT, a sand-bank extending from near the island of Cuba to the Bahama Islands. Lat. extending from 22° 20′ to 26° 15′ N.—There is also a smaller bank of the same name, which lies to the north of the island of Bahama.

BAHAMA CHANNEL, or GULF OF FLORIDA, ba-ha'-ma, the narrow sea between the coast of America and the Bahama Islands, 135 miles long and 46 broad.

BAHAR. (See BEHAR.)

BAHAWULPOOR. (See BHAWALPOOR.)

BAHIA, ba-he'-a, a name which, with various affixes, designates a number of bays in different parts of the world.

BAHIA HONDA, a large and well-sheltered port of the island of Cuba. Lat. 22° 58′ N. Lon. 83° 6′ W. This port is the resort of privateers for landing their slaves.

BAHIA, a province of Brazil, on the south-east coast, extending from the Rio Grande do Belmont on the south to the Rio Real on the north. A broken chain of mountains extends through the province at an average distance of 200 miles from the coast, and the intermediate district, rising in terraces, is very fertile. A large portion of the province is covered with forests. Pro. Cotton, coffee, sugar, tobacco, maize, saffron, oranges, mangoes, and other fruits. Minerals. There are diamond mines, and amethysts have been found. Coal has been discovered, but the mineral resources of the province are imperfectly known. Area, 164,590 square miles. Pop. 1,655,403.

BAHIA, or SAN SALVADOR, city of, capital of the above province, situated on the noble Bay of All Saints, and built partly at the foot and partly on the summit of a steep hill, the Prava, or business part of the city, communicating with the higher part by flights of steps and a hydraulic lift. There are two suburbs, Bomosim and Victoria. It has a cathedral, the palaces of the governor and the archbishop, a town-hall, a hospital, a theatre, and several religious houses. No city in Brazil can rival Bahia in the beauty of its public buildings; and there are numerous educational institutions. Exp. Cotton, sugar, rice, rum, dye and fancy woods, tobacco, cigars, cocoa-nuts, horns, hides, and bullion. Imp. Manufactured goods, flour, salt, provisions, iron, glass, and wines. Pop. 140,000, of whom two-thirds are mulattoes and blacks. Lat. 13° S. Lon. 38° 20′ W.—This city was founded by Thomas de Souza in 1549, and was the capital of Brazil until 1763.

BAHRDT, KARL FRIEDRICH, bart, German theologian, at one time professor of Biblical antiquities at Erfurt; but his offensive rationalistic opinions, quarrelsome temper, and irregular habits, made him obnoxious to the authorities. He went to Halle, combining the occupations of lecturer on moral philosophy and keeping a tavern.

Born at Bischofswerda, 1741; died 1792.

BAHREIN, bah'-rein, a cluster of islands on the south-west side of the Persian Gulf, near the coast of Arabia, the principal of which are named Bahrein or Awal, Arad, Maharay, and Tamahoy. The first, which is considered the chief, lies about 15 miles from the coast, and 90 from Bushire. It is 70 miles long and 24 broad. It produces wheat, barley, dates, and other fruits. Its pearl-fishery is the most productive in the world. Exp. Pearls, sharks' fins, tortoise-shell, dried dates, canvas, and coloured cloths. Imp. Rice, spices, pepper, coffee, timber, iron, and corn. Pop. uncertain; perhaps 25,000. Lat. of its capital, Manama, 26° 12′ N. Lon. 50° 39′ 30″ E.

BAIÆ, bai'-i-e, a city of Campania, near the sea. It is famous for its delightful situation and baths, and here many of the Roman senators had country houses. It was destroyed by encroachments of the sea, but there are numerous ruins on the coast which attest the former magnificence of the place.

BAIBOUT, bai'-bout, a town of Turkish Armenia, on the Black Sea, 65 miles N.N.W. of Erzeroum. It was formerly a stronghold of the Genoese, but the fortifications were destroyed by the Russians in 1829. Pop. 6,000.

BAIF, JEAN ANTOINE DE, ba'-eef, French poet, natural son of Lazare de Baif, French Ambassador at Venice. He translated many of the Greek and Latin amatory poets, and founded, in Paris, the Académie Royale de Musique. Some of his poems are marked by grace and delicacy.

Born at Venice, 1532; died at Paris, 1589.

BAIKAL, bi'-kal, a freshwater lake of Siberia, in the government of Irkutsk, sometimes called the Sea of Baikal, or the Holy Sea. It is 397 miles in length and the breadth varies from 13 to 54 miles, the area being estimated at 12,500 square miles. It is situated amid steep mountain ranges, 1,360 feet above the sea level. The rivers Upper Angara, Selenga, the Barguzin, and others feed the lake, the only outlet of which is the Lower Angara, a tributary of the Yenisei. There are abundance of salmon, and a profitable sea fishery is carried on. Steam vessels traverse the lake. Near the north shore is the island of Olkhon, 32 miles long and about 10 broad. Lat. 52° to 55° 30′ N. Lon. 103° to 110° E.

BAIKIE, WILLIAM BALFOUR, African explorer and missionary. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and having taken the degree of M.D., entered the Royal Navy. He was, in 1854, appointed surgeon and naturalist to the Niger expedition, and succeeded to the command on the death of the senior officer. He ascended the river 250 miles beyond the point reached by any previous explorer. In 1857 he undertook another expedition, and established a model settlement, in which he acted as teacher, missionary, and physician, and opened up the navigation of the river, and established a market. He collected vocabularies of about fifty African dialects, and translated portions of the Bible and Prayer Book.

Born at Kirkwall, Orkney, 1824; died at Sierra Leone, 1862.

BAILDEN, or BAILDON, bail'-den, a town and chapelry in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 7 miles from Bradford. Pop. 3,000.

BAILEN, bai'-len, a town of Spain, in the province of Jaen. Near the town are the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Glass, tiles, and cloth. Pop. 7,800. In the neighbourhood, about 1150, Alphonso VIII. gained a great victory over the Moors, and it is said (but the statement must be received with considerable allowance for errors) killed 200,000 of the enemy, losing only twenty-five of his own men! In July, 1808, the French general Dupont, after a battle lasting several days, signed the capitulation of Bailen, delivering up 17,000 men as prisoners of war.

BAILEY, PHILIP JAMES, bai-le, English poet, author of "Festus," the "Angel World," the "Mystic," the "Age," &c. "Festus" is his greatest work; and although it was finished when the author was little more than twenty years of age, it contains some beautiful passages, notwithstanding the peculiarity of many of the sentiments with which it is disfigured.

Born at Nottingham, 1816.

BAILEY, SAMUEL, English author of numerous works on philosophical, economical, and political subjects. He was possessed of a large fortune realized by commercial pursuits, and at his death left 90,000*l.* for the benefit of his native town.

Born at Sheffield, 1791; died 1870.

BAILLET, ADRIEN, bai-yai', French author, the son of poor parents. He wrote a history of Holland, lives of the saints, a life of Descartes, and several other works.

Born at Neuville, Picardy, 1649; died at Paris, 1706.

BAILLEUL, or BELLE, bai'-yu(r)l, a town of France, department of Nord, on the river Lys, 13 miles from Lille. Manf. Woollens, cottons, hats, lace, thread, pottery, leather, cheese, beet-root sugar, and oil. Pop. under 10,000

BAILLI, ROCHE, bai'-ye, better known as La Rivière, was first physician to Henry IV., and pretended to great skill in astrology. He was a great admirer of Paracelsus, and wrote a summary of his doctrine.

Died 1605.

BAILLIE, JOANNA, bai'-le, a distinguished poet and dramatist. Her father was a Scotch clergyman and her mother the sister of the celebrated Dr. William Hunter. At an early period of her life she removed to London, and the greater part of her life was passed at Hampstead, where she always lived in retirement, and for some years before her death, in strict seclusion. Though not in the habit of receiving company, nearly all the great authors of her age had, at one time or another, been her guests. Sir Walter Scott passed many delightful hours with her, and in 1806 she spent some weeks in his house at Edinburgh. She is best known by her plays, some of which were written with a view of delineating the strongest passions of the mind, and to each of which she devoted a whole tragedy or comedy. Besides these "Plays on the Passions," her principal dramatic works were "The Family Legend," "De Montfort," "Henriquez," and "Count Basil." Some of her miscellaneous poems are very charming, and she wrote some admirable songs.

Born at Bothwell, Scotland, 1762; died at Hampstead, 1851, in her 89th year.

BAILLIE, MATTHEW, M.D., the brother of Joanna. He studied medicine and surgery under his uncle, William Hunter, and became one of the most distinguished anatomists and pathologists of his day. In 1810 he was made physician to George III., and was offered a baronetcy, which he declined. He wrote several works in connection with his profession. A monument has been erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Shotts, Lanarkshire, 1761; died on his estate in Gloucestershire, 1823.

BAILLIE, ROBERT, a Scotch divine, who, after taking his degree of M.A. in the Glasgow University, received episcopal orders, and became regent of the university. In 1638 he was a member of the famous Glasgow Assembly, and during the civil war he joined the Covenanters, and went to London to exhibit charges against Archbishop Laud. In 1642 he was made professor of divinity at Glasgow, and he was one of the commissioners sent by the General Assembly of Scotland to Charles II. at the Hague. At the Restoration he was made principal of his college, and might have had a bishopric if he would have conformed.

Born at Glasgow, 1602; died 1662.

BAILLIE, ROBERT, of Jerviswood, who has been styled the "Scottish Sydney," distinguished himself by his opposition to the tyrannical conduct of the Duke of Lauderdale. He was arrested on a trumped-up charge, imprisoned, and fined. He was charged with being implicated in the Rye-house Plot, tried in Edinburgh, and unjustly sentenced to death and executed.

Died 1684.

BAILLY, DAVID, a Dutch painter, studied in Holland and Italy, and attained considerable eminence in portraits. In 1613 he settled at Leyden, where he died.

Born at Leyden; died 1630.

BAILLY, JEAN SYLVAIN, bai'-ye, an eminent French astronomer, who at an early age evinced a strong inclination for scientific pursuits, which was encouraged by his friends. When young, he distinguished himself by a calculation of the comet of 1759. In 1763 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Science, and in 1766 published a work on the satellites of Jupiter. In 1768 he published the elogy of Leibnitz, for which he received a gold medal from the Academy of Berlin. This was followed by the elogies of Charles V., La Caille, Molière, and Corneille, which, with the former, were printed together. In 1775 appeared the first volume of his "History of Astronomy," the third and last volume of which was published in 1779. Besides these works, he published several historical disquisitions and astronomical observations. In 1789, entering eagerly into the political discussions of his native country, he was chosen president of the first National Assembly. He presided at that meeting of the deputies at the Tennis-court when all took oath not to dissolve until they had prepared a new constitution for France. In the following month he was made mayor of Paris, but soon lost his popularity, owing to the liberal sentiments which he expressed towards the royal family, and his enforcing obedience to the laws. In consequence of this, he resigned his office in 1791, and sought at Nantes that philosophical retirement for which he was so much more suited. In the sanguinary period which followed, he was apprehended at Melun, whither he had gone to visit the eminent astronomer Laplace, and after a summary process, condemned to be guillotined. When on the scaffold, the demeanour of this philosopher is said to have been perfectly tranquil. "You tremble, Bailly," said one of his enemies to him. "My friend, it is with cold," was the calm reply. Although there is much eloquent writing in Bailly's astronomical works, yet they are not always to be received as essentially correct, as he appears oftentimes to deal in surmises and speculations, rather than in ascertained and calculated facts.

Born at Paris, 1736; died 1793.

BAILY, EDWARD HODGES, R.A., bai'-le, an eminent sculptor, the son of a ship-carver. He began his career as an artist by producing small portrait busts in wax. Obtaining an introduction to Flaxman, he was admitted into the studio of that distinguished man. At the same time he entered as a student at the Royal Academy, where, in 1809, he obtained a silver medal, and in 1811 a gold medal, with an income of £50. The first work which fixed his popularity and placed him amongst the best sculptors of England, was his "Eve at the Fountain," which is now in the Bristol Library Institution. He was elected R.A. in 1821. Many of the statues of late years erected in London and the provinces are by him; and he was a regular exhibitor at the Royal Academy. Amongst his happiest efforts may be named his "Hercules casting Eyelas into the Sea," "the Sleeping Nymph," "Eve listening to the Voice," "Helena," "Psyche," "Maternal Love," and "the Girl preparing for the Bath." Amongst his latest productions was "the Graces seated," considered one of his best performances.

Born at Bristol, 1788; died in London, 1867.

BAILY, FRANCIS, the son of a banker, and himself a stockbroker up to his 51st year, when he began with ardour to cultivate the science of astronomy, which he unremittingly pursued throughout the rest of his life. He had previously shown profound mathematical knowledge by elaborate works on interest, annuities, and insurances, and other subjects connected with the doctrine of probabilities. He was one of the founders of the Astronomical Society, and not only distinguished himself by his industry, but by the method with which he was enabled to produce a great many works upon his favourite science. He repeated Cavendish's experiment to ascertain the specific gravity of the earth, investigated the action of the atmosphere on pendulum experiments, superintended the publication of the catalogue of the fixed stars, and greatly improved the "Nautical Almanac." He published, in 1835, a life of Flamsteed, the first Astronomer Royal. "Baily's beads," a peculiar appearance visible during the period of an eclipse of the sun, take their name from this astronomer.

Born at Newbury, 1774; died 1844.

BAIN, bäng, a town of France, in the department of Ille and Vilaine, 18 miles from Rennes. Manf. Woollen stuffs, and it has a trade in cattle. Pop. about 4,000.

BAINBRIDGE, bain'-brĭdj, a township in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Askrigg. Pop. 1,000.

BAINBRIDGE, JOHN, a physician and astronomer, who, after taking his degrees at Cambridge and keeping a school at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, settled in London, where he gained so great a reputation for his mathematical knowledge, that Sir Henry Saville appointed him his first astronomical professor at Oxford. He published several astronomical works, and also left some mathematical MSS.

Born at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, 1582; died at Oxford, 1643.

BAINES, EDWARD, English journalist and politician. He was apprenticed to a printer at Preston, and afterwards started in business for himself at Leeds. In 1801 he became proprietor of the Leeds Mercury, which, under his management, became a very influential organ. He entered Parliament for Leeds in 1834 and sat until 1848. He was the author of several valuable works on the histories of Yorkshire and Lancashire, a history of the wars of Napoleon, and a history of the reign of George III.

Born at Walton-le-Dale, Lancashire, 1774; died 1848.

BAINES, MATTHEW TALBOT, son of the above. He was educated at Cambridge, and adopted the bar for his profession. In 1847 he was returned to Parliament for Hull, and in 1852 for Leeds. He was appointed President of the Poor Law Board in 1848, and again in 1852. In 1856 he became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with a seat in the cabinet.

Born 1799; died 1860.

BAINI, GIUSEPPE, ba-ē'-ne, Italian musical composer; appointed in 1814 musical director of the pontifical chapel at Rome. His life of Palestrini, including a critical survey of his works, is a work of high repute.

Born at Rome, 1775; died 1844.

BAINS, bäng, three towns of France with small populations. One in the department of the Eastern Pyrenees, 15 miles from Perpignan; another in the department of the Vosges, 13 miles from Epinal; the third in the department Aude, 10 miles from Limoux.

BAIRD, SIR DAVID, baird, an intrepid general, who at an early age entered the Indian army, and in 1780 was made a prisoner by Hyder Ali, and suffered greatly in his captivity. After his release and return home, he again went out to India, in 1791, and in 1799 led the storming party which took Seringapatam. For his bravery on this occasion he received the thanks of the Parliament and the East-India Company. This was the great exploit of his life, although he shared in the glory of Corunna, under Sir John Moore. On the death of that distinguished officer he became commander-in-chief, but could not take advantage of this success, from his arm being so dreadfully shattered that it had to be amputated at the shoulder. For his gallant conduct, however, he again received the thanks of Parliament, and was created a baronet. His military career was both long and active, having served in various parts of the globe.

Born at Newbyth, Aberdeenshire, 1757; died 1829.

BAIRDSTOWN, bairds'-toun, a post township of the United States, and capital of Nelson county, Kentucky. It is 55 miles W.S.W. of Lexington, on a branch of Salt River. There is a large Roman Catholic college. Pop. 2,000.

BAIREUTH, bī'-reut, or BAYREUTH, a city of Bavaria, the capital of Upper Franconia, on the left bank of the Maine, crossed by two bridges, 40 miles N.N.E. of Nuremberg. There are two castles, one erected in 1454, the other in 1753; a superb opera house; and a new theatre, where the composer Wagner, famous for his musical theories, produces his grand operas. The Stadt-Kirche is a church dating from the 15th century, and contains some interesting monuments; and there are several good public buildings. Manf. Cottons and woollens, leather, parchment, porcelain, and tobacco. Pop. 23,531. Here Jean Paul Richter died in 1825. A monument to his memory was erected in this place by the king of Bavaria. Baireuth was ceded to France by Prussia in 1807; and transferred to Bavaria 1810.

BAITHOSUS, bai-thō'-sus, a Jew, who, with his fellow disciple Sadoc, founded a sect which denied a future state and resurrection. At first this sect was called both Baithosæi and Sadducees; but in process of time it was only distinguished by the latter term.

BAJA, ba-zha, a considerable market-town of Hungary, in the county of Bacs, on the left bank of the Danube, 90 miles S. of Buda. It has a castle, several churches, and a gymnasium. There are four annual markets, and a large trade in grain and pigs is carried on. Pop. 18,000.

BAJADA-DE-SANTA-FE', ba-hä'-da dai sant'-ta fai, a town of the Plata confederation, on the E. bank of the Parana, opposite Santa Fé. Pop. about 7,000.

BAJAZET I., ba-ya-zet', sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Amurath I., in 1389, and soon after put his younger brother to death. He pushed his conquests far into Asia and Europe, and in 1396 gained a great victory over the Christian army under Sigismund, king of Hungary. In 1402, however, he experienced a terrible defeat from the famous Timur, or Tamerlane, on the plains of Angora. Bajazet was taken prisoner. Different accounts are given of his treatment, by the Persian and Turkish historians. The former assert that he was entertained in a liberal manner; while the latter maintain that Timur shut him in an iron cage, and exposed him to the derision of the populace. The latter story has probably arisen from a mistake as to the word for a litter.

Born 1347; died 1403.

BAJAZET II., sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Mahomet II., in 1481. He was opposed by his brother, Zizim, whom he defeated. Zizim escaped to Rhodes, whence the grand master (see AUBUSSON) sent him to Italy, where Bajazet caused him to be assassinated. He obtained several advantages over the Venetians and other Christian powers. His son Selim rebelled against him; but Bajazet, instead of punishing him, abdicated in his favour, an act which, it is said, Selim repaid by causing him to be poisoned.

Died 1512.

BAJOUR, ba-joor, a territory of N. Afghanistan. Area, estimated at 370 square miles. Desc. Fertile, surrounded by mountains, clothed with forests of cedar and oak. Its chief town is called Bajour, and is supposed to be the Bazira of the historian of Alexander the Great. Pop. 120,000.

BAJUS, or DE BAY, MICHAEL, bai-jus, controversial theologian, who at an early age became professor of divinity at Louvain. He was selected by the king of Spain to go to the Council of Trent; but his theological views were opposed by the Jesuits, and were condemned by the Sorbonne and Pope Pius V. He bore the condemnation patiently.

Born in Hainaut, 1513; died 1589.*

BAJZA, ANTON, bite'-sha, Hungarian poet and critic, who produced many poems, histories, and dramatic criticisms. In 1837 he was appointed director of the new national theatre at Pesth. He was a friend of Kossuth, and the editor of his newspaper. He died of brain disease.

Born at Szüosi, 1804; died 1858.

BAKER, HENRY, an eminent naturalist, who was brought up a bookseller, which pursuit he relinquished, and undertook the tuition of deaf and dumb persons. He married a daughter of Daniel Defoe, by whom he had two sons. He was chosen fellow of the Society of Antiquaries and Royal Society, and, in 1744, obtained from the latter the gold medal for his microscopical experiments on saline particles. He published the "Microscope made Easy," 8vo, 1742; and "Employment for the Microscope," 8vo, 1764. He also wrote original poems, serious and humorous, published in 8vo, 1725. He left £100 to the Royal Society for an anatomical or chemical lecture, which is called the Bakerian lecture.

Born in London, 1698; died 1774.

BAKER, SIR RICHARD, historical writer, who, in 1603, was knighted by James I., and, in 1620, was high-sheriff of Oxfordshire. An unfortunate marriage reduced him to poverty, and he was thrown into the Fleet prison, where he wrote several books, the chief of which is a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," which went through several editions, and was long popular with the people. This is the chronicle from which Addison, in his "Spectator," makes Sir Roger de Coverley say he drew "many observations." It brings the history of England down to the death of James I.

Born at Sissinghurst, Kent, 1568; died in the Fleet, 1645.

BAKER, SIR SAMUEL WHITE, African explorer. After a residence of several years in Ceylon, and, as an engineer planning railways in southern Russia, he turned his attention to African exploration, and, accompanied by his wife, spent some time in tracing the course of the Nile. In 1864 he discovered the lake Albert Nyanza. In 1869 he undertook the command of an expedition, organized by the viceroy of Egypt, to suppress the slave trade and open up a commercial route between Egypt and central Africa.

Born in Worcestershire, 1821.

BAKER, THOMAS, a mathematician and divine, who published the "Geometrical Key; or, the Gate of Equations unlocked," 1684. The Royal Society sent him some questions, which he solved so satisfactorily that they presented him with a medal.

Born at Ilton, in Somersetshire, 1625; died 1690.

BAKER, THOMAS, antiquary. He was educated at Cambridge, and became rector of Long Newton, Durham, in 1687. He refused to take the oaths to king William, and in consequence was deprived of his rectory and his university fellowship. He bequeathed a very valuable collection of manuscripts to the university.

Born at Crook, Durham, 1656; died at Cambridge, 1740.

BAKER, a county of Georgia, U.S., watered by the river Flint. The chief town is Navton. Area, 1,296 square miles. Pro. Principally sugar. Pop. 7,307.

BAKER ISLAND, an island in the Polar Sea, discovered by Captain Parry. Lat. 74° 58′ N. Lon. 97° 54′ W.

BAKER'S ISLAND, an island in Massachusetts, U.S., off Salem Harbour, 5 miles from Salem. On its N. end is a lighthouse.

BAKER'S RIVER, a river of New Hampshire, U.S. which debouches into the Merrimac at Plymouth.

BAKEWELL, baik'-wel, a market-town of Derbyshire, situate amidst beautiful scenery, near the confluence of the rivers Wye and Derwent, and 11 miles from Chesterfield. There are coal, lead, and zinc mines and quarries in the neighbourhood, and it has several cotton-mills. Marble-turning, polishing, and inlaying, affords occupation to many of the inhabitants. The chalybeate springs are much frequented by invalids. The grammar-school is ancient. There is a large cruciform Gothic church, All Saints, founded in the Saxon times. About 2 miles from Bakewell stands Haddon Hall, the most perfect of England's baronial residences now in existence. Chatsworth, the beautiful seat of the duke of Devonshire, where Sir Joseph Paxton first displayed his horticultural talents, is 4 miles from the town. A station on the Midland Railway.

BAKEWELL, ROBERT, a celebrated agriculturist, who turned his attention to the improvement of the breed of cattle; for which purpose he travelled over England, and into Ireland and Holland. His endeavours were so successful that the Dishley sheep were distinguished above all others, and he let one of his rams for the sum of 400 guineas; another produced in one season 800 guineas. He also greatly improved the breed of black cattle.

which are still distinguished as the new Leicestershire breed of "long-horned."

Born at Dishley, 1726; died 1795.

BAKHCHISARAI, or BAGTCHE-SERAI, bak'-she-sa'-rai, "the palace of the gardens," a large town of European Russia, in the Crimea, 10 miles S.S.W. of Simferopol. It consists of irregular streets and houses, mostly of wood, and has 35 mosques, a Greek church, and many fountains. The palace, or Khan-Serai, was erected in 1519, and restored for the reception of the Empress Catherine in 1787. A large cemetery is near the palace; and in the neighbourhood is Chufut-Kali, the Jews' city, occupied by Karaitic Jews. Manf. Turkey leather, saddles, silk stuffs, and cutlery. There is a large trade in corn, flax, fruit, and tobacco. Pop. estimated at 10,500, mostly Tartars. Lat. 45° 10′ N. Lon. 33° 52′ E.

BAKHMUT, bak-moot, a Russian town in the government of Ekaterinoslav. There are large coal fields in the neighbourhood. Pop. 17,000.

BAKTEGAN, or BAKTEGHIAN, bak'-te-gan, a salt lake of Persia, in the province of Farsistan, about 50 miles from Shiraz. Ext. 60 miles long, with an average breadth of 8. It yields salt in large quantities.

BAKU, or BADKU, ba-ku, a town belonging to Russia, in the province of Daghestan, occupying the peninsula of Apsheron, on the west coast of the Caspian Sea. It stands on a declivity near to the sea, and is defended by a double wall and deep ditch. On the hill is a castle dating from the 15th century. The mosque of Shah Abbas is in good preservation. The remarkable escape of inflammable gas in the neighbourhood made Baku for many centuries a great resort of the fire-worshippers. It is a principal station of the Russian fleet, and a place of considerable trade. A great quantity of cotton is cultivated in the neighbourhood, which is particularly prized. Exp. Cotton, fruit, opium, rice, silk, wine, rock-salt, and naphtha. Imp. Wine, silks, cloths, dye-stuffs, iron, and linen. Petroleum is obtained in vast abundance from wells in the principality, particularly about eight miles from the town. Pop. of town, 6,000; of district, 30,000. Lat. 42° 22′ N. Lon. 51° 7′ E. The district was taken possession of by Russia in 1806. (For a description of the Apsheron peninsula, see APSHERON.)

BALA, ba'-la, a market-town of North Wales in the county of Merioneth, situate on Bala Pool, 17 miles N.E. of Dolgelly. Manf. Knitted woollen gloves and stockings, and flannel. Pop. 1,539.

BALAAM, bai'-lăm, the son of Beor, or Bosor, a soothsayer of Pethor, a town of Mesopotamia. We read in the book of Numbers that he was sent for by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites; but, moved by a superior power, he pronounced a blessing instead of a curse. He was slain with Balak in battle, about 1450 B.C.

BALACHNA, or BALAKHNA, ba-lak'-na, a town of European Russia, in the government of Nijnii Novgorod, on the Volga, 120 miles from St. Petersburg. It has upwards of 12 churches, and has a good trade in grain. Pop. about 4,000. Lat. 56° 30′ N. Lon. 43° 29′ E.

BALAGANSKOI, ba'-la-gans'-koi', a town of Russia, in the government of Irkutsk, 30 miles from Irkutsk. Lat. 53° 45′ N.

BALAGHAUT, or BALAGHAT, ba'-la-gaut, "above the ghauts or hills," a district of the Central Province of India. It is possessed of lofty hills running from east to west, and there are extensive forests. These highlands were desolate and uncultivated until the formation of the district in 1866; but they are now becoming settled by immigrants from the adjoining districts. There are only two towns of any importance, Hatta and Langi. Area, 2,608 square miles. Pop. 240,554. Lat. between 21° and 23° N. Lon. between 80° and 81° E.

BALAGUER, ba'-la-goo'-air, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 16 miles from Lerida, on the Segre. Pop. nearly 5,000. There is a strong castle here which commands the town.

BALAK, bai'-lak, "who lays waste," an idolatrous king of Moab, an enemy of Israel.

BALAKLAVA, bă-lăk-la'-va, a small seaport-town of European Russia, in the Crimea, 6 miles S. of Sebastopol. In its vicinity is the monastery of St. George. The harbour, which has a remarkably narrow entrance, resembles a deep Highland loch; it is surrounded by high rugged hills, and overhanging it are the ruins of an old Genoese fort. It was to this place that the French and English allied army, after the battle of the Alma, made the celebrated flank march from the north of Sebastopol, reaching the valley on the 26th September, 1854; and in the port they were met by a portion of the fleet, carrying the siege train and provisions. Balaklava harbour, being too small for both the English and French fleets, was retained by the English, whilst the French occupied Kamiesch Bay. On October 25th, 1854, was fought the battle of Balaklava, in which the "thin red line" of Highland infantry under Lord Clyde, then Sir Colin Campbell, repelled the attack of the Russian cavalry. But this day is more especially memorable for the splendid charge of the light brigade of British cavalry; of which exploit Tennyson, the poet-laureate, has sung,—

"Into the jaws of death rode the six hundred."

Of 600 horsemen, nearly two-thirds were killed, wounded, or made prisoners. The frightful state of Balaklava harbour during the winter of 1854-55, the miseries endured by the English army through the failure of the commissariat and other departments, and from want of transport from the port to the front, are matters of history, and belong to the narrative of the Crimean war. (See CRIMEA.)

BALAMBANGAN, ba'-lam-ban'-gan, a fruitful island of the Asiatic Archipelago, between Borneo and Magindano. Lat. 7° 15′ N. Lon. 117° 5′ E.

BALAS, or BALÆ, ba'-las, a town of Syria, situate at the north-west corner of the Bay of Alexandretta or Iscanderoon, supposed to be the ancient Issus, in Cilicia. Not far from it was fought the second battle in which Alexander the great defeated Darius.

BALASORE, ba'-la-sor, a district of British India, in the Orissa division, forming a strip of alluvial land between the hills and the sea, varying from 9 to 34 miles in breadth. Salt and rice are the principal articles of produce. Area, 2,666 square miles. Pop. 945,280.

BALASORE, the capital of the above district, is situate in the Boorabullung. It is a seaport much frequented by Maldive and coasting vessels; but a bar across the mouth of the harbour prevents the access of large ships. Pop. 20,265. Lat. 21° 29′ N. Lon. 87° E.

BALASSI, MARIO, ba-las'-se, an Italian historical and portrait painter, whose best works are his picture of "St. Francis," and "The Miracle of St. Nicholas of Tolentino."

Born at Florence, 1604; died 1667.

BALASSA-GYARMATH, bal-as'-sa-gy'-ar-math, a town in Hungary, 40 miles N.N.E. of Pesth, on the left bank of the Eipel, in the midst of a very fertile district. Near the town are the ruins of an old castle, famous for having sustained several sieges by the Turks. Pop. 4,600.

BALATON, bal'-la-ton, a lake in Hungary, 55 miles S.W. of Pesth. Ext. 48 miles long, and from three to ten broad. Area, estimated at 420 square miles. It abounds with fish, and its waters are slightly saline.

BALBASTRO, or BARBASTRO, bal-bas'-tro, a town of Spain, in Aragon, 30 miles from Saragossa. Pop. 5,000.

BALBI, ADRIAN, bal'-bee, Italian geographer, author of several works of great value.
Born at Venice, 1782; died 1848.

BALBI, GASPARO, bal'-be, a Venetian merchant, who, as a dealer in precious stones, left Aleppo in 1579, on a journey to the Indies, and did not return till 1588. On his return he published an account of his journey. He visited Ormuz, Goa, Cochin, and Pegu, and describes what he saw with considerable spirit and, it is believed, with accuracy.
Died 1588.

BALBI, ADRIAN, a Venetian, who at an early period of his life was appointed professor of geography and natural philosophy in his native town, but in 1820 went to Portugal. In 1822 he published his "Statistical Essay on the Kingdom of Portugal." This publication procured him considerable fame. He then settled in Paris, and in 1826 published his celebrated "Geographical Atlas, &c.," which was the first work to make the French acquainted with the researches of Adelung and other German philologists and geographers. He subsequently gave to the world an "Abridgment of Geography," on a new plan, and the work has been translated into most European languages. In 1832 he quitted Paris for Padua.
Born at Venice, 1782; died at Padua, 1848.

BALBINUS, DECIMUS CÆLIUS, băl-bi'-nus, a Roman, who, after governing provinces with credit and honour, was elected joint emperor of Rome, after the assassination of Gordianus. He was afterwards murdered by his soldiers.
Died 242.

BALBO, CESARE, bal'-bo, Italian statesman and writer, son of a high official at the Piedmontese Court, and syndic of the capital. At the age of nine he went to Paris, and from 1808 to 1814 was in the service of Napoleon. He was commissioner of the Illyrian provinces, ceded to France by the peace of Vienna. After the fall of the emperor, he undertook political missions to Paris and London on behalf of his native country. The Piedmontese revolution of 1821 drove him into exile, and, although he was permitted to return, he was not allowed to resume a political position. He devoted himself to literature, advocating the independence of Italy, and producing a life of Dante, besides historical works.
Born at Turin, 1789; died 1853.

BALBOA, VASCO NUNEZ DE, vas'-ko noon'-yais bal-bo'-a, a poor Spanish gentleman, was one of the first who visited the West Indies, where he gained immense riches. He settled on the coast of Darien, where he built a town. In 1513 he crossed the isthmus, he and his party being the first white men who had seen the Pacific Ocean from the American coast, and returned next year with a prodigious quantity of wealth. He sent an account of his discovery to Spain, and the king appointed Pedrarias D'Avila governor of Darien, who on his arrival was astonished to see Balboa in a cotton jacket, with sandals made of hemp on his feet, and dwelling in a thatched hut. The governor, notwithstanding that he had given Balboa his daughter in marriage, was jealous of his abilities, and caused him to be beheaded.
Born in Estremadura, 1475; died 1517.

BALBRIGGAN, băl-brĭg'-ăn, a seaport of Ireland, 18 miles N.N.E. of Dublin. It is a favourite watering-place, a coastguard station, and has a harbour protected by a pier 600 feet long, on which there is a lighthouse. A viaduct of 11 arches crosses the harbour. Manf. Muslin embroidery, and calico and stocking weaving. "Balbriggan hosiery" is a term well known to the dealers in those articles. Pop. 2,332.

BALCANQUAL, WALTER, băl'-kan-quăl, a learned Scotch divine, who attended James I. to England, and became chaplain to the king, master of the Savoy, and representative of the Church of Scotland at the synod of Dordt. In 1624 he was made dean of Rochester; and in 1639 dean of Durham. He suffered severely in the rebellion. He wrote the declaration of King Charles I. concerning the late tumults in Scotland, folio, 1630; epistles concerning the synod of Dordt, in John Hales's "Golden Remains," and some sermons.
Died at Chirk Castle, in Denbighshire, in 1645.

BALCARRY, băl-kăr'-e, a seaport of Scotland, on the Solway Frith, 10 miles from Kirkcudbright.

BALCHEN, JOHN, bal'-chen, an English admiral, who, entering early into the navy, rose to the command of a ship, and distinguished himself by his bravery in the Mediterranean, under Sir George Byng. In 1734 he was made an admiral; and in 1743 was appointed governor of Greenwich Hospital. He soon after went with a squadron to relieve Sir Charles Hardy, who, with a large fleet of transports, was blockaded in the Tagus. Having accomplished this service, he sailed for England; but encountering a violent storm, his ship, the Victory, was lost on the Caskets, near Jersey, and every soul on board perished, October 3, 1744. A monument in Westminster Abbey commemorates this melancholy event.
Born 1669; died 1744.

BALDE, JACOB, bawl'-de, German poet. He was a Jesuit preacher, and his poems, chiefly in Latin, have been praised in the highest terms by Schlegel, and other critics.
Born in Alsace, 1603; died at Neuberg, 1668.

BALDER, or, BALDEER, bawl'-der ("the pre-eminent one"), in Scandinavian mythology the son of Odin and Friga. He was supreme in beauty and virtue. The story of his life and death is related in the Scandinavian Eddas, in some of which he is spoken of as a personification of the sun.

BALDERIC, or BAUDRY, bal'-de-rik, a French historian, who became bishop of Dol, in Brittany, and was at the council of Clermont. He wrote a history of the crusade to the year 1099.
Died 1130.—There was another bishop of the same age, who wrote a chronicle of the bishops of Arras and Cambray.
Died 1097.

BALDI, Bernardino, bal'-de, a learned Italian, who studied at Padua, and afterwards became tutor to Duke Ferrante Gonzago, who presented him to the rich abbacy of Guastalla. In 1612 he was sent by the Duke as envoy to Venice to congratulate the new Doge, and greatly distinguished himself by his oration. He was considered to be the most universal genius of the age, and is said to have mastered 16 languages. He is credited with the authorship of a hundred different books. He translated into Italian several works of the ancient mathematicians, and wrote some good poems in that language; was also the author of several philological works, and commenced a "Universal Historical Geography." His lives of mathematicians were printed in 1707.

Born at Urbino, 1533; died 1617.

BALDI, Lazaro, an historical painter, a native of Tuscany, and the disciple of Pietro da Cortona. He was employed by Alexander VII. to paint for the palace of the Quirinal a "David killing Goliath." Many of his pictures are to be seen in the churches at Rome.

Born at Pistoia, 1623; died at Rome, 1703.

BALDINI, Baccio, bal-de'-ne, a Florentine engraver, who is said to have been taught the art by Finiguerra, who, according to the Italians, was its inventor, but whose instructions were ill carried out by his pupil. His works, therefore, have no value further than such as arises from their being representations of the first efforts of one of the earliest Italian engravers.

Born 1436; died 1514.

BALDINUCCI, Filippo, bal'-de-nootch'-e, an Italian artist and biographer, who passed an industrious life both with the pencil and the pen. He wrote "The General History of Painters," 6 vols.; "A Vocabulary of Designs;" "An Account of the Progress of Engraving on Copper."

Born at Florence, 1624; died 1696.

BALDOCK, bal'-dok, Ralph de, bishop of London, whom, in 1307, King Edward I. appointed lord high chancellor. He wrote a history of British affairs, which Leland had seen, though it is now lost.

Died 1314.

BALDOCK, a market-town of England, in Hertford. The old church was restored in 1868. Corn and malt are the chief articles of traffic. Pop. 1,974. 38 miles N. of London. A station on the Great Northern Railway.

BALDOVINETTO, Alessio, bal-do-vi-nat'-to, a Florentine painter. His principal works were altar-pieces, and a fine series of frescoes in the church of Santa Trinita, Florence, containing many interesting portraits. He painted the portrait of Dante for the cathedral. He was also an excellent artist in mosaic.

Born at Florence, 1422; died 1499.

BALDUINUS, Jacobus, bal-du-i'-nus, Italian jurist, professor of civil law in the university of Bologna, and podesta of Genoa, the laws of which he reformed.

Died at Bologna, 1225.

BALDUCCI, Francesco, bal-du'-che, Italian poet. At first a soldier, then an ecclesiastic. His verses, of a gay and amorous character, were greatly admired. He died of fever in a hospital.

Born 1600; died 1642.

BALDUCCI, Giovanni, also named COSCI, Italian painter, famous for large decorations and altar-pieces for churches.

Died 1600.

BALDUNG, Hans, bal'-doong, called also Hans Grün, a distinguished German painter and wood-engraver, the friend of Albert Dürer. As a painter he was considered little inferior to his great friend. His heads are the best specimens of his works.

Born in Suabia, about 1470; died 1552.

BALDUS, Italian jurist, professor in the university of Perugia. He had a great reputation among his contemporaries, and taught law at Pisa, Florence, Padua, and Pavia, and was the adviser of the Pope.

Born 1327.

BALDWIN I., bald'-win, first Latin emperor of Constantinople, was the son of Baldwin, count of Hainault, and distinguished himself so greatly in the fourth crusade, that on the conquest of Constantinople, in 1204, he was chosen emperor. The Greeks, however, assisted by the king of Bulgaria, defeated him in a battle, 1205, at the same time making him prisoner, and he died in confinement in the following year.

Born at Valenciennes, 1171; died 1206.

BALDWIN II., emperor of Constantinople, was the son of Peter de Courtenay, count of Auxerre, and the sister of the above emperor. He succeeded his brother Robert in the empire of the East, in 1228, being only eleven years of age. In 1261 Constantinople was taken by Michael Palæologus, and Baldwin escaped by sea to Italy, where he died. With him terminated the short dynasty of the Latin emperors of Constantinople.

Born 1217; died 1273.

BALDWIN I., king of Jerusalem, was the son of Eustace, count of Bouillon, and accompanied his brother Godfrey of Bouillon into Palestine, where he was chosen count of the state of Edessa. He succeeded his brother as baron of Jerusalem and protector of the Holy Sepulchre, and assumed the title of king in 1100. For eighteen years he waged war against the Turks, the Arabs, the Persians, and the Saracens. He took many towns, and secured for the Christians the coast of Syria, from the Gulf of Issus to the confines of Egypt. He was buried on Mount Calvary. In the first canto of the "Gerusalemme" of Tasso, the poet has depicted the character of this monarch as well as that of his brother Godfrey.

Born 1058; died 1118.

BALDWIN II., king of Jerusalem, cousin of the preceding, and the son of Hugh, count of Rethel, was crowned in 1118, after Eustace, brother of Baldwin I., had renounced all claim to the vacant throne. In 1120 he gained a great victory over the Saracens, but in 1124 he was taken prisoner by them, and was ransomed only by giving up the city of Tyre. In 1131 he abdicated in favour of his son-in-law, Foulques of Anjou, and retired to a monastery, where he died. The military and religious order of the Templars, for the defence of the Holy Land, was instituted in the reign of this monarch.

Died 1131.

BALDWIN III., was the son of Foulques of Anjou, whom he succeeded in 1143. He three times defeated Sultan Noureddin, of Aleppo; but under his reign the Christians lost Edessa. It is supposed that he died from the effects of poison. He was esteemed a model of knighthood.

Born 1129; died at Tripolis, 1162.

BALDWIN, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In the centre of Georgia. Area, 329 square miles, producing sugar and tobacco.

Pop. 13,806. 2. In the south of Alabama. Area, 2,000 square miles, of a fertile soil. Pop. 8,603.

BALDWIN, THOMAS, a Cistercian monk, who became bishop of Worcester in 1180 and archbishop of Canterbury in 1184. He laid the foundation of the palace at Lambeth. He went to the Holy Land with Richard I., and died at the siege of Ptolemais (St. Jean d'Acre.)

Died 1191.

BALDWIN, or BALDWYN, WILLIAM, a schoolmaster and divine, who pursued the occupation of printing in order to promote the Reformation. He is said to have written some comedies; at all events, he was "engaged in the reigns of Edward VI. and Philip and Mary, if not earlier, in preparing theatrical entertainments for the court." His name, however, is most endeared to the lovers of literature for his having been one of the authors and editors of "The Mirrour for Magistrates," which "occupies the annals of English poetry from Surrey to Spenser."

Died 1564.

BALE, BASEL, or BASLE, bal, one of the cantons of Switzerland, bounded N. by the grand duchy of Baden, N.W. by Alsace, E. by the canton of Aargau, and S. and S.W. by the cantons of Solothurn and Berne. It is mountainous in the S., being intersected by branches of the Jura range; and flat in the N., where it is watered by the Rhine. The soil is for the most part fertile, and there is excellent pasturage on the mountain slopes.

Rivers.—The Rhine, and its tributaries the Ergolz and Birz. Other affluents of the Rhine plentifully water the whole of the canton, which altogether belongs to the basin of that river.

Forests.—Considerable, and chiefly consisting of ash, pine, fir, and oak.

Pro.—Wine, corn, and fruit. Cattle are depastured in the mountain regions, and excellent butter and cheese are made.

Manf.—The greater part of the population is employed in manufactures, of which ribbon-making is the most important. Woollens, linens, leather, and steel-wares are made, however, and command an extensive sale.

Area, 180 square miles.

Pop. 124,372.

History.—In 1832 this canton was divided into two parts, each made entirely independent of the other, the one urban, the other rural, respectively named Basel-stadt and Basel-landschaft. The latter comprises the whole territory of the old canton, with the exception of the town of Basel, its suburbs, and three parishes on the right bank of the Rhine, which together form the canton of Basel-stadt.

BALE, or BASEL, the capital of the above canton, and, next to Geneva, the largest town in Switzerland. It lies on the Rhine, which divides it into two unequal parts, Great Basel, the city proper, on the south side, and Little Basel, on the N., connected by a bridge of 800 feet in length. It has an old gothic cathedral, occupying the site of the ancient Roman fort Basilia, a town-house, an arsenal, a university, founded in 1459, an excellent library, a cabinet of medals, and botanic garden. The cathedral was built in 1019, by Henry II., and contains the tombs of Erasmus, Œcolampadius, Bernouilli, and Anne, the wife of Rudolf of Hapsburg, female parent of the line of Austrian princes. There are several other interesting churches. The arsenal contains the armour worn by Charles the Bold at the battle of Nancy. Erasmus, Bernouilli, and Euler were professors in the university; and the library connected with the botanic garden is said to be the best of its kind in Europe.

Manf.—Ribbons, silk, and cotton stuffs, paper, linen, and gloves. There are also a number of dying-works and caching-fields.

Pop. 61,399.

Lat. 47° 33′ 34″ N. Lon. 7° 35′ E.

History.—In the 11th century this city was the greatest in Helvetia; and there is a cross a little way from its walls, commemorating the battle of St. Jacob, fought in 1444, where, out of 1,600 Swiss, only 10 were left alive by a French army which they attacked, and which was twenty times their number. The valour displayed by the Swiss on this occasion led to their enrolment as a body-guard of the monarchs of France. The field of this severe conflict produces a red wine, called Schweizerblut (Swiss blood), which is esteemed the best in the canton. In the 15th century the great Council of Basel was held. In 1501 the town became a member of the Swiss Confederacy; and it was one of the chief centres of the Reformation. Treaties of peace between France and Spain and France and Prussia were signed here July 22, 1795. It was the birthplace of Bernouilli, Euler, and the two Holbeins, and was the chosen residence of Erasmus, who, in 1536, died here.

BALE, JOHN, bail, an English divine, who from a Carmelite monk became a zealous Protestant and writer against popery. On the death of his patron, Lord Cromwell, he went to Holland, but returned to England on the accession of Edward VI. and obtained a living in Hampshire. In 1552 he was appointed to the bishopric of Ossory, in Ireland, where he laboured in reforming his diocese with such zeal that his life was threatened by the priests. On the accession of Mary he retired to Bâle, in Switzerland, where he remained till Elizabeth ascended the throne, when he returned to England, and obtained a prebend of Canterbury. He wrote several works, the best known of which is entitled "An Account of the Lives of Eminent Writers of Britain, from the time of Japhet, the son of Noah, to the year 1559." He was also one of the last writers of miracle plays.

BALEARIC ISLANDS, bāl-e-ar'-ik, a group of islands in the Mediterranean, lying to the south and east of Spain, to whom they belong, and formerly constituting the kingdom of Majorca. They are five in number,—MAJORCA, MINORCA, IVIZA Cabrera, and Formentara. Area of the whole, 1860 square miles. Pop. 300,473. Lat. between 38° 40′ and 40° 5′ N. Lon. between 1° and 5° E.

BALECHOU, NICHOLAS, bal'-shoo, a French engraver, who was expelled from the Academy of Painters for surreptitiously selling first-proof impressions of his print of Frederick Augustus, elector of Saxony and king of Poland, contrary to the orders of the dauphiness. His engravings are held in high estimation.

Born at Arles, 1710; died 1765.

BALEN, HENRY VAN, bā'-len, an historical and portrait painter, whose best works are "St. John preaching in the Desert," and the "Judgment of Paris." His son John Van Balen distinguished himself as a painter of history and landscapes.

Born at Antwerp, 1560; died 1632.

BALES, PETER, bails, a celebrated penman, who excelled not only in elegant writing, but in miniature penmanship; and was employed by Walsingham in imitating the handwriting of conspirators, whose letters he had intercepted. He kept a school near the Old Bailey, London. He published in 1590 the "Writing Master," in three parts; the first teaching swift writing; the second, true writing; the third, fair writing; and as a proof of his attainments in penmanship, we are told that he wrote out the Bible in shorthand so small that it could be enclosed in the shell of an English walnut.

Born 1547; died 1610.

BALESTRA, ANTONY, bā-lais'-tra, an eminent historical painter, who, in 1694, gained the prize of merit given by the Academy of St. Luke. His productions were numerous, and many of his works are to be seen in the Venetian states.

Born at Verona, 1666; died 1740.

BALFE, MICHAEL WILLIAM, balf, musical composer. At the early age of 16 he performed in the orchestra at Drury Lane Theatre. He afterwards went to Italy; and appeared as a vocalist, in 1827, at Paris, in the "Barber of Seville." He continued a career of general good fortune on the continent till 1835, when he returned to London, and appeared in several of his own compositions. In 1839 he became lessee of the English Opera House, but the speculation did not succeed, and Mr. Balfe relinquished the managerial chair, and resumed the composer's pen. His principal compositions are: "The Siege of Rochelle," "The Maid of Artois," "Catherine Grey," "Falstaff," "Joan of Arc," "Keolanthe," "The Bohemian Girl," which attained an enormous popularity, "The Enchantress," "The Boudman," "L'Etoile de Séville," "The Maid of Honour," "Elfrida," "The Rose of Castile," "Satanella," "Bianca," "The Talisman," &c.

Born at Dublin, 1808; died 1870.

BALFOUR, SIR JAMES, băl'-for, lord president of the Court of Session in Scotland, and the reputed author of "Practicks of the Law." He was educated for the church, and avowed the principles of the Reformers. He was condemned to the galleys for alleged participation in the murder of Cardinal Beaton, but obtained pardon and Court favour by abjuring Protestantism. He was an active and scrupulous politician, and rose to eminence as a privy councillor and judge, and was with Mary Queen of Scots at Holyrood on the night of the assassination of Rizzio. He was, shortly afterwards, knighted by the queen, and subsequently attached himself to the fortunes of Bothwell, uniting in the conspiracy against Darnley. He prepared the house in the Kirk field for the atrocious murder of that unfortunate nobleman, and was, in the despatch of the earl of Lennox, charged with being an accomplice in that crime. He seems to have changed sides with every party in power. He was concerned in nearly all the stormy intrigues of the times, now fleeing from his country to save his head, and now returning to become an accuser, a prosecutor, and condemner of others.

Died 1583.

BALFOUR, SIR JAMES, Scottish historian and antiquary, knighted, and made Lyon King-at-Arms, 1630; received the baronetcy of Kinnaird 1633. Cromwell removed him from his office. He left a large collection of annals and correspondence, which is preserved in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh.

Born 1600; died 1657.

BALFOUR, JAMES, an advocate of the Scottish bar, who wrote two philosophical dissertations against the speculations of David Hume. These performances exhibited so much candour and good-feeling, that the philosopher whose opinions he had attacked wrote to him sentiments expressive of his esteem, and, at the same time, requested the pleasure of his friendship. In 1754 he became professor of moral philosophy in Edinburgh; and in 1764 was appointed to the chair of public law. His life was a comment on the amiable philosophy which he laboured to teach.

Born 1703; died at Pilrig, 1795.

BALFOUR, ROBERT, a Scotch scholar of reat repute, principal of the Guienne College, at Bordeaux, and author of a very learned and intellectual commentary on Aristotle.

Born 1550.

BALFROOSH, or BALFUROSH, băl'-furosh', a commercial town of Persia, in the province of Mazanderan, 20 miles from Sari. It is of an irregular form, and about a mile and a half in circuit, situated on the river Bhawal, 12 miles south of the Caspian Sea. It is placed in the midst of a forest of tall trees, which are interspersed among the buildings. The houses are much better built than in most Persian towns. There are many colleges, and the town has a great reputation for learning. The inhabitants are chiefly moolahs, or learned men, merchants, and mechanics. There is a good trade in silk and cotton goods, and rice, and imports iron and naphtha. Pop. estimated at about 125,000. Lat. 36° 37′ N. Lon. 52° 42′ E.

BALGOUNIE, BRIG OF, bal-gou'-ne, crosses the river Don in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen.

BALGUY, THOMAS, băl'-gi, an eminent divine, prebend of Salisbury and vicar of Northallerton, and author of a book on the moral perfection of the Deity, "Letters to a Deist," and other theological and controversial works.

Born at Sheffield, 1686; died at Harrowgate, 1748.

BALI, BALLY, or LITTLE JAVA, băl'-i, one of the Sunda islands, separated from Java by the Straits of Bali, a mile and a half wide. Ext. about 75 miles long, by 40 broad. The mountain ranges run from east to west, and have for their culminating point, at the eastern extremity, a volcanic peak, Gunungagung, 12,379 feet high. The island is well watered, and produces cotton, coffee, rice, tobacco, oil, and edible birds-nests. It imports gold, silver, ivory, opium, and betel. The island is divided into eight independent principalities, but the Dutch government, through a commissioner, exercises a supervision. There is a Dutch settlement at Badong. Pop. 1,358,950. Lat. 8° to 9° S. Lon. 115° E.

BALINGEN, ba'-ling-en, a town of Wurtemberg, 36 miles from Stuttgart. Pop. 3,000.

BALIOL, or BALLIOL, SIR JOHN DE, băl'-e-ol, founder of a college called by his name at Oxford, and governor of Carlisle, in 1248. On the marriage of Margaret, daughter of Henry III., to Alexander III., king of Scotland, the guardianship of the royal pair, as well as of the kingdom, was committed to him and Ros of Werke; but in about three years they were charged with abusing their trust, and Henry III. marched towards Scotland to punish them. However, by paying a large sum into the royal treasury, Baliol made his peace. In 1263 he laid the foundation of Baliol College, which was completed by his widow. In the contest between Henry III. and the barons, under Simon de Montfort, he sided with the king; for which the barons seized his lands.

Born at Barnard's Castle, Durham; died 1269.

BALIOL, JOHN DE, son of the above, who, being at the head of the English interest in Scotland, laid claim, on the death of Queen Margaret (known as the Maiden of Norway), to the vacant throne, by virtue of his descent from David, earl of Huntingdon, brother to William the Lion, king of Scotland. His principal competitor for the crown was Robert Bruce, who was also descended from that nobleman, being the son of Isabella, his second daughter, Baliol being the grandson of Margaret, his eldest daughter. Edward I., being appointed arbitrator, declared in favour of Baliol, who did homage to him for the kingdom, November 12, 1292. But he did not hold the sceptre long; for, remonstrating against the power assumed by Edward over Scotland, he was summoned to his tribunal as a vassal. Baliol, provoked at this, concluded a treaty with France, the consequence of which was a war with England. The battle of Dunbar decided the fate of Baliol, who surrendered his crown into the hands of Edward, who sent him and his son to England, where they were committed to the Tower. At the intercession of the pope they were released, and delivered to his legate in 1299, when Baliol retired to his estates in Normandy, where he lived in retirement throughout the remainder of his life. His son Edward afterwards set up a claim to the kingdom of Scotland, invaded and recovered it; but he did not keep it long, and dying afterwards without issue, the family became extinct.

BALIZE. (See BELIZE.)

BALKAN, bal-kan, 'barrier,' a mountain-chain of European Turkey, extending from Cape Emineh, on the Black Sea, which it divides from the river system of the Adriatic, to the twenty-third degree of E. longitude. (See TURKEY IN EUROPE.)

BALKASH, or TENGIZ, bal-kash a lake of Central Asia, on the north-west borders of Eastern Turkestan. Ext. 150 miles long, and 75 broad. It has no known outlet, although it is fed by several streams.

BALKH, balk, an ancient city of Central Asia, formerly of great importance, spoken of by the natives as "the mother of cities," and at one time the rival of Nineveh and Babylon. In the 7th century there were about a hundred Buddhist convents. The place is now nearly a mass of ruins on the right bank of the Ardisiah river to the north of Afghanistan, and subject to the Khan of Bokhara.

BALL, JOHN, ball, a Kentish preacher, who, in 1381, took part in the insurrection of Wat Tyler. To 100,000 of the insurgents on Blackheath he preached a sermon from these lines, which he took for his text:—

> When Adam delved and Eve span,
> Where was then the gentleman?

He, with Jack Straw and 1,500 others, was hanged, July, 2, 1381.

BALL, JOHN, a Puritan divine, curate of Whitmore, Staffordshire. His theological writings were highly esteemed.

Born near Woodstock, 1585; died 1640.

BALLAARAT, or BALLARAT, bal'-la-rat', the leading goldfield town of Victoria, Australia, and now the next city in importance to Melbourne. It is in the county of Grenville, 96 miles W.N.W. of Melbourne, at an elevation of 1,437 feet above the sea, and consists of Ballaarat East and Ballaarat West, the Yarrowee creek dividing them. Each is a distinct municipality, under the government of a mayor and councillors. Ballaarat West has an area of 4½ square miles, and 50 miles of made streets; Ballaarat East, an area of 6½ square miles, and 31 miles of made streets. There are numerous handsome shops and public buildings in the streets, also a theatre and several places of amusement. The banks are located in substantial buildings, and there are, in fact, nearly all the accompaniments of a metropolitan city. The majority of the leading insurance companies have branches or agencies. A railway connects Ballaarat with Melbourne. Two other railways extend from Ballaarat to Ararat, about 56 miles, and the other from Ballaarat to Maryborough, about 45 miles. The public buildings comprise a spacious hospital, an orphan asylum, a benevolent asylum, a lying-in hospital, a public bath, a mechanics' institute, a free public library, a city hall, and a municipal council chamber, two theatres, ten banks, extensive railway premises, three town-halls, and more than forty churches and chapels. The hotels and inns are numbered at about 300. There are numerous iron foundries, breweries, distilleries, flour-mills, a woollen-mill, and other factories. Gold was first discovered at Ballaarat in June, 1851. The extraordinary richness of the ground rapidly attracted a large concourse of diggers and followers, who laid the foundation of a wealthy and prosperous town. As the surface digging became exhausted, it was found that richer deposits of the metal could be attained at lower depths, to which fact is to be attributed the permanence of the progress of Ballaarat. At the present time there are mines as deep as some of the coal-pits of England, worked by extensive steam machinery, with horses employed in them, and likely, for years to come, to yield remunerative results. The alluvial ground is upwards of 11 square miles in extent; the gold-bearing quartz reefs are very numerous; the district around Ballaarat is well suited for farming purposes. The largest piece of natural gold in the world was found near the town, at a depth of 180 feet. It weighed more than 100 lbs. The district is also adapted for sheep-breeding, the finest and highest-priced wool in the world being grown in the immediate neighbourhood. Ballaarat was proclaimed a municipality in December, 1855. Ballaarat West, in September, 1870, was erected into a city, and has now a Church of England bishop and a Roman Catholic bishop. Pop. 38,000, of whom about 3,000 are Chinese. More than 11,000 are engaged in mining operations. A suburb, Sebastopol, has about 4,000 inhabitants.

BALLANCHE, PIERRE SIMON, bal-lanché, French philosophical writer, who aimed at a reconstruction of society, placing revelation above reason, and opposing what was known as the philosophy of freedom and progress. He wrote several poems and prose works, which exhibit unquestionable genius, but are mystical and visionary. In 1841 he was elected to a seat in the Academy.

Born at Lyons, 1776; died 1847.

BALLENSTEDT, bal'-en-stet, a city in the duchy of Anhalt-Bernberg, Germany, 27 miles from Nordhausen, in a picturesque district of the Harz Forest. Manf. Linen. Pop. 4,400.

BALLENTYNE, JOHN. (See BELLENDEN.)

BALLENY ISLANDS, bal'-e-ni, a group of five, in the Antarctic Ocean, discovered in 1839. They are volcanic, and of small size. Lat. 66° 44' S. Lon. 163° 11' E.

BALLESTEROS, DON FRANCISCO, ba-lais-tair'-os, a Spanish commander during the Peninsular war. On the invasion of the French, he, with his regiment and the troops of Castanos and Blake, had frequent sanguinary encounters with the enemy in the south of Spain. The regency of Cadiz afterwards made him lieutenant-general, and gave him the command of the army of Andalusia, where he was opposed to the most famous of Napoleon's marshals, Soult, Mortier, &c.; and when defeated, always adroitly made his escape. On the landing of the British, the chief command of the combined armies was given to the Duke of Wellington. This measure Ballesteros resolutely opposed, and was in consequence banished to Ceuta, but was afterwards permitted to return to the army. When Ferdinand was restored, he was made minister of war, but soon after lost his office, and was sent to Valladolid. In 1820 we find him again commander of the Spanish forces, and compelled to yield to the superior strength of the French, when a convention was signed at Grenada. Subsequently Ferdinand annulled the constitution, and dismissed all the civil and military functionaries, when Ballesteros retired to Paris.

Born at Saragossa, 1770; died at Paris, 1832.

BALLINA, bal'-e-na', a seaport and market-town of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, on the Moy, 6 miles from Killala. This place was formerly called Belleek, signifying "the ford of flags." The river is crossed by two bridges, and on the opposite side is a suburb, Ardnaree, in which is a Roman Catholic cathedral. A convent was erected in 1867. The ruins of a Gothic abbey are near the town. Manf. Coarse linen and snuff. Pop. 6,055.

BALLINAHINCH, bal'-e-na-hinch', a barony in the province of Connaught, Ireland, 37 miles from Galway. Pop. 24,000.—In this barony is the mountain group called the "Twelve Pins." There is a small town of the same name in Ulster.

BALLINAKIL, bal-i-nă-kil', a market town of Ireland, in Queen's county, 14 miles from Carlow. Pop. about 1,200, mostly engaged in woollen-weaving.

BALLINASLOE, bal'-i-nă-slo, a thriving and populous town of Ireland, standing on both sides of the Suck, in the counties of Roscommon and Galway, and 30 miles from Galway. The river is crossed by two bridges, and at one part, where it is divided into several channels, the road to Galway is over several small bridges and causeways. A great wool and cattle fair is held annually. On an average 18,000 head of black cattle and 65,000 sheep are annually disposed of at this fair, which is the largest in Ireland. Pop. 4,619.—A station on the Midland Great Western of Ireland railway.

BALLINROBE, bal-in-robe, a town of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, 15 miles from Castlebar. The town stands on the river Robe, about 3 miles from where it debouches into Lough Mask. There are two annual fairs.—Pop. 2,057.

BALLON, bal-ong', a town of France, 15 miles from Le Mans, on the Orne, in the department of the Sarthe. Pop. upwards of 1,800.—It has the remains of an old castle, which, in the wars between the French and English, in the early part of the 15th century, was of some consequence.

BALLY, bal'-e, a considerable town on the east coast of the island of Lombock, one of the East-India isles. Lat. 8° 31′ S. Lon. 116° 28′ E.

BALLYCASTLE, bal-e-cast'-el, a seaport town of Ireland, county Antrim, situated on a bay opposite Rathlin island. The town consists of two parts, connected by a fine avenue. A pier and harbour were constructed at a great expense, but the violence of the sea and the accumulation of sand have rendered them useless. Near the town are the remains of an abbey. Pop. 1,253.

BALLYCOTTON, an island in St. George's Channel, on the south-west coast of Ireland. Lat. 51° 50′ N. Lon. 7° 59′ W.

BALLYMENA, bal-e-me'na, a town of Ireland, county of Antrim, on the Braid, 33 miles N.N.W. of Belfast, with which it is connected by railway. Manf. Principally linen goods. Pop., including the suburb Harryville, 7,931.—A station on the Ulster and Belfast and Northern Counties railways.

BALLYMONEY, bal-e-mon'-e, a town of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, where there is a monthly market for linens. Pop. 2,578.

BALLYSHANNON, băl-e-shăn'-on, a seaport and market-town of Ireland, county of Donegal, situate on a bay at the mouth of the Erne, which is crossed by a bridge of fourteen arches. The harbour is only accessible to small vessels. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the salmon fishery. Pop. 2,958. Lat. 54° 30′. Lon. 8° 11′. A station on the Irish North-Western Railway.

BALME, COL DE, bam, a pass of the Alps, forming the limit between Savoy and the Valais, and leading from the valley of Trient into that of Chamouni. Height, 7,218 feet above the level of the sea.

BALMEZ, JAIME LUCIEN, bal'-mez, Spanish political writer and philosopher. He was an ecclesiastic, and wrote many works displaying great ability, the best known being "Protestantism compared with Catholicism in their relation to European civilisation," and "Fundamental Philosophy."

Born in Catalonia, 1810; died 1848.

BALMORAL, băl-mo-răl', the Highland residence of her Majesty Queen Victoria, in the parish of Crathie, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 50 miles from Aberdeen, and 175 from Edinburgh. The estate comprises upwards of 10,000 acres; the castle was erected at the private expense of Prince Albert.

BALNAVER, HENRY, băl'-naver, a Scottish Protestant, who, being suspected of complicity in the murder of Cardinal Beaton, in 1546, was sent as a prisoner to France. In 1559 he returned to Scotland, was made one of the lords of session, and a member of the General Assembly. He wrote the "Confession of Faith," of which Knox spoke highly.

Born at Kirkcaldy, 1520; died at Edinburgh, 1579.

BALSHAM, HUGH DE, bal-sham, bishop of Ely, who founded Peter-house, Cambridge. His election to the see of Ely was opposed by king Henry III., and led to an appeal to the Pope, who ultimately confirmed him in the see.

Died at Doddington, 1286.

BALTA, băl-ta, one of the Shetland islands, where, in 1817, experiments were made on the variations of the seconds pendulum. Lat. 60° 44′ 24″ N. Lon. 47′ 42″ W.

BALTA, the chief town of a circle of the same name in the Russian government of Podolia. It is situated on the Kodima, near its junction with the Bug. There are two great annual fairs, and a large trade in cattle, horses, and raw products is carried on. Manf. Soap-boiling, tile-making, and brewing. Many Jews are resident in the town. Pop. 22,440.

BALTARD, LOUIS PIERRE, bal-tar', French architect and engraver of great repute. He executed the plates for Denon's "Egypte," the "Grand Prix de l'Architecture," and other well-known works.

Born at Paris, 1765; died 1846.

BALTHAZAR, CHRISTOPHE, bal-ta'-zar, a learned French writer, who renounced his profession as an advocate, and embraced the Protestant religion. In 1659 the national synod at Loudun settled upon him a pension for his services as the champion of the Reformed Church. He combated Baronius, the librarian of the Vatican, in the time of Clement VIII., with great ability.

Born at Villeneuve-le-Roi, 1588; died at Castres, 1670.

BALTHAZARINI, bal-ta'-za-re'-ne, an Italian musician, who was much admired at the court of Henry III. of France. In 1531 he composed a ballet for the nuptials of the Duc de Joyeuse with Mademoiselle de Vaudemont, sister to the queen. This performance was called "Ceres and her Nymphs," and is supposed to be the origin of the ballet héroïque in France.

BALTIC PORT, bal'-tik, a seaport of European Russia, in Esthonia, 150 miles from Riga.

BALTIC PROVINCES is the name employed to distinguish the Russian governments of Courland, Esthonia, Livonia, and St. Petersburg, with a part of Finland on the Baltic Sea.

BALTIC SEA, the name popularly given to the whole of an inland sea in the north-west of Europe. It begins at the Danish islands of Zealand and Fünen, and is formed by the coasts of Denmark, Germany, Prussia, Russia, and Sweden. The length is 900 miles, from Swinemunde in the S. to Tornea in the N., with a varying breadth of from 40 to 200. The northern portion, beyond the Aland Islands, is known as the Gulf of Bothnia; and the Gulf of Finland and the Gulf of Riga are large inlets on the eastern side. The principal rivers flowing into it are the Neva, the South Dwina, the Niemen, the Vistula, the Oder, and various streams rising in the mountain ranges of Sweden and Norway. (See RUSSIA, PRUSSIA, SWEDEN, and NORWAY.) The Gulfs of Bothnia and Finland are generally frozen over in the winter months; and in the Baltic proper (the southern half of the entire sea) the harbours and bays are usually blocked with ice from December to April. As no sea has a greater influx of fresh water, it contains comparatively little salt; whilst the great quantities of sand and mud carried into it by the rivers have considerably raised its bottom, and gradually lessened its depth. It is frozen for about three months every year, so as to prevent navigation altogether. There are three passages from the Cattegat into the Baltic: the Sound, the Great Belt, and the Little Belt: of these the most frequented is the Sound. Area, including the Gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, about 186,000 square miles; the basin of drainage being estimated at 717,000 square miles.

BALTIMORE, bal'-ti-more, a decayed town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, situate on a headland projecting into the sea, with a good harbour, 13 miles from Bantry. Pop. 200. In the beginning of the 17th century the Algerine pirates plundered the town, and carried away 200 prisoners to their country.

BALTIMORE, a county of the United States, in Maryland, on the west side of Chesapeake Bay, N. of Patapsco river. Area, 700 square miles. In a commercial point of view, this county ranks fifth in the Union. Pro. Wheat, oats, Indian corn, butter, beef, and pork. Minerals. Iron, copper, granite, gneiss, hornblende, and limestone. Manf. Woollens and cottons, iron and brass articles, earthenware, and chemicals. Pop. 83,336. In this county the Baltimore and Ohio, Baltimore and Susquehanna, and the Philadelphia and Baltimore railways terminate.

BALTIMORE, a city and port of entry of the United States, in the above county, Maryland. It stands on the north side of Patapsco river, around a bay which forms a good harbour, 14 miles from its entrance into Chesapeake Bay, on slightly undulating ground, extending nearly five miles from E. to W. and more than four from N. to S., and covering an area of 10,000 acres. A small stream named Jones's Falls, crossed by several bridges, divides the city into two nearly equal parts—the eastern, known as Fell's Point, in which shipbuilding and the chief manufactures are carried on; the northern and western portions form the old town, the extreme south-western part of which, Spring Garden, is the poorest and most wretched part of Baltimore. The part of the old town east of this district is the residence of the opulent trading classes and the centre of trade. The streets are regularly laid out, and there are many fine public buildings, the most splendid being the new city hall, completed in 1875, standing nearly in the centre of the city. White Maryland marble has been extensively used in the construction, and the height to the summit of the dome is 227 feet. The Peabody Institute, endowed by the late George Peabody, is another very fine building, containing a public library, gallery of art, and concert hall, and having a dome 115 feet high. The custom house, St. Mary's and Baltimore colleges, hospital, prison and penitentiary, opera house, and three theatres, are among the other public buildings. There are about 200 churches, and 122 public schools. Baltimore has been named the "monumental city," from the fine public monuments which adorn it; the most noticeable being that erected to the memory of Washington, 200 feet high, and standing on an eminence of 150 feet. A statue of Washington, 13 feet high, is on the summit. The "Battle monument," was erected by public subscription in 1815, to the memory of those who had fallen in defence of the city when threatened by the English, under Colonel Brooke, in 1814. It is 52 feet high, surmounted by the figure of a female. There are several parks and public squares, and on the north and north-west two large cemeteries. The city is supplied with water from three immense reservoirs, the largest of which is named Lake Roland, eight miles to the north. Manf. The chief are woollen and cotton, iron and copper, sugar, petroleum, agricultural implements, saddlery, cabinet-making; but almost every branch of industry is carried on. Shipbuilding, tanning, distilling, brick-making, and the packing of oysters in air-tight cans, may be specially named. The city is one of the greatest flour-markets in the United States, and the export trade in tobacco is considerable. About 850 vessels are registered as belonging to the port. There are three large railway stations, by which communication is afforded with almost every part of the States. Pop. 332,313, rapidly increasing. Lat. 39° 17′ N. Lon. 76° 36′ W.

BALTIMORE, LORD. (See MARYLAND.)

BALTINGLASS, bâl-tin-glass, a town of Ireland, county of Wicklow, on the Slaney, 29 miles from Dublin. Area, 5,273 acres. Manf. Linen and woollen cloths. Pop. 1,572.

BALTSCHIK, or BALDJIK, balt'-jik, a town of European Turkey, 18 miles from Varna. In its neighbourhood are the ruins of Tomi, to which the poet Ovid was banished.

BALUCHISTAN. (See BELOOCHISTAN.)

BALUE, JEAN, ba'-loo, a Frenchman, the son of poor parents, who, by his servility and art, obtained the see of Angers, after he had procured the deposition of his patron and benefactor, the bishop of that diocese. By his intrigues, he induced Paul II. to give him a cardinal's hat. He engaged in a secret correspondence with the dukes of Burgundy and Berri, disclosing all the secrets of the state, which, being discovered by Louis XI., he was imprisoned eleven years in an iron cage, which he himself, it is said, had invented. On regaining his liberty, he went to Rome, and, working on the weakness of the Pope, was sent to France as legate by Sixtus IV., and received the bishopric of Albano.

Born in Poitou, 1421; died at Ancona, 1491.

BALUZE, ETIENNE, ba-looze', French scholar, for several years librarian to the French statesman, Colbert. In 1670 he was appointed to the chair of canon law in the royal college. In 1710 he was arrested on a lettre de cachet, and suffered three years' imprisonment. His writings on French law and antiquities are of great value.

Born at Tulle, 1630; died 1718.

BALZAC, bal'-zak, a village and parish of France, 3 miles from Angoulême, in the department of Charente. Pop. 1,000.

BALZAC, HONORE DE, a French novelist, who, on quitting school, was placed with a notary in Paris, and commenced his literary career by writing for the journals. Under the name of Horace de St. Aubin, between the years 1821 and 1827, he published many tales; but they attracted little attention. The first work which brought him prominently into notice was his "Peau de Chagrin," after which he continued to supply the public appetite for his productions with indefatigable industry. For twenty years he laboured at a series of compositions, which, under the title of "Comédie Humaine," were to embrace every phase of human society; some of these were very successful. He described himself as "the secretary of society, who drew up the inventory of vices and virtues." His writings display amazing power, but many of his characters are most repulsive, although perhaps correct studies from actual life. Owing to his irregular habits and extravagance, the greater part of his life was passed amid pecuniary difficulties, but shortly before his death he married a rich Russian lady.

Born at Tours, 1799; died at Paris, 1858.

BALZAC, JEAN LOUIS GUEZ DE, a noble French writer, to whom Cardinal Richelieu granted a pension, and gave the places of counsellor of state and historiographer royal. He gained great popularity by his "Letters," which were first published in 1624. At the close of life, Balzac, who had indulged in all the elegancies of a dissipated court, became very devout, had apartments fitted up for him in a convent, and bestowed considerable sums on the poor. Besides his "Letters," he wrote—"Le Prince;" "Le Socrate Chrétien;" "L'Aristippe;" "Entretiens;" and "Christ Victorieux."

Born at Angoulême, 1594; died at Paris, 1654.

BAMBA, bam'-ba, a province of the kingdom of Congo, south of the river Ambriz, extending upwards of 200 miles into the interior. It is considered one of the richest districts in Congo, having mines of silver, lead, iron, copper, and salt. Lat. 7° 2′ S. Lon. 13° 52′ E.

BAMBARA, bam-bar'-a, an ancient city in the province of Sinde, in Hindostan, now in ruins. Lat. 24° 46′ N. Lon. 67° 50′ E.

BAMBARRA, bam-bar'-ra, a country of Central Africa, bounded on the N. by Ludamar and Beroo, on the W. by Kaarta and Manding, on the E. by Timbuctoo and Baedoo, and on the S. by Kong and Mamana. The country is in general fertile, and is traversed by the Niger (here called the Joliba), which, from west to east, is navigable by canoes through the whole of its extent. The butter and cotton trees, the baobob, tamarind, date, and oil-palm, are indigenous; and maize, millet, rice, and cassava yield two crops a year. The inhabitants have made considerable progress in agricultural arts as well as in those of civil life. Manf. Leather, iron and gold ornaments, and various kinds of dyed fabrics. A considerable trade is carried on from Timbuctoo to Guinea. Exp. Iron, grain, ivory, slaves, and cloths. Imp. Arms, hardwares, cotton goods, and salt. Pop. estimated at 2,000,000, chiefly pagans. Lat. between 12° and 15° 22′ N. Lon. between 15° E. and 5° 20′ W.

BAMBERG, bam'-bairg, a city of Bavaria, in the circle of Upper Franconia, is situate on the Regnitz, which enters into the Maine a little below the town, which is partially surrounded by walls, and is well built. It contains a very fine cathedral, in the Byzantine style of architecture, in which is the tomb of the emperor Henry II. and his empress Cunegunde, the palace and town house, besides various churches and monasteries; but perhaps the most interesting of the public institutions is the university, originally founded in 1147. The principal charitable establishments are Ludwig's hospital (formerly a Benedictine convent), the lazaretto, the house of correction, and the workhouse. Manf. Principally cloth, porcelain, jewellery, tobacco, wax, starch, musical instruments, and marble wares. Large quantities of liquorice and garden seeds are raised in the neighbourhood, and the beer of Bamberg is so much in favour as to require upwards of 60 breweries to meet the demand for it. Pop. 26,000. It is connected by railway with Nurnberg. Lat. 49° 36′ N. Lon. 10° 35′ E. The town was formerly the capital of an independent bishopric, which was secularized and assigned to Bavaria in the early part of the present century.

BAMBOCCIO, bam-boch'-e-o, an eminent painter, whose real name was Peter Van Laer; but he is better known by the nickname of Bamboccio, on account of his deformity. He lived at Rome several years, and improved himself by a close application to his profession. He painted inns, farriers' shops, and cattle, with great effect. His style is soft, and his touch delicate, with great transparency of colouring.

Born at Laeren, in Holland, 1613; died 1673.

BAMBOROUGH, or BAMBROUGH, bam'-bur-o, a village and parish in the county of Northumberland, 16 miles from Berwick. It stands on the sea-coast, and has a castle close to the shore, which, according to ancient historians, was built in 548, by Ina, king of the Northumbrians. This fortress is now converted to the charitable purpose of giving shelter to shipwrecked seamen. The place was a royal borough previous to the Norman Conquest, and at one time returned two members to Parliament. It is now an insignificant village. Grace Darling is buried in the churchyard.

BAMBOUK, bam-book, a country of Central Africa, lying between the Senegal and Gambia, and inclosed by the upper courses of the rivers Falerne and Senegal. It is supposed to be about 100 miles from north to south, and 80 from east to west. The country is mountainous, but on the whole well watered and fertile. Maize, millet, cotton, and immense water-melons are produced. It abounds with leguminous plants, and the lower lands, which are exposed to the inundations of the rivers, yield large crops of rice of the finest quality. The climate is perhaps the most unhealthy on the face of the globe, rendering the country nearly uninhabitable by Europeans. Minerals. Gold in abundance, which is given to the Moors in exchange for salt. Pop. Unascertained. The inhabitants are a fierce Mandingo race, and are backward in the arts of civilization. In the 15th century this country was occupied by the Portuguese. Lat. between 12° 30′ and 14° N. Lon. from 10° to 12° 30′.

BAMBRIDGE, CHRISTOPHER, bām'-bridj, archbishop of York, a native of Westmoreland, who was sent by Henry VIII. as an ambassador to Pope Julius II., who gave him a cardinal's hat. He was poisoned by his servant, in revenge for some blows which he had inflicted upon him.
Died at Rome, 1514.

BAMIAN, or BAUMEEAN, ba'-me-an', a valley and pass of Afghanistan, about a mile broad, and bounded on each side by perpendicular rocks. The elevation of the pass is 8,496 feet. Lat. 34° 17′ N. Lon. 68° 8′ E.—There is a town of the same name, which may be considered to occupy the whole extent of the valley, in which there are many relics of antiquity, in the shape of colossal idols, about 150 feet in height, and vast caves cut out of the face of the rock. These caves are so numerous as to extend in a continuous series for eight miles, and two of the idols are upwards of 130 feet in height. Besides these extraordinary remains of a past age and people, the valley is strewed with the ruins of the city of Ghulghuleh, which was destroyed, about the year 1221, by Zinghis Khan.

BAMMAKOO, bam'-a-koo, a town of Bambarra, in Africa, on the Niger, here called the Joliba. Lat. 12° 50′ N. Lon. 5° 48′ W.

BAMPFIELD, or BAMPFYLDE, FRANCIS, bām'-feeld, a nonconformist divine, who, in 1641, obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and was also minister of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, but was deprived of both situations at the Restoration, for nonconformity. He was imprisoned in Newgate, for holding conventicles. He wrote a book in vindication of the observation of the seventh-day sabbath, and another called the "House of Wisdom." The object of this book was to make the Hebrew "the universal language over all the inhabited earth, to be taught in all schools, and children to be taught it as their mother tongue." All books, too, that were in the world were to be translated into that language; and the only philosophy that was to be tolerated was to proceed from Scripture. The Utopian character of such notions will, we apprehend, in the reader's estimation, scarcely coincide with the title of his book—as containing much "wisdom."
Died 1684.

BAMPOORA, bam-poor'-a, a town in Hindostan, in Rajpootana, about 50 miles from Kotah. Pop. estimated at 20,000.

BAMPTON, or BATHAMPTON, bămp'-ton, a market-town of Devonshire, 22 miles N. of Exeter. St. Michael's church was erected in the 14th century. Manf. Serge and pottery. There are extensive limestone quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 1,200.—Station on the Great Western Railway.

BAMPTON, REV. JOHN, the founder of the celebrated series of lectures at Oxford which bear his name. He was educated at Trinity College, and bequeathed to the university, upon trust, his lands and estates, for the endowment of eight divinity-lecture sermons, to be delivered annually. These lectures began in 1780, and have been continued to the present time, some of the most eminent divines of the Church of England having been selected to deliver them.
Born 1689; died 1751.

BANAGANPILLY, ba'-na-gan-pil'-e, a village of Hindostan, in the Balaghaut ceded territories, 70 miles from Cuddapah. It is celebrated for its diamond-mines. Lat. 14° 28′ N. Lon. 79° E.

BANAGHAR, bān'-a-ghar, a town of Ireland, in King's county, on the Shannon, 15 miles from Athlone. Pop. 1,846.—The Grand Canal locks down into the Shannon near this place.

BANALBUFAR, ba'-nal-boo'-far, a town in the island of Majorca, 14 miles from Palmas. Pop. 5,000. In its neighbourhood are marble-quarries.

BANANA ISLANDS, ban-an'-a, a group of small and fertile islands off the coast of Africa, about 30 miles from Sierra Leone. The largest is only about 4 miles long. Lat. 8° 8′ N. Lon. 13° 11′ W.

BANAT, ba'-nat, a district of S. Hungary, lying between Transylvania and Wallachia on the E., and the Theiss on the W., and consisting of the three counties of Thorontal, Temeswar, and Krasso. Area, about 7,600 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the E. and swampy in the W. Rivers. The Temes, Alt-bega, and the Karusch. Pro. Maize, wheat, other grains, and cotton. Silkworms are reared, and the cattle and horses are in high estimation. Minerals. Iron, copper, tin, lead, coal, and some gold. It is one of the military frontiers of Austria, formed in 1807 to repel the incursions of the Turks, and as a cordon against the plague. Pop. 1,500,000.

BANAWARAM, ba'-na-war-am, a town of Hindostan, in Mysore, 76 miles from Seringapatam. Lat. 13° 24′ N. Lon. 76° 13′ E.—This place is situate in a fine open country, by the side of a large tank, which, when visited by the traveller Buchanan, was dry.

BANBRIDGE, ban'-bridj, a town of Ireland county Down, 7 miles from Dromore. It stands on the river Bann, and is a neat, thriving place, being the centre of the linen trade of the county. There are extensive cloth and thread factories, bleach-fields and chemical works. Pop. 8,640.—A station on the Northern of Ireland railway.

BANBURY, ban'-bur-e, a market-town and borough of Oxfordshire, standing near the Charwell, 23 miles N. of Oxford. A portion of the Parliamentary borough is in Northamptonshire. The are a modern church and a town hall, erected in 1854. Manf. Plush, girths, and webbing. It is noted for its cheese, ale, and cakes; has markets for agricultural produce, and a considerable carrying trade by the Oxford and Birmingham Canal. Pop. of the town, 4,122; of the borough, 3,600. Station on the London and North-Western and Great Western Railways. Here the battle of Edgecott, or Banbury, was fought, in 1469, between the royalists and the rebels, who were encouraged to rise against the authority of Edward IV. by the earl of Warwick.

BANCA, BANKA, or BANGKA, ban-ka, one of the islands of the Indian Archipelago belonging to Holland, and lying between Borneo and Sumatra. It is hilly, but none of its elevations are above 2,000 feet. The climate is unhealthy, especially along the coast, where are numerous swamps, which render fever so prevalent, that the Dutch soldier conceives the being ordered to Banca as the preliminary step to his immediate death. The climate not being favourable to cultivation, agriculture is not followed to a great extent; among the vegetable products may be named dragon's blood, benzoin, nutmegs, sago, cassia, and sassafras. The capital is Muntak, which has about 3,000 inhabitants. Minerals. Tin is the great mineral of this island; the first deposits of it were discovered by chance in 1710, and the yield has reached, in one year, over 4,000 tons, of a quality nearly equal to that of Britain. The other minerals are iron, lead, copper, silver, and arsenic, rock-crystal, amethyst, and in the west part there are beds of lignite. Pop. 71,399, chiefly Malays and Chinese, the latter being the only laborious race on the island. Lat. between 1° 30′ and 3° 7′ S. Lon. between 105° 9′ and 106° 54′ E. Banca was ceded to Holland for Cochin in 1814, and is one of the most valuable of the Dutch possessions in the East.

BANCA, STRAITS OF, separate the above island from Sumatra, and are from 8 to 20 miles in width.

BANCALLAN, ban'-kal-an, a large and populous town near the western extremity of the island Madura, in the Malay Archipelago, 20 miles from Surabaya. Lat. 7° 2′ S. Lon. 112° 43′ E. Here the sultan of the island has a palace, in which he resides, and the Dutch have a residency.

BANCAPOOR, ban'-ka-poor, a large town and district of Hindostan, in the presidency of Bombay, 38 miles from Dharwar.

BANCE ISLAND, bănce, a small fortified island at the mouth of the Sierra Leone river, West Africa.

BANCOORAH. (See BURDWAN.)

BANCOOT, or FORT VICTORIA, ban-coot, a fortified town of Hindostan, on the coast of Concan. It has a small trade in salt. Lat. 17° 56′ N. Lon. 72° 55′ E.

BANCROFT, GEORGE, băn'-kroft, American historian, son of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft, D.D., author of a "Life of Washington." He was educated at Harvard College, and afterwards at Göttingen, and Berlin. He obtained the degree of doctor when 20 years of age. His first publication was a volume of poems, in his 23rd year; and shortly afterwards he produced a translation of Heeren's "Reflections on the Politics of Ancient Greece." In 1838 he was made collector of the port of Boston, and in 1845 was appointed secretary of the navy of the United States. In the following year he was dispatched as minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, where he resided till 1849, and where he was much esteemed and respected. On his return to his native country, he adopted New York as the place of his residence, and entered eagerly into literary pursuits. He published some of his orations, and contributed articles to the North American and Boston Quarterly Reviews; but it is by his "History of the United States" that he is most widely and likely to be most permanently known. From 1867 to 1871 he was minister plenipotentiary at Berlin. As an historian, his position ranks with Prescott and the best American writers.

Born in Worcester, Massachussetts, 1800.

BANCROFT, RICHARD, archbishop of Canterbury. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1575 was presented to the rectory of Teversham, in Cambridgeshire. In 1584 he became rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and, having four years afterwards distinguished himself by preaching at St. Paul's Cross a violent sermon against the Puritans, was promoted to various dignities, and in 1597 was made bishop of London. He bore a principal part in the famous conference at Hampton-court, about the beginning of the reign of King James I.; and, on the death of Archbishop Whitgift, was translated to Canterbury, where he exerted himself with great vigilance in behalf of the Anglican church. He deprived forty-nine ministers of their livings for not obeying him in matters of uniformity, and procured the consecration of Scotch bishops. Fuller says that, when Bancroft was out of passion, "he spake most politely;" but his severity was very great against the Puritans. He was the principal supervisor of the authorised translation of the Bible.

Born at Farnworth, Lancashire, 1544; died, 1610.

BANCROFT, JOHN, a nephew of the above, was in 1609 elected master of University College, Oxford, where he continued above twenty years. He was at great pains and expense to recover the ancient lands belonging to that foundation. In 1632 he was made bishop of Oxford, for which see he built the palace of Cuddesden.

Died 1641.

BANDA, ban'-da, a district of British India, in the Allahabad division. The soil is very fertile, yielding large crops of cereals, hemp, sugar, and indigo, and the famous Banda cotton. Less than half of the district is under cultivation; the principal river is the Tamna, which has several tributaries. The climate is excessively hot in summer and cold in winter.

Area, 3,030 square miles.
Minerals.—Iron and building stone.
Pop. 698,000, mostly Hindoos, but there are about 40,000 Mahometans.
Chief Towns.—Banda (28,000), Girwan (6,700).
History.—The district was formerly a part of the possessions of the Rajah of Kalinjar; in 1735 it was bequeathed to the Mahratta Peishwa, and in 1803 was transferred by treaty to the East India Company.

BANDA ISLANDS, a group of islands in the Moluca Archipelago, belonging to the Dutch. They are twelve in number, but only six of them are inhabited. Banda Lantoir, which derives its name from the lontar palm, is the largest of the group, but its extreme unhealthiness has prevented it from being made the seat of government, which is at Banda Neira. To the north of Neira is the island Gunong Api (fire mountain), so named from the conical volcano, 2,320 feet high. There have been many disastrous eruptions and earthquakes. Pulo Nay, a coral rock, is esteemed the healthiest of the islands. There are gold-mines in Rosyngain, which was formerly a convict station. Pulo Pisang, or Banana Island, is famous for fine fruit. There is a good harbour between Lantor and Neira.

Pro.—Nutmegs, of which about 500,000 lbs. are annually produced. About 150,000 lbs. of mace are also produced, and these form the principal articles of export.
Area, 7,150 square miles.
Pop. 111,000, including a large number of Malay and Chinese labourers.
History.—The islands were discovered in 1512 by Antonio Abreu, a Portuguese, and settled by his countrymen in 1524; but they were driven out in 1599 by the Dutch. These islands, which had been taken by the British, were restored at the peace of Amiens in 1802, but were again captured in 1810, and once more restored at the general peace of 1814.

BANDA ORIENTAL, South America. (See URUGUAY.)

BANDARRA, GONZALES, ban-dar'-ra, a Portuguese poet, whose verses aspired to be prophetic of the fate of Portugal. He fell under the suspicion of the Inquisition, and figured in an auto-da-fé in 1541, narrowly escaping being burnt as a heretic. Although he could neither read nor write, his songs were in the mouths of all; and there appear to have been both talent and spirit in them.

Died 1556.

BANDEL, ERNEST VON, ban'-del, a German sculptor, son of a Prussian government official. He studied at Nuremberg, Munich, and Rome. In 1819 he first conceived the idea of a colossal national memorial of Herrmann (see HERRMANN), and never abandoned the idea, exciting an intense enthusiasm throughout Germany. Societies were formed in the principal towns, and a large amount of money raised. Bandel selected a site, at an elevation of 1,200 feet above the sea, on the Grotenburg mountains, in the Teutoburger forest. The erection of the monument was begun in 1838, but, owing partly to political events, not completed until 1875, when it was publicly inaugurated, and the Emperor of Germany conferred on the sculptor the Order of the Crown of the Third Class.

Born at Ansbach, 1800; died, Donauwerth, 1876.

BANDELLO, MATTEO, ban-dail'-o, an Italian Dominican monk, who wrote some lively but exceedingly gross novels to some extent, after the manner of Boccaccio, and a vast number of Italian verses on different subjects. Shakspeare, Massinger, and Beaumont and Fletcher were indebted to his tales for incidents in their plots. On the invasion by the Spaniards of the Milanese territory, in 1525, he went to France, where he obtained the bishopric of Agen, but resigned it in 1555.

Born at Castelnuovo, 1480; died 1562.

BANDETTINI, TERESA, ban-dat-tee'-ne, Italian improvisatrice, who began her career on the stage, but afterwards acquired great fame as a poetess, and was chosen member of several learned academies.

Born at Lucca, 1756; died 1813.

BANDIERA, ATTILIO and EMILIO, ban-dee-air'-a, two brothers, descended from a noble Venetian family, and lieutenants in the Austrian navy. They attached themselves to the Italian republican party, and corresponded with Mazzini. In 1844, they landed with twenty companions in Calabria, hoping to excite an insurrection in Naples. A companion had given information to the Neapolitan government, and they were attacked by an overwhelming force, and the two brothers were shot in the public square of Cosenza. Their fate excited great interest in England, as their letters to Mazzini had been opened in the English post-office.

Died 1844.

BANDINELLI, BARTOLOMEO, or BACCIO, ban'-de-nel'-e, a distinguished Florentine sculptor and painter, greatly patronized by Cosmo de Medici, Francis I., and other eminent personages. His works do not place him in the first rank of Italian sculptors, but he is among the foremost in the second. Among his best performances is his "Hercules and Cacus," which was executed with a view to rival the "David" of Michael Angelo, but which does not nearly approach the excellence of that composition. Many of the works of this artist are to be seen in the churches and palaces of Florence. He was made a cavalier by Clement VII., and also by Charles V.

Born 1487; died 1559.

BANDINI, ANGELO MARIA, ban-dee'-ne, Italian author, educated by the Jesuits, and having taken orders, devoted himself to the study of antiquities, especially the Roman monuments. In 1756, he was appointed librarian to the Laurentian library at Florence, which office he held for 44 years. At his death he bequeathed his fortune for the furtherance of education and charitable works. He wrote several works of an antiquarian character, and a life of Amerijo Vespucci.

Born at Florence, 1726; died 1800.

BANDON, ban'-don, a river of Ireland, in the county of Cork, which rises in the Carbery mountains, and after a course of 40 miles falls into the sea at Kinsale, of which it forms the harbour, and the river is mentioned by Spenser as

"The pleasant Bandon, crowned by many a wood."

BANDON, or BANDONBRIDGE, a town and Parliamentary borough of Ireland, 13 miles from Cork, and standing on the river Bandon. The houses are built of stone, and there are several good streets and public buildings. The river, on both sides of which the town is built, is crossed by a bridge of six arches. Manf. Leather, whiskey, beer, flour; dyeing, particularly blue colours. Pop. 6,131.

BANEZA, LA, ban-ai'-za, a Spanish town in the province of Leon. Manf. Coarse cloths, hats, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 2,300.

BANFF, banf, a handsome seaport town and royal borough of Scotland, and capital of Banffshire. It is beautifully situate at the mouth of the Deveron, over which is a fine bridge of seven arches; and its harbour is protected by a castle. The chief buildings are the castle, a modern edifice, on the site of an ancient building; and masonic lodge. There are numerous places of worship, and a large hospital endowed by the late Mr. Alexander Chalmers, a wealthy merchant of the town; on the opposite side of the river is Macduff, where a great shipping trade is carried on; a town-house which has an elegant spire, and an academy.

Manuf.—Thread, linen, stockings, soap, and tanning; and it has a small trade with Russia, Sweden, and Holland.

Pop.—4,900.

Lat. 54° 40′ 18″ N.; Lon. 2° 31′ 30″ W.

History.—Banff was constituted a royal borough by a charter of Robert II. dated 1372; which was afterwards confirmed by James VI. and Charles II. In 1645 it was plundered by the marquis of Montrose. In 1613 James Sharp, the celebrated Archbishop of St. Andrews, who was murdered on Magus Moor, was born in the castle; and, in 1700, James Macpherson, the notorious Highland outlaw immortalized by Burns, was here executed.

BANFFSHIRE, a maritime shire of Scotland, bounded N. by the Murray Frith, S. and E. by the county of Aberdeen, and W. by the counties of Elgin and Inverness. This shire contains some of the highest mountains in Scotland; among which is Cairngorm, noted for its beautiful topazes, and attaining an elevation of 4,060 feet; Corryhabble, Knockhill, and Cabrach, which respectively are 2,558, 2,500, and 2,377 feet above the level of the sea. The north side of Benmacdui is also in this county. The valleys are fertile, and there is a level strip of country along the coast which is pretty well cultivated. Cattle-rearing, however, is the chief branch of rural industry.

Rivers. The Spey, Avon, and Deveron.

Minerals.—Marble, limestone, granite, marl, slate, topazes, and rock crystal.

Manuf.—Inconsiderable; yarns, linen cloths, and woollens. The salmon and herring fisheries are productive; and distilling is largely carried on at Glenlivet and other places.

Area—686 square miles.

Pop.—62,731.

BANGALORE, bän-ga'-lor, a fortified town of Hindostan, in Mysore, formerly the capital of a kingdom, 70 miles from Seringapatam. Its houses are generally two stories high, constructed of red earth and roofed with tiles. In its neighbourhood the vine and the cypress flourish luxuriantly, and strawberries are raised in the gardens. The town is the residence of the Chief Commissioner of Mysore, and is the political and military capital of the province. There is a large military cantonment. There are many fine public buildings, broad streets, and large gardens. Pop. 155,857. Lat. 12° 58′ N. Lon. 77° 38′ E. In 1791 this town was stormed and taken by the British under Lord Cornwallis.

BANGKOK, ban'-kok, a large city, and the capital of the kingdom of Siam, standing on both banks of the Menam, 20 miles above where it falls into the Gulf of Siam. It comprises three divisions: the town itself, the floating town, and the royal palace. This arrangement is necessary, on account of the annual inundations to which the city is exposed. Some of the streets are traversed by canals, and many of the houses are built on piles. The palace is built on an island from two to three miles in length, separated from the land by a narrow arm of the river. It is enclosed by high walls, and includes many separate buildings. The floating town is composed of movable bamboo rafts, each of which contains a row of eight or ten houses. The city is adorned with many Buddhist temples most superbly decorated, conspicuous by their tall spires and the gilding with which they are ornamented. The nucleus of that on the eastern bank of the river is strongly fortified, but the suburbs extend in an irregular manner for about seven miles on each side of the river. There are many European houses of business, and gas is used in the principal houses. Exp. Pepper, sugar, lac, ivory, aromatic woods, tin, cotton, rice, hides, salt fish, and edible nests. Imp. Tea, porcelain, silk and silk goods, nankeen, pepper, fruit, mercury, and Chinese manufactured goods. Indian printed goods and British cottons, woollens, machinery, and glassware. Manf. Tin utensils, ironwares, and leather, prepared in large quantities for exportation. Pop. 400,000, the half of whom are Chinese. Lat. 13° 38′ N. Lon. 100° 34′ E.

BANGOR, ban'-gor, "white choir," a city, port, parliamentary borough, and bishop's see of Wales, in the county of Carnarvon, beautifully situated near the northern entrance of the Menai Straits. It consists chiefly of one crooked street, about a mile long, and two or three smaller ones diverging from it, but there is a handsome new suburb. The cathedral is a cruciform structure, completed in 1532, on the site of older edifices, the first of which was founded early in the 6th century. There are an episcopal palace, several places of worship connected with various denominations, assembly-rooms, and other public buildings. The principal trade of the town consists in the export of slates, the quarries of which are six miles away from the town. Port Penrhyn, the port of Bangor, is a little way to the east. Pop. 8,240.

BANGOR, a seaport and market town of Ireland, in the county of Down, on the south side of Belfast Lough. It consists of one principal street, with several smaller ones diverging from it. It is greatly frequented as a bathing-place. Manf. Cotton, linen, and embroidered muslin. Pop. 2,560, the males chiefly employed in fishing, and the females in hand-sewing. Lat. 54° 40′ N. Lon. 5° 35′ W.

BANGOR, a seaport, capital of the county of Penobscot, State of Maine, United States. It is on the Penobscot river, and its junction with the Kenduskeag, 60 miles from the sea. There are good schools, a public library, and a theological seminary. The harbour affords safe anchorage for the largest vessels. The chief article of trade is timber; and there are saw-mills and ship-yards. Pop. 16,856. Lat. 44° 48′ N. Lon. 68° 47′ W.

BANIAK ISLANDS, ba'-ne-ak, a group in the Indian Ocean, lying off the N. coast of Sumatra. Lat. 2° 20′ N. Lon. 96° 40′ E.

BANIALUKA, ban'-e-a-loo'-ka, a fortress and town of European Turkey, in Bosnia, on the river Verbas. It has a great many mosques, several colleges, baths, and bazaars, and a gunpowder factory. There are silver mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. about 8,000.

BANIER, ANTOINE, ba'-ne-ai, a French writer, who wrote an historical explanation of the fables of antiquity, which was afterwards published under the title of "Mythology; or, the Fables explained by History." He had a hand in Picart's "Religious Ceremonies," and other esteemed works. An English translation of his "Mythology" was printed in 1741, in 4 vols. 8vo.

Born in Auvergne, 1673; died at Paris, 1741.

BANIM, JOHN, ba'-nim, an Irish author of great original power. He at first adopted the profession of an artist, and taught drawing at Kilkenny. A disappointment in love caused him to remove to Dublin, where he settled down to literature. He was the author of several very powerful novels, and, in conjunction with his brother Michael, of the famous "Tales of the O'Hara Family," "The Croppy," "The Smuggler," and "Father Connell" are amongst his best works. He suffered greatly in health and from poverty; but a subscription set on foot by the English press, headed by the Times, and a Government pension, enabled him to end his days in comparative comfort in a cottage near Kilkenny.

Born at Kilkenny, 1798; died, 1842.

BANJARMASSIN, ban'-jar-mās-in, from banjar, "water," and masin, "salt," an extensive district of country lying on the S.E. part of the island of Borneo, about 350 miles long and 270 broad. It is generally flat, though intersected by a range of lofty mountains running from N. to S. Where cultivation exists, the soil is extremely fertile, throwing up a luxuriant vegetation of great beauty and variety. The Banjar and its tributary the Nagara, water the best portion; and several large streams plentifully irrigate the east. There are large forests in the interior, and rice fields on the swampy coast.

Pro.—Cotton, rice, wax, benzoin, pepper, dragon's-blood, and rattans.

Minerals.—Gold, iron, coal; and some large and fine diamonds are found.

Manuf.—Swords, guns, pistols, and other arms. These are finished in the most elaborate style of workmanship, the decorations consisting of gold, silver, and copper.

Pop.—Variously estimated at from 300,000 to 600,000, mostly Dyaks.

History.—The Dutch exercised a protectorate over the Sultanate from 1787 until 1860, when they incorporated the whole territory, dividing at the residency of Kiween and the sub-residencies of Amuntel and Martapura.

BANJARMASSIN, the capital of the above territory, situate at about 15 miles from the mouth of the Banjar, where it debouches into the Sea of Java. On account of the inundations of the river, the houses are built on piles of wood, at an elevation of three feet above the ground, and communicate with each other by means of planks. Many of the houses are built upon rafts, with their fronts turned towards the river, and exposing goods for sale; whilst on market-days the water forms the "great highway," on which all the necessaries of life are purchased at these floating marts. There are coal-mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 30,000, of a very mixed character, including many Chinese.

Lat. 3° 23′ S. Lon. 114° 37′ E. The East India Company established a factory here in 1700, but in consequence of the unhealthiness of the climate, and the hostility of the natives, it was abandoned. In 1811 the English captured the town, but restored it in 1817.

BANJOEMAS, ban-jo'-e-mas, a town and district of Java, situate nearly in the centre of the island. This country is one of the most fertile of the island, producing rice, sugar, coffee, and indigo, in abundance. Pop. of district, 316,063; of town, 9,000. Lat. of town, 7° 33′ S. Lon. 109° 20′ E.

BANJOEWANGI, ban-jo'-e-wan-gi, a town in the province of Bezoeki, on the E. coast of Java. It has a fort, and only one stone house, which is the residence of the governor. In its neighbourhood are several volcanoes, Idjeng, the loftiest, being, 10,170 feet high.

BANKES, SIR JOHN, banks, an English judge, who, in 1639, was made attorney-general to the prince of Wales, and in 1640 chief justice of the Common Pleas. He displayed his loyalty and courage at the beginning of the civil war; and his lady defended Corfe Castle, the family seat, against the parliament forces, till it was relieved by the earl of Caernarvon. Sir John continued with the king at Oxford, and died there in 1644.

Born at Keswick, 1589; died 1644.

BANKS' ISLANDS, a group in the S. Pacific Ocean, named after the celebrated botanist, Sir Joseph Banks. Lat. 13° 53′ S. Lon. 168° 45′ E. There are various other islands, capes, and peninsulas of the same name in different parts of the world.

BANKS JOHN, an English play-writer, originally a lawyer; but, getting weary of the courts of Themis, he quitted them, and became a follower of Thespis. He produced several pieces which were once popular, particularly the "Unhappy Favourite; or, the Earl of Essex." When he died is uncertain; his remains were deposited in the church of St. James, Westminster.

Born 1700.

BANKS, SIR JOSEPH, a distinguished naturalist, who, in 1760, entered a gentleman commoner at Christ Church, Oxford, and through his exertions a lecture on natural science was established. In 1764 he came into possession of his paternal fortune, and in 1766 was chosen a member of the Royal Society. In the same year he made a voyage to Newfoundland for the purpose of collecting plants, and in the following winter returned by way of Lisbon. He then made the acquaintance of Dr. Solander, a Swedish gentleman who had been a pupil of Linnæus, and who had recently been appointed assistant librarian to the British Museum. In 1768, he and Dr. Solander, as naturalists to the expedition, accompanied Captain Cook on a voyage to the South Seas, the ostensible object being to observe the transit of the planet Venus over the disc of the sun. He remained four months on the island of Otaheite (Tahiti), and after being absent nearly three years, returned to England with a large collection of specimens illustrative of natural history. He afterwards made a voyage to Iceland with his friend Dr. Solander, during which they examined the Hebrides, and were the first to describe the columnar stratification of the rocks surrounding the caves of Staffa, an account of which was published in the same year, 1772, by Mr. Pennant, in his "Tour in Scotland." A large addition to his various botanical collections was the result of this voyage. In 1778 he was elected president of the Royal Society, an office which he held till the time of his death. In 1781 he was made a baronet; in 1795 he received the order of the Bath, and in 1797 he was admitted to the Privy Council. He bequeathed his books and botanical collections to the British Museum.

Born in London, 1743; died 1820.

BANKS, THOMAS, one of the best sculptors of Great Britain. He was apprenticed to a landscape gardener and architect, but, preferring sculpture, competed, among many rivals, for the gold prize offered by the Royal Academy in 1770, and carried it away. His designs at this period were principally illustrative of classical history, and they discovered so much fertility of invention that the members of the Royal Academy determined to send him to Rome at the expense of that institution. Accordingly, in 1772 he set out for the "eternal city," where he placed himself under Capizoldi, a distinguished professor. He was, however, though much admired, little encouraged; and, after spending seven years in Rome, he returned to England, only to meet with disappointment. He was now in his 49th year, and setting out for Russia, he received from the Empress Catharine an acknowledgment of his merits. She purchased a subject of his, called "Psyche with the Butterfly," and placed it in a temple expressly built for it in her gardens. He soon again visited his native country, when his "Mourning Achilles," now in the hall of the British Institution, fixed him prominently and permanently in the eye of the public. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and kept in constant employment throughout the remainder of his days.

Born at Lambeth, 1735; died 1805.

BANKS LAND, an island in the Arctic Ocean, 70 miles S.W. of Melville Island. Lat. 74° N. Lon. 116° W.

BANKURA, ban'-ku-ra', a district of British India, in the Burdwan division. It lies between the delta of the Ganges on the E. and the highlands of Chota and Nagpoor on the W. In the eastern part the country is flat and alluvial, with swamps and rice-lands; farther north and west it is more elevated and undulating, with jungles and forests. The rivers are mountain torrents, only partially navigable, and that in the wet season.

Area.—1,346 square miles.
Prod.—Rice, barley, cotton, and indigo.
Minerals.—Coal, lime, and building stone.
Manuf.—Coloured silks of fine quality.
Chief Towns.—BANKURA and BISHNUPUR.
Pop.—1,041,752

BANKURA, the chief town of the above district, on an elevation on the left bank of the Dhalkisor. Pop. 16,800. Lat. 23° 14′ N. Lon. 87° 6′ E.

BANN, ban, the name of a river in Ireland rising in the Mourne Mountains, County Down, and, under the name of the Upper Bann, falling into Lough Neagh. The Lower Bann, emerging from the lough, flows between the counties of Antrim and Londonderry, and falls into the Atlantic four miles S.W. of Portsuth. The salmon and eel fisheries are of great value. The length of the Upper Bann is 35 miles, and of the Lower 30 miles.

BANNALEC, ban'-a-lek, a town of France, in Brittany, 15 miles from Quimper. Pop. 4,160.

BANNATYNE, GEORGE, ban'-a-tine, the compiler of the celebrated MS. entitled "Corpus Poeticum Scotorum," or, body of Scotch poetry, now in the Advocates' library in Edinburgh. It was upon his name that the "Bannatyne Club" was founded in 1823, by Sir Walter Scott, over the meetings of which he presided from its nativity till 1831. Originally this association consisted only of 31 members; but as it rose in fame, many persons of rank and literary distinction were desirous of being connected with it; and, in 1828, the number was increased to 100.

Born 1543; died 1607.

BANNIER, or BANNER, JOHN, ban'-i-er, a Swedish general, who served with great distinction under Gustavus Adolphus; on whose death he became commander-in-chief, and obtained several victories and took many important places. Afterwards his good fortune failed, and the imperialists succeeded in driving him into Bohemia.

Born 1595; died 1641.

BANNOCKBURN, ban'-ok-burn, "Bannock brook," a village of Stirlingshire, on the Bannock, three miles S. of Stirling. Woollen stuffs (especally tartans), carpets, and nails are made. Pop. 2,258. It is memorable for a decisive battle fought near it, June 25, 1314, between the English, under Edward II., and the Scots, under Robert Bruce; wherein the former were totally defeated, and Scotland was thereby completely emancipated from the English yoke. Not far from it, at a place called Sauchieburn, James III. of Scotland was defeated by his rebellious subjects in 1488.

BANOLAS, ban-o'-las, a town of Spain, province of Catalonia, 10 miles N.W. of Gerona. Manf. Cotton, paper, and oil; cattle breeding is carried on. There are three annual fairs. Pop. 4,600.

BANSWARRA, ban-swa'-ra, a town in Hindostan, capital of a native state of the same name, 110 miles N.E. of Baroda. The town is surrounded by ramparts; and the palace of the chief and several Hindoo temples are handsome structures.

BANTAM, or BATAN, ban'-tam, a decayed town at the north-western extremity of the island of Java, formerly the capital of a district of the same name. It was formerly a large and flourishing town, and a great seat of commerce. It is now a deserted and ruinous place, and the harbour is so choked up as to be almost inaccessible. It is situated in a swamp, and the climate is most unhealthy. The Dutch had a settlement there, but removed in 1816 to a more healthy position, and a large fire in the following year hastened the destruction of the town, the name of which is now chiefly remembered in connexion with the small fowls introduced into this country. Lat. 6° 4′ S. Lon. 106° 3′ E.

BANTRY, băn'-tre, a seaport of Ireand, on the east coast of a bay of that name, county of Cork, with a small harbour. Pop. 2,440. Lat. 51° 39′ N. Lon. 9° 24′ W.

BANTRY BAY, a spacious bay on the south-west coast of Ireland, in the county of York, 25 miles long, by 5 or 6 broad. It affords a good harbour, and there are two islands, Bear and Whiddy. In 1796, a French fleet anchored in this bay.

BANU, ban-u', a district of British India, in the Punjab. It is divided into two portions by the Indus, which frequently overflows; the soil is fertile. Area, 3,148 square miles. Pop. 332,577, of whom about nine-tenths are Mahometans.

BANYA, ban'-ya, two towns of Hungary, with populations of above 5,000 each, and celebrated for their productive mines in gold, silver, and lead.

BANYULS-SUR-MER and BANYULS-DES-ASPRES, ban'-yool, two towns and parishes of France, in the department Pyrénées-Orientales. Pop. of the first, 2,562; of the second, 472.—Near the first are four ancient towers, one of which indicates the limits between France and Spain; and the second is memorable for the defence which its inhabitants made in 1793, when they compelled 7,000 Spaniards, who had attacked them, to surrender.

BANYUWANGY, or BANJOUVANGY, ban'-yoo-wan'-gy, a seaport town on the east coast of Java, belonging to the Dutch. It is the capital of a district of the same name. Pop. of district, 45,000.

BAPAUME, ba'-pome, a strong town of France, in the department of the Pas-de-Calais. Manf. Laces, fine thread, woollens, cambrics, and cottons. Pop. 3,265.

BAPTISTE, JOHN BAPTIST MONNOYER, bap'-teest, a distinguished French painter in the department of fruits and flowers. He adorned the palaces of Versailles, Meudon, Marley, and Trianon. He visited England at the invitation of Lord Montague, and for nearly twenty years lived in this country, enjoying uninterrupted patronage from the great.

Born at Lisle, 1635; died 1699.

BAR, a town of Russian Poland, in the government of Podolia, situated on the Rov, an affluent of the Bug. There are eleven annual fairs, but the trade of the town is not great. Pop. 8,000.

BARA, bă'-ra, one of the Hebrides, to the S. of South Uist. Ext. 12 miles in length, and about 3 to 6 in breadth. Lat. 56° 55′ N. Lon. 7° 30′ W.

BARA BANKI, ba'-ra-ban'-ki', a district of British India, in Oude. It consists chiefly of a level plain with numerous marshes. The principal rivers are the Gogra and the Goomtee. Area, 1,735 square miles. Pop. 1,026,788 about two-thirds being Hindoos.

BARABA STEPPE, bar'-a-ba, step, N.W. of Omsk, in Asiatic Russia, about 400 miles in length and 300 in breadth, containing a few salt lakes, but in general of a good black soil, with forests of birch. It was colonized in 1767 by Russia, and there is no part of Siberia in which travelling is so rapid by means of horses as here.

BARACH, bai-răk, fourth judge of the Hebrews, after delivering them from bondage to Jabin, king of Canaan, and defeating Sisera. He ruled 33 years, and flourished about 1240 B.C.

BARACOA, or BARAZOA, ba-ra-ko'-a, a seaport on the N.E. of Cuba. Lat. 20° 22′ N. Lon. 74° 30′ W. In the vicinity of this town is a remarkable table-mountain, bearing the singular name of the "Anvil of Baracoa."

BARADÆUS, also called ZANZALUS JACOBUS, bă'-ră-dē'-us, a monk who revived the sect of the Monophysites, who maintained that there is but one nature in Christ. His party made him bishop of Edessa. He died in 588, and from him the sect took the name of Jacobites.

BARAGUAY, D'HILLIERS, ACHILLE, bar'-a-gai deel'-yairs, a French general, who, in his eighteenth year, lost his left hand at the battle of Leipsic. Under Louis Philippe, he served in Algiers; in 1849, under Louis Napoleon, was sent on a temporary mission to the Pope. In 1854, during the war with Russia, he commanded a force of 10,000 men sent to the Baltic to co-operate with the allied French and English fleets in their attack on Bomarsund. In 1871 he was made president of the court of inquiry appointed to investigate the conduct of the French generals who surrendered fortified places during the Franco-German war.

Born in Paris, 1795.

BARAHAT, bar-a-hat', a town of north Hindustan, in the native state of Garhwal, situated on the Himalayas. It was almost destroyed by an earthquake in 1803. Lat. 30° 43′ N. Lon. 78° 29′ E.

BARAK, ba'-rak, the principal river of Cachar, in further India. Length 350 miles. It unites with the Brahmaputra, 43 miles from Dacca.

BARAK, bar'-răk, "lightning," a judge and deliverer of Israel, counselled by the prophetess Deborah.

BARANTE, AMABLE GUILLAUME PROSPER, Baron de Brugière, ba-rant', French statesman and historian. He served in several offices in the time of Napoleon I., whose fall did not affect his fortunes otherwise than successfully. He became, under Louis XVIII., counsellor of state, and secretary of the ministry of the Interior. In 1819 he was created a peer of France. After the revolution of July, 1830, he resided at the court of Sardinia, in the capacity of Ambassador, and, in 1835, occupied a similar position at the court of Russia. After the revolution of 1848 he retired from public life, residing in Auvergne. He devoted much of his time and talents to literature. His most important work is his "History of the Dukes of Burgundy," which has placed him amongst the first of the French historians of the day. He wrote besides a "History of the National Convention," in six volumes, and other valuable historical and literary works, and translated Schiller and Shakespeare's Hamlet.

Born at Riom, 1782; died at Auvergne, 1866.

BARANYA, ba-ran'-ya, a province of Hungary, on the Danube. It is mountainous in some parts, and swampy in others; but, where cultivation is carried on, the produce is great. Pro. Wheat, wine, fruit, flax, asparagus, and tobacco. Great numbers of sheep and pigs are reared. Area, 1,960 square miles. Pop. 284,000.

BARANZANO, JEAN ANTOINE, bar-an-za'-no, surnamed Redemption, philosopher and mathematician, who corresponded on philosophical subjects with Lord Bacon, and wrote several learned treatises. He was a Barnabite monk, and professor of philosophy and mathematics at Annecy.

Born in Piedmont, 1590; died at Montargis, 1622.

BARATARIA, bă'-ră-tair'-e-a, an island of Louisiana, in the United States, at the entrance of a bay of the same name in the Gulf of Mexico. Lat. 29° N. Lon. 90° W.

BARATIER, or BARRETTIER, JOHN PHILIP, ba-ra'-te-er, an extraordinary German youth, who, at five years of age, understood Greek, Latin, Dutch, and French. He afterwards studied Hebrew; and at nine years of age was able to translate any part of the Scripture into Latin, and made a dictionary of the most difficult Hebrew and Chaldaic words. In 1731 he was entered in the university of Altdorf, and the same year wrote a letter to M. le Maitre on a new edition of the Bible, Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Rabbinical, which is inserted in the "Bibliothèque Germanique." In his eleventh year he published the "Travels of Benjamin of Tudela," translated from the Hebrew into French. In 1734 the margrave of Anspach gave him a pension of 50 florins a year and the use of his library. The year following he submitted a plan for finding the longitude to the Royal Society, which, however, proved to be an old exploded scheme. He was the same year admitted a member of the Academy at Berlin, and created M.A. by the university at Halle. Besides the above, he wrote critical dissertations upon points of ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the Socinians, called Ante-Artemonius;" had collected materials for a history of the Thirty Years' War, and a work on Egyptian Antiquities. It is scarcely to be wondered at that he died young. At the time of his death he wanted four months of being twenty years of age.

Born near Nuremberg, 1721; died 1740.

BARATYNSKI, JERVGENIJ ABRAMAVITCH, bara-tin'-ski, Russian poet. He served for eight years in the army, but got into disgrace for some youthful frolics. He then settled at Moscow, and devoted himself to poetry. His health was very bad, and he went, for the sake of a milder climate to Italy, where he died. His chief poem is "The Gipsy," which ranks as one of the best specimens of Russian literature.

Born 1792; died at Naples, 1844.

BARBACENA, FEHABERTO-CALDEIRA-BRUNT, marquis of, bar'-ba-sai-na, a Brazilian statesman and soldier, who served with distinction in the Portuguese navy and army. He was chosen by Don Pedro, the prince-regent (afterwards emperor), to negotiate with Portugal, the mother-country, the independence of Brazil; and by the mediation of England and Austria, a treaty was signed at Rio Janeiro, on August 27, 1823, which secured the separation of the two crowns of Portugal and Brazil. He was afterwards employed to accompany the young queen of Portugal to Europe, and subsequently became finance minister of Brazil; and, by his talents, contributed greatly to the prosperity of his country. He was the first to introduce from Europe the steam-engine and steamboat.

Born at Sabora, 1772; died at Rio Janeiro, 1842.

BARBACENA, bar'-ba-sai'-na, a town of Brazil, in the province of Minas Geraes, 125 miles N.W. of Rio Janeiro. It is situated 3,500 feet above the sea. The trade is principally in gold-dust, cotton, and coffee. Pop. of town and district, 14,000. Lat. 21° 22′ S. Lon. 45° W.

BARBACOA, bar'-ba-ko'-a, an island in the Atlantic Ocean, within the Gulf of Darien.

BARBACOAS, a city of Quito, in the province of Esmeraldas, on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, 120 miles from Quito. Lat. 1° 42′ S. Lon. 78° 8′ W. 2. A town of South America, in the province of Venezuela, at the source of the Tucuyo: 3. A village in the same province, E. of Lake Maracaibo.

BARBADILLO, ALFONSO HIERONIMO DE SALIS, bar-ab-deel'-yo, a Spanish writer, who, besides several comedies, wrote the "Adventures of Don Diego de Noche," and numerous poets.

Born at Madrid; died 1630.

BARBADOES, bar-bai'-doze, one of the Caribbees, and the most eastern of the British West-India Islands of the Windward group, in the Atlantic Ocean. It is a little larger than the Isle of Wight, and most of it is under cultivation. The houses of the planters are very numerous all along the country; and these, with the luxuriant productions of the soil, and the gently swelling hills, form a delightful scene. The island is low along the shore, except on the E.; but as it is generally free from marshy ground, it enjoys a more salubrious climate than many of the other islands to which it belongs. It has no mountains of any great elevation, the loftiest being Mount Hillaby, which is only 1,104 feet above the level of the sea. The island is almost encircled by coral reef. It is the residence of the governor-general of all the British Windward Islands, and is frequently visited by sudden calamities, arising from the fury of the elements.

Pro. Sugar, cotton, arrow-root, aloes, and ginger.
Towns. BRIDGETOWN, the capital, Speights Town, Oistins, and St. James.
Pop. 170,000, of whom only 17,000 are whites.
Lat. 13° 4′ N. Lon. 59° 37′ W.
History.—It was settled in the year 1624–5, by the English, who laid the foundation of James Town, and was the first English colony in which the sugar cane was planted. In 1627, the island was made over by patent to the earl of Carlisle, who afterwards conveyed his rights to Lord Willoughby. After the Restoration, the legislation of the island was vested in the crown.

BARBARA, SAINT, a female Christian martyr, who embraced Christianity, and was delivered up by her own father, who, after she had been tortured, himself beheaded her, and was immediately struck by lightning. Among the Catholics she is considered the patron saint of artillery, as her image is supposed to be a protection against explosions.
Lived in the 3rd century.

BARBARINO, bar-ba-ree'-no, FRANCESCO DA, Italian poet, one of the founders of Italian literature. He was a doctor of laws, and his writings have a philosophical character. He died of the plague.
Born at Barberino, Tuscany, 1264; died at Florence, 1384.

BARBARO, FRANCIS, bar'-ba-ro, a learned Venetian, who was governor of several places, but distinguished chiefly on account of his oratorical powers and literary works, particularly his translations of some of Plutarch's Lives. He wrote "De Re Uxoria," "On the Choice of a Wife, and the Duties of Women," printed at Paris in 1515, and which were afterwards translated into various languages. Besides these, a collection of his letters was printed in 1743.
Born 1398; died 1454.

BARBARO, ERMOLAO, grandson of the above, gave lectures on the Greek language gratuitously. The emperor Frederick, to whom he went ambassador, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and Pope Innocent VIII. made him patriarch of Aquileia, for accepting which dignity the Venetians expelled him their republic. He then went to Rome, where he resided during the remaining years of his life. He translated the Rhetoric of Aristotle, and other works; and published critical elucidations of Pliny.
Born 1434; died 1495.

BARBAROSSA, HORUK, or ARUCH, bar'-ba-ros'-sa, "red-beard," a famous pirate, who, from being the son of a Turkish soldier, rose by his skill, cunning, and bravery, to lay the foundation of the Turkish dominion in Algiers. After having, in conjunction with his brother, acquired immense wealth by piracy, he was called in to assist the Algerines against the Spaniards, when he took possession of the throne, and had himself proclaimed Horush, sultan of Algiers. He next defeated the king of Tunis, and having taken the capital, caused himself to be proclaimed king. After this he marched to Tlemsen, the inhabitants of which put to death their own monarch, and opened their gates to Horuk. The heir to the kingdom of Tlemsen, however, applied for assistance to the marquis of Gomares, governor of Oran, who besieged Barbarossa in the citadel, and reduced him to the greatest distress. He escaped thence by a subterraneous passage, but was overtaken, with a small number of Turks, on the banks of the river Maileh, where he fell with his followers, after making a desperate defence.
Born at Mitylene, about 1474; slain, 1518.

BARBAROSSA, KAIR-ED-DEEN, or HAYRADDIN, "one good in the faith," succeeded his brother in the kingdom of Algiers, and, in 1533, became commander of the naval forces of Selim II., emperor of the Turks. He made himself master of Tunis, but was driven from it by Charles V. in 1536. After this he ravaged several parts of Italy, and reduced Yemen, in Arabia Felix, to the Turkish government.
Died at Constantinople, in 1546.

BARBAROSSA, the Emperor. (See FREDERICK I.)

BARBAROUX, CHARLES, bar'-ba-roo, a member of the French National Assembly, and the enemy of Robespierre and Marat, against whom he repeatedly brought charges. It was he who proposed the trial of Louis XVI. and family. When the Girondists were overthrown, he was arrested, but made his escape. He was afterwards taken, however, and guillotined at Bordeaux. Before entering the political arena, he had devoted himself to the study of scientific subjects, and was a correspondent of Benjamin Franklin, and wrote an interesting sketch on the extinct volcanoes near Toulon.
Born at Marseilles, 1767; died 1794.

BARBARY, bar'-bă-re, a general name given to the northern portion of Africa, comprising BARCA, TRIPOLI, TUNIS, ALGIERIA, and MOROCCO. The name of this country is supposed to have been derived from the word Berbers, the name given to its ancient inhabitants by the Arabs, and some of whose descendants are still to be found amongst the valleys and mountains of the Atlas. (See AFRICA.)

BARBASTE, bar-bast', a town of France, in the department Lot-et-Garonne, on the Geslise, which is crossed by a Gothic bridge of seven arches. Manf. Cotton, vinegar, and cork. Pop. 1,700.

BARBASTRO, bar-bas'-tro, a fortified city of Spain, province of Huesca, on the river Nero. There are an interesting cathedral, several churches and hospitals. Tanning and leather-dressing are chiefly carried on. Pop. 6,000.

BARBATELLI, BERNANDINO, bar'-ba-tel'-e, surnamed POCCETTI, an Italian painter, who, at Rome, studied with so much assiduity as frequently to forget the refreshments of food and sleep. He excelled in painting historical subjects, fruit, animals, and flowers.
Born 1542; died in 1612.

BARBAULD, ANNA LETITIA, bar'-bawld, daughter of the Rev. John Aikin, an authoress of considerable celebrity, and, in her "Essays on Romance," the best imitator of the style of Dr. Johnson. She edited selections from the "Spectator," "Tatler," "Guardian," and "Freeholder;" and also a series of the "British Novelists," published in 50 vols. She also wrote several poetical effusions, and, to some extent, assisted her brother, Dr. John Aikin, in producing his "Evenings at Home." She married, in 1774, the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, a Presbyterian minister, who left her a widow in 1808. (See AIKIN.)
Born at Kibworth-Harcourt, in Leicestershire, 1743; died at Stoke Newington, 1825.

BARBERINI, ANTONIO, bar-be-re'-ne, a Roman cardinal, one of three nephews of Pope Urban VIII., who attained great influence at the court of Rome, their appropriation of dignities and estates leading to a war between the Pope and the dukes of Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, in which Cardinal Barberini commanded the papal troops, and exhibited considerable military ability. On the accession of Pope Innocent X., the Barberini took refuge in France, where Antonio was made archbishop of Rheims and great almoner of France. In 1652 the family were readmitted to Papal favour, and their descendants have ever since ranked among the first of the Roman nobility.

Born at Rome, 1608; died at Rheims, 1671.

BARBERINO DI MUGELLO, bar-be-re'-no de moo-gail'-o, a town of Italy, standing on the Siere, 16 miles N. of Florence. Manf. Principally straw hats. Pop. 9,000.—In the neighbourhood of this town is the royal villa called Caffegiolo, the ancient residence of the Medicis.

BARBERINO DI VAL D'ELSA, de val dail-sa, a village, 14 miles from Florence, whence the Barberini family, to which Pope Urban VIII. and several cardinals belonged, derive their name.

BARBES, ARMAND, bar'-bai, a French revolutionist, whose first attempt against the then existing government of Louis Philippe was in 1834, when he was arrested. Again, in 1835, he was included in those who were suspected of being privy to Fieschi's plot, and was liberated only again to be brought before the authorities, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment for secretly manufacturing gunpowder. Again, in 1839, he was concerned in an overt act of rebellion, and was condemned to death, but was, at the last moment, pardoned by the king. The revolution of February, 1848, set him free, the 12th regiment made him their colonel, and the department of the Aude returned him as a member of the Constituent Assembly. But with Barbès, to conspire was to live; and he was found guilty of an attempt, on the 15th May, 1848, to overturn the republican government, and was condemned to imprisonment for life in the prison of Belleisle-en-Mer.

Born in the island of Guadaloupe, 1810.

BARBEYRAC, JEAN, bar'-bai-rak, an eminent French professor of law and history at Lausanne, and afterwards of public law at Gröningen. He was the son of a physician of Montpellier, and after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, removed into Switzerland. He translated into French Puffendorf's "Law of Nature and Nations," his treatise on the "Duties of Man," and Grotius's book of the "Rights of War and Peace," with learned notes of his own. He also wrote a treatise on the "Morality of the Fathers," and another on "Gaming," the argument of which is to establish the proposition that games of chance of any kind are not, in themselves, unlawful. Besides these, he produced other essays upon historical and juridical subjects, among them treatises by Grotius and Puffendorf.

Born at Beziers, 1674; died 1744.

BARBEZIEUX, bar-bez-e-u(r), a town in the department of Charente, 45 miles from Bordeaux, celebrated for its truffled capons. Manf. Coarse hempen cloth, and there are some tanneries. Pop. 3,574.

BARBIER, ANTOINE ALEXANDRE, French bibliographer, at first a priest, but afterwards renounced orders and married. He was librarian to the Emperor Napoleon, and published numerous bibliographical works, which are highly valued.

Born at Coulommiers, 1769; died at Paris, 1825.

BARBIERI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, bar'-be-air'-e, surnamed GUERCINO, an eminent historical painter, who studied under Caracci, but followed the manner of Caravaggio. He painted more than a hundred large altar pieces for churches, besides a great number of other pictures.

Born at Cento, near Bologna, 1590; died 1666.

BARBIERI, PAOLO ANTONIO, brother of the above, famous as a painter of still life and animals.

Born at Cento, 1596; died 1640.

BARBOUR, JOHN, bar-boor, a Scotch divine, who became archdeacon of Aberdeen, and one of the earliest and best of Scottish poets and historians. King David Bruce made him his chaplain, and sent him on several embassies. He wrote in verse "The Life and Actions of King Robert Bruce," "The Brute," founded on the adventures of the legendary Brute, grandson of Æneas, and supposed first king of Britain, and a "Book of Legends of Saints." Warton, in his "History of English Poetry," speaking of Barbour and Henry the minstrel, says, "I cannot pass over two Scotch poets of this period" (the middle of the 14th century), "who have adorned the English language by a strain of versification, expression, and poetical imagery far superior to their age, and who, consequently, deserve to be mentioned in a general review of the progress of our national poetry." Although a Scotchman, Barbour figures as a student among the eminent names that adorn the scroll of Oxford.—The metrical chronicle of "The Bruce" embraces the period between 1306 and 1329.

Born about 1316; died 1396.

BARBOUR, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In the state of Alabama. Area, 825 square miles. Desc. Hilly, but fertile, and producing cotton, corn and sugar. It is drained by the river Pea. Pop. 33979. 2. In West Virginia. Area, 330 square miles. Desc. Hilly, and well adapted for pasture. Pro. The usual cerealia. Minerals. Abundant, especially coal, iron and stone. Pop. 11,870. Many of the inhabitants of these counties were formerly slaves.

BARBUD, bar'-bud, a Persian musician in the service of Kosru Parviz. His name was adopted to express the master of music in all succeeding times. The Persians also gave the name of Barbud to a sort of lyre.

BARBUDA, or BARBUTHOS, bar-boo'-da, one of the Caribbean or West-India islands, belonging to the Leeward group, in the Atlantic Ocean, 10 miles long and 8 broad. It is low, level, well covered with woods, and generally fertile, and the climate is very salubrious. Pro. Cotton, corn, pepper, and tobacco; but no sugar. Pop. 2,000, mostly negroes. Lat. 17° 33′ N. Lon. 61° 43′ W.

BARBY, bar'-be, a walled town of Prussian Saxony, situate on the Elbe, 14 miles S.E. of Magdeburg. Manf. Linen and cotton goods. There are soapworks and distilleries. Pop. 5,300.

BARCA, bar'-ka, a maritime district of northern Africa, between Tripoli and Egypt. It is about 500 miles from N. to S., with a breadth of about 400 from E. to W. Formerly this country was believed to be nothing more than a barren desert inhabited only by wandering Arabs; but it is now found to contain much excellent pasturage, more especially in the N. and E. The vegetable productions are the palm, the pine, the date, the olive, and the fig. There are, properly speaking, no rivers, but only streams, which are quite dry in the hot season, and generally are lost in the sands of the Libyan desert. The chief town is BENGAZI.

Area, 60,700 square miles. Pop. estimated about 1,000,000. Lat. between 30° and 33° N. Lon. between 20° and 25° E.—This country was the seat of the ancient five Greek cities, Arsinoe, Barca, Berenice, Apollonia, and Cyrene; all of which have passed into decay save Berenice, the modern Benguza.

BARCELONA, bar'-se-lo'-na, a city and seaport of Spain, formerly the capital of Catalonia, and now the chief town of the province of Barcelona. It was formerly fortified, but the ramparts were demolished in 1845, and the ground which was covered by the citadel was laid out as a horticultural garden. There are an old and a new town, the former consisting of narrow and crooked streets, and with old flat-roofed houses. The new town and extensive suburbs are regularly laid out, and the architecture of the houses is in the modern style. To the south-east, on the eastern side of the port, is a neat suburb, Barceloneta. The principal street of the old town is the Rambla, a fine promenade, with plane-trees, and containing the chief hotels and pleasure resorts of the city. There are several large plazas, or squares. The cathedral, begun in the 13th century, but never completed, is a large building in the Pointed style, and remarkable for its noble glass windows. There are several other ancient and very interesting churches, and about 18 convents. The royal palace was destroyed by fire in December, 1875. The civic and commercial buildings are very handsome. The university, first founded in 1430, occupies a spacious building. There are 14 theatres. There are also academies for jurisprudence, practical medicine, natural philosophy, history, the fine arts, and several libraries, one of which is rich in MSS. of Catalonia and Aragon. The harbour was constructed in the 17th century, but until recently was obstructed by a sandbank. New works have been constructed, which now make it safe and commodious. A large shipping trade is carried on.

Manf. Leather, lace, silks, woollens, cottons, and jewellery.
Exp. Iron, copper, cork, silks, soap, paper, ribbons, laces, hats, shell-fruit, oil, salt, and brandies.
Imp. Timber, hides, horns, wax, stock-fish, hemp, sugar, coffee, cocoa, and other colonial goods.
Pop. including the suburbs, 252,000.
Lat. 41° 22′ N. Lon. 2° 9′ E.
History. Barcelona is said to have been founded by the Carthaginians under Hamilcar Barca, and hence its name. It was besieged during the War of the Succession by the duke of Berwick, to whom it surrendered in 1714, after an obstinate defence. In 1843 it was bombarded by order of the regent Espartero.

BARCELONA, NEW, a town and port of Venezuela, South America, in the province of Cumana, on the river Neveri, at about two miles distance from the sea. It is neither handsomely nor agreeably constructed, and the great number of hogs which are fed in the city contributes also to engender filth and disease. Its chief exports are horses and cattle. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 10° 10′ S. Lon. 64° 47′ W.

BARCELONETTE, bar-cel'-o-net, a pretty little town in France, department Basses-Alpes on the Italian frontier. Manf. Silks, serges, and small articles of drapery. Pop. 1,900.

BARCELLOS, a town of Portugal, province of Minho, on the right bank of the Cavado, which is crossed by a good stone bridge, 27 miles N. of Oporto. It stands in a well-cultivated district, and has important fairs. It is supposed to have been founded by the Carthaginian Hamilcar, 250 B.C. Pop. 3,900.

BARCHA, or BARCA, bar'-ka, the surname of a noble Carthaginian family, from which Hannibal and Hamilcar were descended. By means of their bribes and influence, they created a great faction, which is known in the annals of Carthage by the name of the Barchinian faction, and at last raised themselves to power, and to the independent disposal of all the offices of trust or emolument in the state.

BARCLAY, ALEXANDER, bar'-klai, a writer, who, according to some, was a native of Scotland, but who others maintain was an Englishman. However this may be, we find that he travelled through most parts of Europe, and on his return became a Benedictine monk at Ely, and afterwards a Franciscan at Canterbury; but on the dissolution of the monasteries he obtained a living in Somersetshire, and afterwards in Essex. Barclay was one of the first refiners of our language by his productions. He rendered into English that curious book entitled "Navis Stultifera; or, the Ship of Fools," and to which he added much original matter. This book was first printed by Pynson in 1509, a copy of which edition is very rare, and is worth about £100. Barclay also wrote some eclogues, which Warton says were the first that appeared in the English language, and were like Petrarch's and the Mantuan's; that is, of the moral and satirical kind, and containing few touches of rural description or bucolic imagery.

Born about 1476; died 1552.

BARCLAY, JOHN, a distinguished scholar and writer, who was educated in France, and on the death of his father came to London, where he lived ten years. He wrote several ingenious works, the chief of which are, "Satyricon," a satirical poem, and a romance entitled "Argenis." This last has been translated into several languages, and is an evidence of the fleeting nature of literary popularity. "It absolutely distresses me," says Coleridge, "when I reflect that this work, admired as it has been by great men of all ages, and lately by the poet Cowper, should be only not unknown to the general reader." It was of this Barclay that the learned Grotius said,

"A Scot by blood, and French by birth, this man
At Rome speaks Latin as no Roman can."

Born at Pont-à-Mousson, 1582; died at Rome, 1621.

BARCLAY, JOHN, M.D., an eminent anatomist, who first studied divinity at the College of St. Andrews, but turned his attention to medicine, and took the M.D. degree in 1796. He was for many years lecturer on anatomy at Edinburgh, and achieved a great reputation as a lecturer and author.

Born in Perthshire, 1760; died at Edinburgh, 1826.

BARCLAY, JOHN, Scotch theologian, and founder of a small sect known as the Bereans. His opinions caused him to leave the Scotch church, of which he was a minister.

Born in Perthshire, 1734; died at Edinburgh, 1798.

BARCLAY, ROBERT, a Scotchman, who at an early age was sent to Paris, to be under the care of his uncle, who was principal of the Scots college. He there exhibited a tendency to adopt the Romish religion, on which his father sent for him home, and having himself become a convert to the opinions of the Quakers, he persuaded his son to do the same. In 1670 he published a defence of his new religion, at Aberdeen; and in 1675 printed a catechetical discourse, or system of faith, according to the opinions of his sect. But his greatest work is, "An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the people called, in scorn, Quakers," printed in Latin, at Amsterdam, in 1676, and translated into English in 1678. He not only benefited his party by his writings, but travelled through various countries, particularly Germany and Holland, to obtain converts. He spent the latter part of his life on his paternal estate of Ury, in Kincardineshire, Scotland.

Born at Gordonstown, Morayshire, 1648; died 1690.

BARCLAY, WILLIAM, a writer on civil law. His early days were spent at the court of Mary Queen of Scots. In 1573 he went to France, and became professor of civil law in the university of Pont-à-Mousson, and afterwards at Angers. He was the father of John Barclay, author of "Satyricon." (See above.)

Born in Aberdeenshire, 1541; died at Angers, 1605.

BARCLAY DE TOLLY, MICHAEL, a Russian general, descendant of an old Scotch family, who, in the German and Polish campaigns of 1806-7, was made a field-marshal. He subsequently became commander-in-chief, headed the Russians at the battle of Leipsic, and in 1815 led them into France. Besides his military commands, he at one period held the post of minister of war, and had the title of prince conferred on him.

Born in Livonia, 1759; died at Insterburg, Prussia, 1818.

BARCOCHEBAS, or BARCOCHAB, bar'-ko-ke'-bäs, "the son of a star," a famous impostor among the Jews, who pretended to be the star predicted by Balaam. He gained many followers, who overran Judæa, putting numbers of Romans to the sword. He was at last defeated and slain by Julius Severus, who, by way of revenge, committed a dreadful massacre on the Jewish nation A.D. 135.

BARD, bard, a fortress and village of Piedmont, 23 miles S.S.E. of Aosta. It is situate on a height at the south entrance of the valley of Aosta, and in 1800 was razed by the French; but since that period it has been restored. This fort commands the passage of the Aosta valley, and here Napoleon, after crossing the Alps, in 1800, met with a formidable resistance from an Austrian garrison of 400 men.

BARDESANES, or BAR DEISAN, bar-des-a'-nes, a Gnostic theologian, especially famous for his hymns.

Lived in the 2nd century.

BARDILI, CHRISTOPHER GOTTFRIED, bard'-i-li, German metaphysical writer, who strongly opposed the system of Kant.

Born in Wurtemberg, 1761; died at Stuttgart, 1808.

BARDOLINO, bar-do-le'-no, a town of northern Italy, 14 miles W. of Verona. Pop. 2,000.—Near this place is the field of Rivoli, where, in January 1797, the French, under Napoleon I., defeated the Austrians under Alvinzi.

BARDSEY, bard'-se, an island on the coast of Wales, near the N. point of Cardigan Bay. Ext. 2 miles long and one broad. The name is a corruption of "Bard's island," which it was formerly called, from its having been the last retreat of the Welsh bards.

BAREBONE, PRAISE GOD, bair'-bone, a Puritan, who was by trade a leatherseller, and who became, in 1654, one of the most active members of Cromwell's parliament, which was named after him. When General Monk came to London to restore the king, this man appeared at the head of a formidable rabble, and presented a petition to parliament for the exclusion of the king and the royal family. Monk, in consequence, wrote a letter of complaint to the house for encouraging the furious zealot and his adherents. It is said that there were three brothers of this family, each of whom had a sentence to his name; viz., "Praise God Barebone;" "Christ came into the world to save Barebone;" and "If Christ had not died thou hadst been damned Barebone." The parent of this hopeful family could scarcely have carried his fanaticism further in christening his children.

Died 1680.

BAREGES, bar-aigé', a small French town in the department of Hautes-Pyrenées, famous for warm sulphur and springs. The silk fabric, barège, named from the town, is now chiefly made at Bagnenes de Bigone.

BAREILLY, or BARELI, ba-ri'-le, a district of British India, in the N.W. provinces, forming a portion of Rohilcund, having the Kumaon hills on the N., the Ganges on the W., a portion of Oude on the E. and S., and on the N. and W. Furrukabad, Alighur, and Moradabad. The surface is in general level and the soil good, being well watered by the Gogra and the Ramanga, the latter of which receives numerous hill torrents. In the extreme north is a large tract of forest jungle. Pro. The most important are sugar and rice. Area, 2,982 square miles. Pop. 1,030,936.

BAREILLY, or BARELI, the chief town of the above district, stands on the left bank of the Jua, on an affluent of the Ganges. The principal institution in the town is the Bareilly college, conducted by a staff of English professors. The town is large and busy. Manf. Cabinet-work, cotton, silk, and brocades, jewellery and gold and silver work, gold laces and articles in metal. Pop. 113,417. Lat. 28° 23′ N. Lon. 79° 28′ E.—Near this town the British obtained two victories over the Rohillas, the first in 1774, under Colonel Champion; the second in 1796, under Sir Robert Abercrombie. Here an outbreak of the Sepoys took place on the 1st of June, 1857, when Brigadier Sibbald and Ensign Tucker were killed on their way to the parade ground.

BARENT, DIETRICK, ba-rent', a Dutch painter of history and portraits, who studied in the school of Titian, with whom he continued several years.

Born at Amsterdam, 1534; died 1582.

BARERE DE VIEUZAC, BERHAND, bar'-aird-vee'-zak, member of the French Convention, and one of the most bloodthirsty of the actors in the Reign of Terror. He was trained to the profession of the law, and practised as advocate at Toulouse. In 1789 he was elected deputy to the States General, the proceedings of which he reported in a journal. In 1792 he was elected deputy to the National Convention. He supported Robespierre against the Girondists, and voted for the execution of the king and queen. After the fall of the Convention, proceedings were taken against him, and he was sent prisoner to the Isle of Orleans. He escaped and remained in concealment for several years. He afterwards entered the service of Napoleon, acting as a political spy, and on the restoration of the Bourbons, in 1815, was banished from France. He lived in Belgium until after the revolution of 1830, when he returned to France and accepted a small pension from Louis Philippe. He was the last survivor of the famous Committee of Public Safety. His flippancy and gay ribaldry during the most terrible scenes of the great Revolution gained for him the title of the "Anacreon of the Guillotine." Macaulay said of him, when noticing his memoirs in the Edinburgh Review, "Our opinion is that Barère approached nearer than any person mentioned in history or fiction, whether man or devil, to the idea of consummate and universal depravity."

Born at Tarbes, 1755; died at Paris, 1841.

BARETTI, GIUSEPPE, ba-ret'-e, an ingenious Italian writer, the son of an architect at Turin. He began life in a counting house at Guastalla, but forsook commerce for literature, and for some years led a wandering life. In 1750 he visited England, and soon acquired a knowledge of the language, which he afterwards wrote with facility and correctness. He obtained the appointment of secretary to the Royal Academy, and about 1753 he became acquainted with Dr. Johnson, by whose means he was introduced as a teacher of Italian into the family of Mr. Thrale. In 1760 he returned to Italy, and began to publish at Venice a periodical work entitled "Frusta Literaria" (the "literary scourge,") but on account of the freedom of its sentiments, found it expedient to quit that country, and once more visited England. In 1769 he was tried at the Old Bailey for killing a man who had assaulted him in the Haymarket, and was acquitted. Next year he published his "Travels through France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy," 4 vols. 8vo. During Lord North's administration he obtained a pension. He was a talented, pleasant, and charitable man. Besides the above, he wrote "A Dissertation on Italian Poetry;" "An Introduction to the Italian Language;" "The Italian Library;" 8vo; "A Dictionary, English and Italian," 2 vols. 4to; "A Grammar of the Italian Language," 8vo; "An Account of the Manners and Customs of Italy," 2 vols. 8vo; "An Introduction to the most Useful European Languages," 8vo; "A Dictionary, English and Spanish," 4to; by which, and his Italian Dictionary, he is best known.

Born at Turin, 1716; died in London, 1789.

BARFLEUR, bar'-flur, a town of France, department of La Manche, 15 miles E. of Cherbourg. It was formerly a considerable town, and from it William the Conqueror sailed with his army to effect the conquest of England. The town was destroyed and the harbour filled up by the English in 1346.

BARFLEUR, a cape on the coast of France, 18 miles E. of Cherbourg, on which there is a lighthouse 271 feet high. Lat. 49° 40′ N. Lon. 1° 16′ E.

BARGE, barj, an ancient town of Piedmont, in the province of Saluzzo, 33 miles S.W. of Turin. Manf. Chiefly firearms, and slate is quarried in the neighbourhood. Pop. 9,200.

BARHAM, REV. RICHARD HARRIS, bar'-ham, a humorous writer, known to the world by his literary name of Thomas Ingoldsby. He was educated at Oxford, and at first was intended for the profession of the law, but resolved on entering the Church, and was ordained in 1813. He was one of the priests in ordinary of the Chapel Royal, and in the latter part of his life rector of St. Augustine's, in the city of London. His "Ingoldsby Legends" were first contributed to "Bentley's Miscellany," and afterwards collected into volumes. For many years he was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," the "Literary Gazette," and other periodicals; and he was the author of the popular novel entitled "My Cousin Nicholas."

Born at Canterbury, 1788; died in London 1845.

BARI TERRADI, bar'-e, a province of Italy having on the W. Capitanata, on the S. Otranto, on the W. Basilicata, and on the N. the Adriatic. It is, except in the southern parts, a level, fertile country, producing abundance of grain, fruit, and wine. Large numbers of goats, sheep, asses, and swine are reared. Area, 2,292 square miles. Pop. 713,360.

BARI, the chief town of the above province, lying on the Gulf of Venice, and well fortified, being, towards the sea, defended by strong walls. Its principal buildings are, a citadal (dating from the 11th century), a cathedral, the priory of St. Nicolo, where the body of that saint is preserved, and supposed to work miracles, and a college of nobles; and it has civil and criminal courts. There is a good harbour, and a large shipping trade is carried on. There are railways to Brindisi and Taronto. Manf. Linen, cotton, and silk fabrics; glass, soap, and liqueurs. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 41° 7′ N. Lon. 16° 53′ E.—On the fall of the Roman empire this town, the ancient Barium, first passed into the hands of the Saracens, and afterwards into those of the Normans, when it became the capital of Apulia. It has thrice been taken and destroyed, and as often rebuilt on the same site.

BARIGAZZO, bar'-e-gats'-o, a village of Italy, in the province of Lunigiana, in the neighbourhood of which fire issues from the surface of the earth, ascends for several feet, and continues for some days.

BARILE, bar'-e-lai, a town of Naples, 3 miles from Melfi. Pop. about 4,000.—It suffered greatly by an earthquake in 1851.

BARJONA, bar-jo'-na, "son of Jona," the designation of Peter in Syriac.

BARKER, ROBERT, was an Irishman, and the inventor and patentee of panoramas. Amongst his most popular panoramas were the battles of Aboukir and Trafalgar. He was himself originally a painter, and, in the production of his pictures was assisted by R. R. Reinagle, R.A., from whose sketches a great number of his foreign views were painted.

Born at Kells, Meath; died in London, 1806.

BARKHAM, JOHN, bark'-ham, an English antiquary, who was made dean of Bocking, in Essex. He bequeathed medals and coins to Archbishop Laud, who added them to the collection which he had given to the university of Oxford; and he is said to have been the sole author of the "Display of Heraldry," which goes under the name of Guillim.

Born at Exeter, 1572; died at Bocking, in Essex, 1642.

BARKING, bar'-king, a market-town of Essex, situate on the river Roding, commonly known in its lower parts as Barking Creek, running into the Thames, 7 miles from London. The old church of St. Margaret is a very fine structure, containing some curious monuments. An old but disused market-house and an ancient gateway are also interesting. Barking was famous for its nunnery, established in the 7th century, and existing until the dissolution of the religious houses. It has no manufactures, but has a timber and vegetable trade. Pop. 9,155. A station on the London, Tilbury, and Southend railway.

BAR-LE-DUC, or BAR-SUR-ORNAIN, bar-le(r)-dook, the chief town of the department of Meuse, France, 125 miles from Paris. There are an old church, St. Pierre, a college, and public library. Manf. Cottons, hosiery, leather, and confectionery. It has a considerable trade in timber, wine, wool, and iron. Pop. about 15,000.

BARLETTA, bar-let'-a, a seaport-town of Italy, in the province of Terra di Bari, on the Gulf of Venice. It is situate on an island connected with the mainland by a bridge, and 33 miles N.W. of Bari. The streets are wide and well paved; the houses large, lofty, and built of beautiful hewn stone. It has a Gothic cathedral, Sta. Maria Maggiore, remarkable for its antique columns of granite; and a spacious citadel. In the market-place stands a colossal bronze statue, supposed to be the emperor Heraclius. There is a small harbour. Pro. and Manf. Salt, almonds, liquorice, fruit, wool, and skins. Pop. 31,994. Lat. 41° 19′ N. Lon. 16° 18′ E.

BARLETTA, GABRIELLO, a Dominican monk and an extraordinary preacher, whose sermons exhibit such a mixture of religious and comic expressions, sublime and vulgar ideas, the serious and the ridiculous, and, what is more remarkable, the whole are written in such a barbarous language, compounded of Greek, Latin, and Italian, as to have rendered them among the most extraordinary productions in literature.

Born 1450.

BARLOW, JOEL, an American author and diplomatist. He was educated at Yale College, New Haven, and, during the War of Independence, composed many patriotic songs and addresses to stimulate his countrymen in the great cause in which they were engaged. In 1787 he published by subscription a poem entitled the "Vision of Columbus," whilst engaged as a lawyer and the conductor of a weekly newspaper in the town of Hartford. In the following year he visited England as the agent of a company speculating in the sale of land, and united himself to that class who were then zealous in the advocacy of republican principles. In 1795 he was appointed American consul at Algiers. After spending seventeen years in this country and in France, where he had engaged in profitable commercial transactions, he returned to America, and in 1808 reproduced his "Vision of Columbus," under the new title of "The Columbiad." This performance never obtained a high popularity. He then engaged himself in collecting materials for a "History of the United States," but was interrupted by President Madison, who admired him so much as to appoint him minister plenipotentiary to the court of France. Accordingly, in 1812, he once more arrived in France, and soon afterwards died from a sudden attack of inflammation, while on his way to meet Napoleon in Poland.

Born at Reading, Connecticut, 1755; died near Cracow, 1812.

BARLOW, PETER, an eminent mathematician, who, although possessed of no other advantages than those which arise from the commonest education, rose to be, when 30 years of age, mathematical master at the Royal Academy, Woolwich, and filled the chair as its professor for forty years, retiring in 1847. In 1825, the Royal Society, of which he had been elected fellow two years previously, awarded him their Copley medal for "various communications on the subject of magnetism." For his able "Essay on Magnetic Attractions," published in 1820, the Board of Longitude presented him with the parliamentary reward for useful discoveries in navigation. He contributed many articles to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana."

Born at Norwich, in 1776; died 1862.

BARLOWE, WILLIAM, an eminent mathematician, who, on entering into orders, was made prebendary of Winchester, and finally archdeacon of Sarum. He was the first English writer on the properties of the loadstone, and he likewise discovered the difference between iron and steel, and their tempers for magnetical uses. To him also we are indebted for the way of pointing magnetic needles, and of piercing and cementing loadstones. As the first English writer on the nature and properties of the magnet, and as the inventor of the compass-box as now used at sea, the name of Barlowe deserves to stand high amongst those scientific investigators who have exerted their talents for the benefit of mankind.

Died 1625.

BARMAK, bar'-mak, a Persian who acquired great power under the caliph Abd-ul-Malik, and was the founder of the famous family the Barmecides, who were for four generations so powerful in Bagdad, until Jaafar, the vizier of Haroun-al-Raschid, was beheaded by that potentate.

Lived at the end of the 7th century.

BARMEN, bar'-men, a manufacturing centre of Rhenish Prussia, including several villages and hamlets in the circle of Elberfield, and stretching for 6 miles along the Wupper valley. Manf. Silk and cotton fabrics, ribbon weaving (of which it is the most important seat in Germany), thread, lace, buttons, braids, steel and plated goods, and chemicals. Pop. about 102,921.

BARMOUTH, bar'-mouth, a seaport-town of North Wales, in Merionethshire, 8 miles from Dolgelly. The town is built on very unequal ground, so that at the mouth of the Maw, or Avon, the houses gradually rise above each other in successive terraces. It is much frequented for sea-bathing, and the environs are very picturesque. Pop. 1,000.

BARNABAS, ST., bar'-na-bas, "son of prophecy or of consolation," the name given to Joses, of the tribe of Levi, a native of Cyprus, who embraced the gospel, sold his estate, and gave the produce to the apostles, and became an eminent evangelist. He was sent to Antioch to confirm the new disciples; and was the companion of St. Paul. He was stoned to death by the Jews in Cyprus.—There is an epistle extant under his name, which was printed at Amsterdam, with notes, in 1724, by Le Clerc.

Lived in the 1st century.

BARNARD, LADY ANNE, the daughter of James Lindsay, 5th earl of Balcarras, and the wife of Sir Andrew Barnard, librarian to George III. She is noticed here for being the authoress of the pathetic ballad entitled "Auld Robin Grey," the name of the writer of which was preserved a secret for upwards of fifty years.

Born 1750; died 1825.

BARNARD, SIR ANDREW FRANCIS, G.C.B. and G.C.H., a British general, who early entered the army, and saw much active service in the W. Indies, and was also in 1799 engaged in the expedition to the Helder, and subsequently was present, in the Peninsular war, at Barrosa, where he was severely wounded, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajoz, Salamanca, Vittoria, Nivelle, where he was again wounded, Orthes, and Toulouse. For his services he received many honours, and in 1815 fought and was slightly hurt at Waterloo. He stood so high in the duke of Wellington's opinion, that, when Paris capitulated, Sir Andrew was appointed commandant of the British troops there.

Born in Donegal, 1773; died Jan. 17, 1855.

BARNARD CASTLE, a market-town in Durham, situate on the river Tees, 22 miles from Durham. Here are the extensive remains of a castle of great antiquity, built in 1132 by Barnard Baliol, grandfather of John Baliol, who was born here, and who became king of Scotland. It was left in a ruinous condition after a siege in 1569. St. Mary's church, built in the 12th century, and restored in 1871, has some curious monuments. The other buildings deserving notice are the octagonal town hall, the Bower Museum, bequeathed to the town by Sir George Bower, in 1874, and a hospital for poor persons, said to have been founded by John Baliol. Manf. Carpets, woollen cloth, and thread. There is a very large corn-market. Pop. 4,544. A station on the North-Eastern railway.

BARNAUL, bar'-nawl, a town of Asiatic Russia, situate on a river of the same name, where it joins the Oby. It is the seat of a court of directors for the whole of the Kolyvan line, including the silver-mines on the Oby, and the mines of the Altai mountains. Manf. Glass, tiles, bricks; and here are smelted large quantities of lead, and also all auriferous silver ores. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 53° 20′ N. Lon. 83° 26′ E.

BARNAVE, ANTOINE PIERRE JOSEPH MARIE, bar'-nav, one of the actors in and the victims of the French revolution. He was a member for Dauphiny, his native province, of the National Assembly; in which he was remarkable for the vehemence with which he enunciated his principles and opinions. When the king was stopped at Varennes, he was deputed to conduct him and the royal family to Paris; in which mission he behaved with great respect to his illustrious captives. He was, with the exception of Mirabeau, the greatest orator in the Assembly, of which, in 1790, he was chosen president. At the dissolution of the Assembly, he retired to Grenoble. Being obnoxious to the violent party, he was arrested, and sent to the guillotine.

Born at Grenoble, 1761; died 1793.

BARNES, ALBERT, barns, an American Biblical commentator, well known as the author of "Barnes's Notes," which have gone through many editions in the United States, and have been republished in England, and are much esteemed.

Born at Rome, state of New York, 1798; died at Philadelphia, 1870.

BARNES, JOSHUA, an English scholar, Queen's professor of Greek, 1695, who wrote a humorous tract about pigmies, a life of Edward III., and a so-called life, or rather attack on Cromwell.

Born 1654; died 1712.

BARNES, JULIANA, a lady whose accomplishments procured her the place of prioress of Sopewell nunnery, which belonged to St. Albans. She wrote on heraldry, hunting, and hawking, which treatises were printed at the monastery of St. Albans.

Born at Roding, Essex; lived in the 15th century.

BARNES, ROBERT, an English divine, who was chaplain to Henry VIII., by whom he was sent to Germany to confer with the divines of that country on the legality of his divorce. There he became a Lutheran, and on his return propagated his new opinions with such zeal, that he was arrested and burnt in Smithfield. He wrote a treatise on justification, and some other books.

Suffered in 1540.

BARNET, or CHIPPING BARNET, bar'-net, a town of Hertfordshire, 11 miles N of London. The parish church was built in the 15th century, and there are a new church and a royal free grammar-school, founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1573. In September a very important horse and cattle fair is here held. At East Barnet is a very ancient church; and New Barnet is a rapidly increasing suburb. Pop. 4,095.—Near this town, April 14th, 1471, on Gladsmore Heath, was fought the decisive battle of Barnet, between the Yorkists and Lancastrians, in which the latter were completely defeated, and their leader, the earl of Warwick, killed. In 1740, an obelisk was erected here, to commemorate the event. There are two other small places in England of this name, and one in the United States. Station on the Great Northern railway.

BARNEVELDT, JOHN VAN OLDEN, barn'-velt, Grand Pensionary of Holland, who rose from his position as an advocate to the first dignities in the Dutch government. During the struggle of the Netherlanders with the Spaniards, he assisted, in 1573, as a volunteer in the defence of Haarlem; and, in 1585, the year following the assassination of William, prince of Orange, was sent as ambassador to England. Here he was successful in procuring military assistance from Queen Elizabeth, and on his return from the embassy was made advocate-general. In 1598, he was ambassador to France, and in 1603 to England to negotiate an arrangement for assistance against the Spaniards. In 1609, notwithstanding the opposition of Maurice prince of Orange, the stadtholder, he succeeded in concluding a twelve years' truce. Approving of the doctrines of the Arminians, which Maurice, as a Gomarist (or Calvinist), opposed, he made himself obnoxious to that prince, who was possessed of great power, and was arrested and tried for plotting to deliver up his country to the Spanish monarch. There was absolutely no evidence against him, but the influence of Maurice was paramount, and Barneveldt was found guilty and beheaded. His sons, William and René, formed a conspiracy against Maurice, to revenge their father's death, which was discovered. William escaped, but René was taken prisoner and executed. The wife of Barneveldt solicited for the pardon of René, and Prince Maurice expressed his astonishment that she should do for her son what she had refused to do for her husband. To this she nobly replied, "I would not seek pardon for my husband, because he was innocent; I ask it for my son, because he is guilty."

Born 1547; died 1619.

BARNSLEY, or BARNESLEY, barns'-le, a market-town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, near the river Dearne, 11 miles N. of Sheffield. The chief public buildings are the churches of St. Mary and St. John, the county court, and the bank. The free grammar school was founded in 1665. A public park of 20 acres was presented to the town in 1862, by the widow of Mr. Joseph Locke, M.P. Two canals afford means of communication with the town. Manf. Damasks, drills, and linen yarns. It has coal-works (the fields extending under the town), and iron foundries, needle and wire factories, and bleaching-fields. Pop. 29,789. A station on the Midland, Manchester, Sheffield and Lincoln, and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

BARNSTABLE, a county of Massachusetts, U.S., comprising Cape Cod. The soil is principally sandy and barren, and the inhabitants engaged chiefly in the cod-fisheries. Pop. 31,897.

BARNSTABLE, a seaport and capital of the above county, 68 miles from Boston. Pop. 5,000.

BARNSTAPLE, barn'-stap-el, a market-town and borough of Devonshire, always considered a seaport, although situated 6 miles from the sea, on the Taw, which is here crossed by a bridge of 16 arches, and a railway bridge. The town is generally well built, and placed amongst beautiful scenery. The chief public buildings are four large churches, a guildhall, town-hall (including corn exchange and assembly-room), and a free grammar-school. The market-place is the largest in the west of England. Manf. Principally porcelain, and formerly woollen goods were its staple. Pop. 12,283. A station on the Great Western and London and South-Western railways.

BARNWELL, a county of South Carolina. Cotton is the chief production. Pop. 39,857.

BAROACH. (See BROACH.)

BAROCHE, PETER JULES, ba'-rōsh, a celebrated French advocate, who, on the 23rd of February, 1848, signed the bill of charges brought by Odilon Barrot against Guizot, for having prevented the reform banquet. Subsequently he became, under the government of Louis Napoleon, minister of the interior, foreign minister, and, after the coup d'état of 1851, vice-president of the consultative commission.

Born at Paris, 1802.

BAROCCI, FREDERICK, ba-rot'-che, an Italian painter, who received, at Rome, much praise and encouragement from Michael Angelo. He chiefly excelled in religious subjects, and his pictures, which are rare, are held in high esteem. He also etched with great delicacy.

Born at Urbino, 1528; died 1612.

BARODA, ba-ro'-da, a native state of India, the prince of which is called the Guikwar. Its chief city is also named Baroda, which is fortified, situated on the river Biswamintri, and connected with Bombay by railway. Area of the state, 8,570 square miles. Pop. 2,185,005. Pop. of city 101,818.

BARON, MICHAEL, ba'-rong, a famous French actor, the son of a leather-merchant, who himself was something of a performer. For nearly thirty years he played, with the greatest success, with Molière's troupe, and then, in 1691, without any apparent reason, suddenly retired from the stage. In 1720, however, he again returned, and was received with immense enthusiasm, playing, with great success, even the most youthful parts. He was taken ill whilst on the boards, and died shortly afterwards.

Born 1653; died 1729.

BARONI, LEONORA, ba-ro'-ne, a famous Italian singer, the daughter of the fair Adriana of Mantua, on whose beauty and accomplishments numerous panegyrics were printed. Leonora possessed eminent talents, and a volume of poems in different languages was, in 1636, printed in her praise. She also wrote several poetical pieces of merit.

Born at Naples, and flourished during the 17th century.

BARONIUS, CÆSAR, bā-ro'-ne-us, a learned cardinal, who entered into the congregation of the Oratory; and, in 1583, was elected superior-general of that order, and subsequently became librarian of the Vatican and confessor to Clement VIII., whom he would have succeeded as pope, but for the Spanish party. He was elected a cardinal in 1596. The fame of Baronius rests on his celebrated and laborious work, "Annales Ecclesiastica" (Ecclesiastical Annals), which was published in 12 volumes, and has been reproduced in many forms, and contains the history of the first twelve centuries of the church.

Born near Naples, 1537; died 1607.

BAROTSE, ba-rot'-se, a district of Central Africa, descending gradually to the right bank of the Zambesi. The soil is fertile. The climate is unhealthy for Europeans, fever being prevalent. Lat. between 15° 20′ and 16° 30′ S. Lon. 23° and 24° E.

BAROZZI, or BAROCCHIO, GIACOMO DA VIGNOLA, ba-rot'-se, a famous architect, who first studied painting, but afterwards architecture, and became a member of the Academy of Design at Rome. He built several palaces in and near Bologna; but his greatest work is the palace at Caprarola, erected for Alexander Farnese. He also constructed the famous canal to Ferrara, and was employed to build some churches at Rome, and succeeded Michael Angelo as architect of St. Peter's. He carried off the prize, from twenty-two competitors, for the design for the Escurial at Madrid, and wrote a celebrated book, entitled "Rules for the Five Orders of Architecture," which has gone through sixteen editions; also a treatise on Practical Perspective.

Born at Vignola, 1507; died 1573.

BARQUESIMETO, bar'-kais-e-mas'-to, a city of Venezuela, South America, and the capital of the province of Nueva Segovia. It is situated on one of the streams which form the head waters of the Orinoco. The city was well built, with a handsome church; but, in 1812, it suffered fearfully from an earthquake, which almost entirely destroyed it, and buried in its ruins nearly 1,500 persons. It was founded in 1522 by the Spaniards, who had reason to think that extensive gold mines existed in the vicinity. Many horses and mules are reared. Pop. 26,000. Lat. 9° 54′ 35″ N. Lon. 69° 12′ 27″ W.

BARR, bar, a town in Alsace, 18 miles S.W. of Strasburg, on the eastern slope of the Vosges. On a hill near the town are the ruins of the old convent of St. Odilia. Manf. Wool and cotton, pottery, crystal and soap; an active trade is carried on in wine, brandy, vinegar, and cattle. Pop. 5,600.

BARRA, bar'-ra, a town of Italy, 3 miles E. of Naples. Manf. Silks. Pop. 6,000.—There is another town of the same name near Reggio. Pop. 3,000.

BARRA, or BARRAY, one of the Hebrides, or Western Isles of Scotland. (See HEBRIDES.)

BARRA, or BARR, a small Mandingo kingdom of Western Africa, at the mouth of the Gambia. The district, though marshy, is fertile and well cultivated. Pop. 200,000.

BARRACKPOOR, bar-ak-poor', a town of British India, on the Hooghly, 15 miles above Calcutta. The governor-general has a fine residence here, situate in a beautiful park; and there is a military cantonment. The natives call it Chanak, from John Charnock, who, in 1689, erected a bungalow, and established a bazaar there. Pop. 30,317. It was here that the terrible mutiny of 1857 first broke out.

BARRACOUTA, or PORT IMPERIAL, bar-ra-coo'-ta, a harbour of the Russian Empire on the west shore of the Gulf of Tartary, receiving the river Haji, or Ui; there is a small Russian settlement. Lat. 49° 2′ N. Lon. 140° 19′ E.

BARRADA, or BURADA, bar-ra'-da, a river of Syria, flowing to Damascus, near which it divides, the branches being probably the Pharpar, and the Abana of Scripture. They again unite and flow into the lake Bahr-el-Merj.

BARRAFRANCA, bar-ra-fran'-ca, a town in Sicily, 10 miles S.E. of Caltanisetta. Pop. 6,000

BARRAS, bar-ra', PAUL FRANÇOIS JEAN NICOLAS, Comte de, one of the five members of the French Directory. He entered early into military life, and took part in the defence of Pondicherry, in India, against the English, and was present at the battle of Progua, and soon after returned to France. At the break out of the great revolution Barras assisted at the taking of the Bastille, and afterwards of the Tuileries. In 1792 he was elected a member of the National Convention, and voted for the death of Louis XVI. He was sent, in 1793, to the south of France, and commanded the left wing of the besieging army under Dugommier, and it was here that he first met Napoleon Bonaparte, then captain of artillery. The patriotic reputation of Barras was so well established, that he and Fréron were the only representatives not denounced by the popular societies. Robespierre, however, was no friend of his, disliking his dissolute habits, and often wished to arrest him; and Barras, knowing this, became one of the principal actors of the ninth Thermidor, and put himself at the head of the troops which surrounded Robespierre at the Hôtel de Ville. In 1794 he was named one of the "Committee of Public Safety," and became a great enemy to the members of the Mountain; and, in February, 1795, he was elected president of the Convention, and, in that capacity, declared Paris in a state of siege, when the assembly was attacked by the populace. Afterwards, when the Convention was assailed, Bonaparte, by Barras' advice, was appointed to command the artillery; and that general, on the 13th Vendémiaire (Oct. 5, 1795), decisively repressed the royalist movement. For his services Barras was now named one of the Directory, and took a prominent part in the changes which that body underwent, being practically dictator, until Napoleon's coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799), which effectually overthrew the power of Barras and his colleagues. His life, from this date, was, generally speaking, one of retirement; and, after living at Grosbois, Marseilles, and Brussels, he went to Chaillot, near Paris, where he died. Napoleon said of him, "The passion with which he spoke would make one imagine he was a resolute, determined man; but he was not so,—he had no decided opinion on any subject connected with government."

Born in Provence, 1755; died at Paris, 1829.

BARRAX, bar'-rax, a town in Spain, province of New Castile. Pop. 2,400.

BARRE, LEWIS FRANCIS JOSEPH DE LA, an ingenious writer, who assisted Anselm Banduri in his "Imperium Orientale," and the collection of Roman emperors from the emperor Decius, for which he had a pension given him by the Duke of Tuscany. He also published "Memoirs for the History of France and Burgundy," and several other works.

Born 1688; died 1738.

BARRELIER, bar-rel'-e-ai, a French botanist, at first a physician, but who became a Dominican, and devoted himself to the study of botany, travelling through the south of France and Spain, collecting specimens of plants. He subsequently visited Italy, and founded, at Rome, a botanical garden. Here he also had engraved some of the plants he had collected, and, after remaining at Rome 23 years, returned to Paris, where he endeavoured to perfect his labours, with a view of publishing an account of his discoveries, but died there. His valuable MSS. were, after his death, nearly all destroyed by fire, and only a few copper-plates saved: these, however, were used by Antoine de Jussieu in a work published in 1714; and Plumier, in honour of Barrelier, established the genus Barreliera, of the order Acanthaceæ.

Born 1606; died at Paris, 1673.

BARREN, bar'-en, a county of Kentucky, U.S. Notwithstanding the name, the soil is fertile. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 22,321. The capital is Glasgow.

BARREN ISLAND, an island in the Bay of Bengal, with a volcanic mountain, which is frequently in eruption, and has a height of 1,848 feet.

BARRETT, GEORGE, bär'-et, a landscape-painter, who was self-taught, and obtained, when young, the premium of 50*l*., offered by the Dublin Society for the best landscape in oil. In 1762 he came to London, and the year after his arrival he gained the premium given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., for the best landscape. He was one of the first who suggested the foundation of the Royal Academy, of which he became a member.

Born at Dublin, 1732; died at Paddington, 1784.

BARRH, bar, a busy trading town of British India, in the province of Bengal, on the right bank of the Ganges. Pop. 25,000.

BARRHEAD, bar'-hed, a town of Scotland, in the county of Renfrew, 7 miles S.W. of Glasgow, and very picturesquely situated. Manf. Spinning, weaving, and bleaching. Pop. 6,728.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

BARRI, GIRALD DE. (See GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS.)

BARRIE, bar-ree', a town of Canada West, capital of Simcoe county, on Lake Simcoe. Pop. 2,000.

BARRIER REEF, THE GREAT, an immense coral reef, from 1,000 to 1,200 miles in length, on the N.E. coast of Australia, from which it is distant from 10 to 60 or 70 miles. Inside the reef the navigation is safe but intricate; and on one of the islands which dot its surface is a beacon 40 feet high. (See AUSTRALIA.)

BARRIGA NEGRA, bar'-re-ga ne'-gra, a town in a district of the same name, in Uruguay, where are large cattle-breeding estates, some of which have as many as 200,000 head.

BARRINGTON, JOHN SHUTE, Viscount, bär'-ing-ton, the first Lord Barrington, was the son of Mr. Shute, a merchant; but a Mr. Barrington, who had married his cousin, having left him his estate, he, by act of parliament, assumed his arms and name. He wrote several works advocating the rights of Protestant dissenters, and, in 1720, was created an Irish peer, being then member for Berwick. Having engaged in the Hamburg lottery, which proved to be a bubble speculation, he was, in 1723, expelled from the House of Commons. In 1725 he published his "Miscellanea Sacra." He also wrote "An Essay on the Several Dispensations of God to Mankind," and other works.

Born at Theobald's, Herts, 1678; died in Berkshire, 1734.

BARRINGTON, DAINES, the Honourable, third son of the above, was brought up to the law, and in 1757 was made a Welsh judge, after which he was appointed second justice of Chester. He resigned these offices long before his death, and lived in retirement in the Temple, engaging himself principally in the studies of antiquity and natural history. He wrote "Observations on the Statutes," a work which has frequently been reprinted, and to which, in the later editions, new matter has been added. He also wrote tracts on the possibility of reaching the north pole. These were intended to promote a favourite project of the author, and embodied a vast amount of traditionary, as well as conjectural, evidence. Besides these, he contributed several papers to the Royal and Antiquarian societies, of both of which he was a member, and of the late vice-president; and was the author of a very curious essay on the language of birds.

Born 1727; died in the Temple, 1800.

BARROS, or DE BARROS, JOAS DE, bar'-ros, a Portuguese historian, who was tutor to the sons of King Emanuel; and when his pupil Don Juan ascended the throne as King John III., he had conferred upon him the governorship of St. George da Mina, on the coast of Guinea. He was subsequently recalled to Lisbon, and appointed agent-general for the Portuguese colonies, in which capacity he composed his great work entitled "Asia Portuguesa," which he divided into four decades of ten books each. The style of this writer is considered a model of Portuguese prose.

Born at Viseu, 1496; died near Pombal, 1570.

BARROT, CAMILLE HYACINTHE ODILON, bar'-ro, a celebrated French statesman, who showed great talents at an early age, and acquired considerable reputation as an advocate. After the revolution of 1830, in the principal transactions of which he was deeply engaged, he accompanied the dethroned dynasty to Cherbourg. Under Louis Philippe, Barrot, as a member of the Chamber of Deputies, was in opposition to Guizot, and was ardent in agitating for reform, and attended several of the provincial banquets, the interdiction of which ultimately led to the revolution of 1848, at the commencement of which he pleaded in vain for the establishment of the regency of the duchess of Orleans. He subsequently became, in December, 1848, president of the council; and, in September, 1849, from ill health, resigned; and, in 1852, withdrew from public affairs. In 1872 he was made a councillor of state and vice-president of the council.

Born at Villefort, 1791; died 1873.

BARROW, ISAAC, bar'-o, an eminent mathematician and divine. He was the son of a London linendraper, and was first placed in the Charterhouse, and afterwards removed to Felsted school, in Essex, whence he was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1647 he was chosen a scholar, and subscribed the engagement; but repenting of what he had done, he went back and struck out his name from the list. This was in strict conformity with the remarkable antagonistic and belligerent spirit which, up to the present period, he had frequently, if not usually, displayed. But however high might be his combative qualities, they were by no means superior to his intellectual powers. He had been a hard student, and the writings of Bacon, Descartes, Galileo, and similar philosophers, were his favourites. In 1649 he was chosen fellow of his college, and studied physic with a view of making it his profession; but by the advice of his uncle, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, he forsook it, and devoted himself to theology. In 1655 he went on his travels, and at Constantinople read over all the works of St. Chrysostom. It was during this cruise up the Mediterranean, that the vessel in which he sailed was attacked by an Algerine pirate, when he exhibited great courage, and took his part with the rest of the crew in driving off the enemy. On his return, in 1659, he was episcopally ordained, and in 1660 was chosen Greek Professor at Cambridge. In 1662 he was appointed Gresham Professor of geometry; and in the year following was elected fellow of the Royal Society. In 1664 he gave up the Gresham professorship, on being appointed Lucasian Professor of mathematics at Cambridge, which chair he resigned in 1669 to his pupil, then Mr. Isaac Newton. In 1670 he was created D.D., and two years afterwards appointed master of Trinity College; on which occasion the king said that he had given it to the most learned man in England. In 1675 he served the office of vice-chancellor, at which time the life of this truly great man was drawing to a close. Not only as a mathematician, but as a divine, Barrow merits to rank with the highest of England's worthies. In the former capacity, Dr. Pemberton remarks, "He may be esteemed as having shown a compass of invention, equal, if not superior, to any of the moderns, Sir Isaac Newton only excepted." He was the originator of the idea of what has been called the incremental triangle, and proved the error of his predecessors in affirming that a portion of a curve may be taken so small, that it may, in calculation, be considered as a straight line. He was the author of many mathematical works; amongst which we may mention his "Lectiones Mathematicæ," which are esteemed as perfect models in the hands of those who are attached to the reasoning of sound geometry. As a divine, he seems inexhaustible in argument, knowledge, and power; and he was an eloquent preacher, though, it may be added, his sermons were frequently of most inordinate length. He was known to preach for three hours and a half. Bishop Heber ranked him as one of the three greatest religious teachers of England, the others being Taylor and Hooker.

Born in London, 1630; died 1677.

BARROW, SIR JOHN, rose from being clerk in an iron-foundry at Liverpool, and afterwards a mathematical teacher at Greenwich, to the post of second secretary to the Admiralty, which he occupied for forty years. His first step to advancement in public life, however, arose from his accompanying, as private secretary to Sir George Staunton, the expedition of Lord Macartney to China. On his return he published his "Travels in China," which, at the time, was considered one of the most valuable and interesting accounts which had appeared of the Chinese. In a few months he mastered the Chinese language sufficiently to speak it with fluency. In 1797 he accompanied Lord Macartney to the Cape of Good Hope in the capacity of his private secretary, and was deputed to open communications with the Kaffirs, and on his return, published a volume of his "Travels in Southern Africa." In 1814 he received an appointment from Lord Melville to the second-secretaryship of the Admiralty, when his ardour in the pursuit of geographical knowledge and scientific discovery was soon evinced by the manner in which he endeavoured to serve his country in bringing before various governments the desirability of prosecuting voyages to the arctic regions. These services were honourably noticed in various ways; and in 1835 he was created a baronet. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and held the degree of LL.D. He retired from public life in 1845.

Born near Ulverstone, Lancashire, 1764; died 1848.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS, a borough and port of Lancashire, in the north-western part of the county, at the extremity of the peninsula of Furness, which lies between the estuary of the Duddon and Morecambe Bay. The town is the most remarkable instance of rapid growth in the United Kingdom. The hematite iron ore in the district had long been in repute, but Barrow was an insignificant little village, the population, as lately as 1847, being estimated at a little over 300. In 1856 railway communication was established, farther developed in 1857, and two years later great iron-works were established. In ten years the shipments of iron ore increased from 60,000 to 450,000 tons. In 1867 docks covering 60 acres were opened, the quays being a mile and a half long, and new docks occupying 200 acres have been recently constructed. The town is well laid out, and public buildings, including a town-hall, under which is a large market, a hospital, schools and banks, have been erected. There are St. George's, built in 1859, and other churches of the establishment, and chapels for each of the leading denominations. In the great iron works nearly half a million tons of ore are annually converted into iron and Bessemer steel, rails for railways being extensively manufactured. At the works and the mines belonging to the company about 5,000 men are employed. The works of an iron ship-building company cover 50 acres, and 6,000 men are employed, and there are very large flax and jute works. Steamers run daily to Belfast, and there is a regular service to Glasgow and the Isle of Man. There is a large trade in grain, flour, and cattle. The town received a charter of incorporation in 1867. Pop. The census of 1871 gave the number of inhabitants at 17,992: but in 1881 the number had risen to more than 47,000, a rate of increase unparalleled in the United Kingdom.

BARROW, a considerable river of Ireland, which, rising in the Sieveblooom mountains, in Leinster, flows through Queen's County, King's County, Kildare, and Carlow, and, after a course of 100 miles, during which it receives the Nore, Blackwood, and Green rivers, forms, with the Suir, the estuary Waterford Haven. At Athy it is joined by a branch of the Grand Canal, leading to Dublin.

BARROW STRAITS, the passage leading to Baffin's Bay from the Arctic Ocean, 60 miles wide, and 200 to 300 miles long, with high and rocky coasts and deep water. There are numerous bays and inlets. The straits were discovered by Baffin, in 1616, and derive their name from Sir John Barrow, secretary of the Admiralty, who held that office when they were visited by Parry, in 1819.

BARRY, SPRANGER, bär'-e, a celebrated actor, who was bred a silversmith, which trade he abandoned for the theatre, and made his first appearance in the character of Othello in 1744. In 1747 he came to England, and was engaged at Drury Lane, which he soon quitted for Covent Garden, and proved a formidable rival to Garrick.

Born in Dublin, 1719; died in London, 1777.

BARRY, JAMES, a celebrated painter, who was intended to be a sailor, but exhibited such a dislike to a seafaring life that he was allowed to indulge his taste for art and literature. At the age of nineteen he painted an historical picture on the legend of the baptism of the king of Cashel, which was exhibited to the Dublin Society for the encouragement of arts. The picture was exhibited in London, and the genius exhibited in the treatment of this subject brought him under the notice of Burke, the distinguished statesman, who introduced him to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, and other eminent men. Burke enabled him to visit Italy, where he studied with ardour. Soon after his return, in 1771, he published "An Inquiry into the Real and Imaginary Obstructions to the Acquisition of the Arts in England," 8vo, a work of considerable merit. About this time he proposed to paint gratuitously for the Society of Arts a series of pictures, illustrative of the position, that the happiness of mankind is promoted in proportion to the progress of knowledge. His offer was accepted, but his labour was ill requited. These great works now adorn the institution in the Adelphi. He was subsequently elected royal academician, and in 1782 was appointed professor of painting to the Royal Academy, where his lectures were greatly admired. In 1799 he was removed from his office, and soon after expelled from that institution, on account of some severe allegations which he made against the Academy in outvoting him upon several of his propositions for the advancement of art. Mr. Barry was engaged some years in painting a large picture of Pandora, eighteen feet long and ten broad; but it was not finished at his death. A public subscription provided him with a small income during the progress of the work. It is, however, on his Victors of Olympia that his fame principally rests. It forms the third of the series painted for the Society of Arts. He died from an attack of pleuritic fever, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Born at Cork, 1741; died in London, 1806.

BARRY, MARTIN, a distinguished physiologist, who, having studied in the universities of Edinburgh, Paris, and Berlin, merits notice principally on account of his having devoted the greater portion of his time to the study of animal development and embryology. On these subjects he wrote a number of treatises, and in 1839 was the first to announce the important discovery "that the segmentation of the yolk, which had been observed in batrachian reptiles, was also true of mammals."

Born at Fratton, Hampshire, 1802; died at Beccles, in Suffolk, 1855.

BARRY, MARIE JEAN, Countess du, bar'-re, the favourite of Louis XV., was the daughter of an exciseman of the name of Vaubenier. After having passed some portion of her early life in a convent, we find her, at little more than the age of fifteen, engaged in a fashionable milliner's in Paris. Possessing a remarkably handsome person, which she set off by a vulgar familiarity of demeanour, she had already passed through several stages of vice, when she was presented to Louis XV. by Lebel, his own valet-de-chambre. In order that she might appear at court, that licentious monarch conferred upon her the title by which she is generally known. During the reign of Louis XV. her influence was all-powerful; but when he died, in 1774, she was shut up in a convent near Meaux. She was subsequently released by Louis XVI.; and the residence of Luciennes, which the preceding sovereign had built for her, was restored to her with a pension. After this she lived in retirement and all but forgotten, when the Revolution broke out. Appreciating the kindness with which she had been treated by Louis XVI., she now took the deepest interest in the misfortunes of him and his family. She left her retirement not only to mourn over, but to endeavour to repair, the broken fortunes of royalty. Regardless of danger, she visited England in 1793, that she might dispose of her jewels, and, with the proceeds, assist the queen of France and her children, who were then prisoners in the Temple. On her return, she was arrested; and, in the November of the same year, she was taken before the revolutionary tribunal of her country, and, on the charge of "being a conspirator, and of having worn mourning in London for the death of the tyrant," was condemned and executed in the same month.

Born at Vaucouleurs, 1746; suffered, 1793.

BARRY, Sir Charles, R.A., bar'-e, architect. He travelled in Greece, Italy, Egypt, and Palestine, and on his return, in 1820, settled in London to practise his profession. He built a Gothic church at Brighton, which attracted some attention, and several other churches, but his first great London work was the Travellers' Club-house, Pall-Mall, erected in 1831. Fifteen years later he built the Reform Club-house; and amongst other buildings of which he was the architect may be named King Edward's Grammar-school, Birmingham, the Athenæum, Manchester, and the Town-hall, Halifax, the new buildings at University College, Oxford, and Clifden House, near Maidenhead. His greatest undertaking was the New Palace, at Westminster, in the competition for which, after the destruction of the Houses of Parliament by fire, in 1834, he was successful. The first stone was laid in 1840, and the building completed in 1860. The architect was elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1840; was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society in 1849, and received many foreign distinctions. He was knighted in 1852. He is buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Westminster, 1795; died at Clapham, 1860.

BARRY, a county of Michigan, United States. The surface is undulating, with forests in some parts. Capital, Hastings. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 25,317.

BARRY, a county of Missouri, United States. The surface is hilly and the soil fertile. There are lead mines. Capital, Cassville. Pop. 14,405.

BARS, BARSCH, barsh, a province of Hungary. It is fertile in the produce of fruit and grain, and in its mountains yielding silver and gold. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 38,000.

BARS, or BARSCH, a fortified town of Hungary, capital of the above province, on the Gran, which divides it into two portions. A large trade is carried on in grain and fruit. Pop. 137,000.

BARSAC, bar'-sac, a French town, department of Gironde, on the Garonne. Pop. 3,000.

BARSINE, or BARSENE, bar-si'-ne, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander, by whom she had a son called Hercules. Cassander ordered her and her child to be put to death.

BARSOE, bar'-so-e, a small Danish island in the Little Belt, 10 miles from Apenrade.

BAR-SUR-AUBE, bar'-soor-obe, a French town in the department of Aube. It is seated on the river Aube, 18 miles from Joinville. There are several ancient churches, the most remarkable being Saint Maclou. Manf. Calicoes, table-covers, brandy, paper and nails. Pop. 4,400.

BAR-SUR-ORNAIN. (See Bar-le-Duc.)

BAR-SUR-SEINE, bar'-soor-sain, a town of France, in the department of the Aube, 18 miles from Troyes. In the middle ages it was a place of great importance. Manf. Wine and brandy, and it has a trade in wool and grain. Pop. 3,000.

BART, or BARTH, Jean, bart, a celebrated French naval hero, whose father was a poor fisherman. Bart early entered the Dutch navy, and served under Admiral De Ruyter, distinguishing himself, from time to time, by his courage and strength, in which he was superior to most of his shipmates. When, in 1672, war was declared by France against the Dutch, Bart quitted that service, and entered that of the French, when, after several private enterprises, in which he greatly distinguished himself, his name became known to Louis XIV., who sent him a gold medal and chain, with the rank of lieutenant in the royal navy. He now rapidly rose, and, in 1690, commanded a 40-gun ship in the Brest fleet under Admiral de Tourville, to whom he was of signal service in the action off Dieppe, in which the French were successful over the English and Dutch fleets. In the following year he landed on the coast of Scotland, and destroyed several villages. In 1692 he had the command of a squadron of frigates and a fire-ship, with which he destroyed 86 sail of English merchant-ships, landed near Newcastle, where he burnt 200 houses, and returned to Dunkirk with prizes valued at 500,000 crowns. In 1694 he was sent with a squadron of six ships to convoy a fleet laden with corn. This fleet had been captured, when Bart fell in with it, by a Dutch squadron of eight men-of-war; but, though he was much inferior in force, he retook the prizes and their captors and carried them to France. For this he obtained a patent of nobility to him and his descendants. The peace of Ryswick, in 1697, put an end to the war, after which he retired to live with his family. He is the popular hero of the French naval service.

Born at Dunkirk, 1655; died 1702.

BARTAN, bar'-tan, a town of Natolia, situate on the Black Sea, 50 miles from Eregli. A considerable shipping trade is carried on with Constantinople, but the harbour is greatly obstructed by a bar. Pop. 7,000.

BARTAS, Guillaume de Salluste du, bar'-ta, a French poet, who was the son of a treasurer of France, and who rose to be honoured so far as to be sent by Henry IV. on several embassies. He wrote a poem, entitled "The Week of the Creation," in seven books, translated into English by Sylvester. The reputation of this work was so great, that it passed through thirty editions in six years. It was translated into several languages; and yet, although so popular on its appearance, it has long ago fallen into contempt. He died of wounds received at the battle of Ivry.

Born at Montfort, 1544; died 1590.

BARTFELD, or BARTFA, bart'-feld, a town of Hungary, on the river Teffa, 156 miles N.E. of Pesth. There is a fine Gothic church, containing many artistic treasures. Manf. Linen, woollens, and paper; there is a trade in wine and corn. Pop. 5,300.

BARTH, Dr. Heinrich, bart, an enterprising African explorer, who, in early life, commenced the pursuit of travelling, with the view of advancing geographical discovery. In 1845 he left Marseilles, and followed the French and Spanish shores as far as Gibraltar, passed over to Tangier, in Africa, and proceeded to Algiers, making excursions to Tunis and other places in the interior. On his way to Cairo, he was wounded in an affray with the Arabs, and lost all his papers. He then explored Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor, and Greece; thus nearly making the circuit of the Mediterranean. These travels he published at his own expense. In 1849 he accompanied Dr. Overweg and Mr. Richardson in their travels through North and Central Africa, during which they traversed more than 12,000 miles. After an absence of five years, he returned, and published an account of his travels and a collection of African vocabularies. He afterwards visited Asia Minor and Turkey. In 1863 he was appointed professor of geography at the university of Berlin, and president of the Geographical Society.

Born at Hamburg, 1821; died at Berlin, 1865.

BARTH, a seaport-town in Prussian Pomerania, situate at the mouth of the Barth, 18 miles from Stralsund. It trades principally in wool and corn, and has some shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 5,000.

BARTHE, NICHOLAS THOMAS, bart, an ingenious French writer, the author of several dramatic pieces, and a translator of Ovid's "Art of Love" into French verse.

Born at Marseilles, 1737; died at Paris, 1785.

BARTHELEMY, AUGUSTE MARSEILLE, bar-tal'-le-me, a French satirical poet, who at first gained the favour of the court of Charles X., but afterwards joined the opposition, and wrote various clever political satires. In 1829 he was fined and imprisoned, but was liberated at the revolution of 1830, which he celebrated in a poem, "L'Insurrection." In 1832 he again changed his politics, supported the government, and received a handsome pension.

Born at Marseilles, 1796; died 1867.

BARTHELEMY, JEAN JACQUES, a learned French writer, who received his education first in the college of the Oratory at Marseilles, afterwards at that of the Jesuits. Having entered the church, he visited Paris in 1744, and was nominated associate in the care of the cabinet of medals, and afterwards became secretary to the Academy of Inscriptions, and obtained the appointment of keeper of the cabinet of medals. In 1755 he visited Italy, and spent some time at Naples, then rendered interesting to an antiquary by the discovery of the treasures of Herculaneum. In 1759 the duke de Choiseul gave him a pension, to which he subsequently added the treasurership of St. Martin de Tours and the place of secretary-general to the Swiss Guards. In 1788 he published his great work, entitled, "The Voyage of the Younger Anacharsis in Greece," upon which he had been employed thirty years. In 1789 he was chosen a member of the French Academy; and when he was nearly eighty years of age, he was arrested during the reign of terror, as an aristocrat. He was, however, released by Danton the next day, the Jacobins being themselves ashamed of the atrocity of such an act. The abbé was a member of the most distinguished foreign societies, as well as of those in his own country. He united with his profound learning, modesty, simplicity, and good-nature. Besides his Anacharsis, he wrote a number of papers, chiefly on medallic subjects, in the collection of the Academy of Inscriptions, and in the "Journal des Savans."

Born at Cassis, in the south of France, 1716; died at Paris, 1795.

BARTHELEMY-SAINT-HILAIRE, JULES, a learned French writer and member of the Institute. During the Restoration, and until 1838, he was attached to the ministry of finance; meanwhile, however, he was a constant contributor to the Globe, and on July 28th, 1830, he attached his signature to the protestation of the journalists. After the revolution he, in conjunction with Victor Rodd and M. Canchois-Lemaire, started le Bon Sens, and in the Liberal interest took an active part in politics; but the love of philosophical pursuits withdrew him to a great extent from political life. A devoted disciple of Aristotle, he undertook, in 1832, to give a complete translation of his works, having previously rendered himself master of the Sanscrit language, in order that he might apply himself to the sources of philosophy. In 1838 he was appointed to the chair of Greek and Latin philosophy in the College of France, and was also admitted into the Academy of the Moral and Political Sciences. Drawn by the February revolution once more from his studies, he became a member of the Constituent Assembly and one of the chiefs of the republican tiers-parti. He favoured the candidature of Louis Napoleon, and supported the administration of M. Odilon Barrot, but, disgusted with the coup d'état of 2nd December, he refused to take the oath, and resigned his chair in the College of France, but was reappointed in 1862. He joined the commission despatched to Egypt to ascertain the means of cutting the canal through the isthmus of Suez, and gave the result of his visit in Les Débats. In 1862, and again in 1871, he was returned to the Corps Legislatif. Besides his directly philosophical works, he has written an elaborate history of Buddhism.

Born at Paris, 1805.

BARTHELEMY, ST., a name common to several small parishes, towns, and villages of France.

BARTHEZ, PAUL JOSEPH, bar'-tais, eminent French physician, who held several important public appointments, and was consulting physician to the Emperor Napoleon. His great work on the vital principle of man has a high reputation.

Born at Montpellier, 1734; died at Paris, 1806.

BARTHOLINUS, GASPARD, bar-to-le'-nus, a Danish scholar, remarkable for his precocity. He visited the chief universities of Europe, and in 1613 was chosen professor of medicine in the Copenhagen University. In the course of a dangerous illness, he made a vow that if he recovered he would devote himself to the study of divinity, and on his restoration to health observed his vow, and soon afterwards was appointed professor of divinity, and received a canonry. He was the author of about 50 works on different subjects.

Born at Malmoë, Sweden, 1585; died 1630.

BARTHOLINUS, THOMAS, son of the above, a celebrated physician at Copenhagen, who took his doctor's degree at Bâle, in 1645. In 1647 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in the following year obtained the anatomical chair. Whilst he held this office, he published many valuable medical and anatomical works, the most celebrated treating of the discovery of the lymphatic vessels, to which he laid claim; but this is contested in favour of Rudbeck, a Swedish anatomist. In 1661, owing to delicate health, he resigned his professorship, and retired to the country; but, in 1670, a fire destroying his house, with his library and manuscripts, he returned to Copenhagen, when the king appointed him his physician, and afterwards, in 1675, member of the Grand Council of Denmark. He also held the appointment of librarian to the university.

Born at Copenhagen, 1619; died 1680.

BARTHOLOMEW, bar-thol'-o-mu, "son of Tolmai," one of the apostles, supposed to be identical with Nathanael, who was associated with Philip. He is said to have preached the Gospel in Arabia and Armenia, and to have suffered martyrdom by being flayed alive and then crucified, with his head downwards.

BARTHOLOMEW, ST., one of the Caribbee islands, in the W. Indies, lying 30 miles W. of St. Christopher. Area, about 35 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing sugar, cotton, cocoa, and tobacco. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 17° 53′ N. Lon. 62° 52′ W. This is the only colony which Sweden has in America, having been ceded in 1784 by France to that country, who liberated the slaves there in 1847.

Born at Providence, Rhode Island, 1805.

BARTOLI, DANIELE, an Italian, who, at the age of fifteen, entered the order of Jesuits, and, in 1650, was sent for to Rome by the father-general, and commissioned to write the history of that order in the Italian language. He arranged his subject according to the several missions which the order had established; and his most interesting volumes are those treating of the first success of the Jesuits on the Malabar and Coromandel coasts, and the rapid diffusion of Christianity in Japan, from the landing of Francis Xavier, in 1549, till its total eradication in 1637, when Japan was closed against all Europeans except the Dutch, and the missions to Cochin-China and Tonquin. He also wrote various works on morality, physical phenomena, and language, and was apppointed rector of the Gregorian or Roman college, in 1671.

Born at Ferrara, 1608; died at Rome, 1685.

BARTOLI, PIETRO SANTO, an Italian painter and engraver. He was a pupil of Nicolas Poussin. His original pictures are few, as he chiefly copied from others; but he is celebrated for his engravings, which are very beautiful and highly finished. He was appointed antiquary to the pope and Christina, queen of Sweden.

Born at Perugia, 1635; died at Rome, 1700.

BARTOLINI, LORENZO, bar-to-lē'-ne, an Italian sculptor, son of poor parents. He studied hard, and having acquired great skill as a modeller, went to Paris, where he gained the patronage of the emperor Napoleon, who sent him to Carrara, and formed a school of sculpture. After the fall of Napoleon, he went to Florence, where he remained until his death. He is considered to stand next to Thorwaldsen and Canova.

Born at Vernio, in Tuscany, 1777; died at Florence, 1850.

BARTOLO, TADDEO DI, an early Italian painter, distinguished for grace and refinement of treatment.

BARTOLOMEO, ANDREAS DE, bar'-to-lo'-mē'-o, an eminent Italian jurist, who studied at Bologna, and took his doctor's degree in 1439. He afterwards became professor of canon law at the university of Ferrara, which post he relinquished for the chair of civil law at Bologna, of which place he was created a citizen in 1442. He is supposed to have been present at the council of Bâle, in 1431, and distinguished himself by advocating the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. He was appointed, in 1466, by John, king of Aragon, his counseller, and was also knighted. His nativity is uncertain, both Messina and Noto having been named as the place.

Born 1400; died 1479.

BARTOLOMEO, LEONARDO DI, a native of Palermo, one of the most celebrared politicians of Sicily in the 15th century. In 1431 he gained great popularity among his countrymen for having obtained most important privileges for the city of Palermo from King Alfonso the Magnificent. He had a great part of the supreme government in 1436, when the viceroy went to Gaeta; and he conferred a great benefit on the state, by obtaining for it the statute called Ritus Magnæ Regiæ Curiæ et totius Regni Siciliæ Curiarum, a regular code of legal procedure known under the title of Rito del Re Alfonso. He was killed at Palermo, in a popular tumult regarding the administration of public alms, it is said by command of King Alfonso, to whom his popularity had become offensive. The murderer (Tommaso Crispo) was never punished.

Died 1450.

BARTOLOMEO, DIONISIO DI, a Neapolitan architect, who built in the years 1586 to 1597, the church and convent of the PP. Oratorii at Naples, a celebrated architectural work.

BARTOLOZZI, FRANCESCO, bar-to-lot-se' an eminent engraver, was the son of a silversmith of Florence, and commenced engraving under Joseph Wagner, of Venice. When he had completed his engagement, he married a Venetian lady, and removed to Rome, whither Cardinal Bottari had invited him, and here he established his reputation by his plates from the "Life of St. Nilus," and his portraits for a new edition of Vasari. He shortly, however, returned to Venice, where he was engaged by Mr. Dalton, librarian to George III., to engrave a set of plates after Guercino, and, in 1764, was invited by him to England, on a stipend of £300 per annum. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy in 1769; and, for thirty years after, was incessantly occupied in his profession, especially in the new mode of stippling in imitation of chalk. His most numerous engravings are from the pictures of Angelica Kauffman and his fellow-pupil at the Florentine academy, Cipriani, who had also settled in England, and with whom he had ever continued a close intimacy. In 1802 he accepted an invitation from the prince regent of Portugal to superintend a school of engraving at Lisbon.

Born at Florence, 1725; died at Lisbon, 1816.

BARTOLUS, DE SAXO FERRATI, bar-to'-lus, Italian jurist, who, in 1343, became professor of civil law at Perugia. He gained great reputation for his method of teaching, and there is, in the church of San Francisco a fine monument to his memory, with the quaint inscription "Ossa Bartoli," "the bones of Bartolus."

Born at Sasso Ferrato, Urbino, 1314; died at Perugia, 1357.

BARTON, BENJAMIN SMITH, bar-ton, an American physician, who was the first professor of botany and natural history in the United States. Having studied in Europe, he was appointed to the professorship in Philadelphia College, in 1789. In 1802 he was chosen president of the American Philosophical Society. He was the author of various works on natural history and medicine.

Born in Pennsylvania, 1776; died 1815.

BARTON, BERNARD, an English poet. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and clerk at a bank at Woodbridge, Suffolk. His poems are tender in sentiment and elegant in style. In his late years he had a pension from Government of £100.

Born in London, 1784; died 1849.

BARTON, ELIZABETH, commonly called "the Holy Maid of Kent," first became known in 1525, when a servant at an inn at Aldington, in Kent, for her apparent sanctity and miraculous endowments. She was probably epileptic. About 1534, during the negotiations for Henry VIII.'s divorce from Catherine of Aragon, she, under the influence of a trance, spoke words which were taken by those about her for the effect of inspiration, and a priest, named Richard Masters, conveyed an account of her proceedings to Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, who encouraged him to note carefully all she should say. Masters, in conjunction with Dr. Bocking, a monk of Canterbury, took her under his direction, and put into her mouth pretended revelations against the doctrines of the Reformation and the king's divorce. Among other things, she predicted that, should the king proceed with the divorce, "he should not be a king a month longer, and, in the reputation of Almighty God, not one hour longer, but should die a villain's death." This denunciation was followed by others still more menacing, spoken by the favourers of Queen Catherine, and at length moved the king to harsh measures. The Maid of Kent, with her principal accomplices, was cast into prison, and a most wretched series of impostures was elicited. The parliament adjudged the offence one of treason; and she, with five priests, was executed at Tyburn.

Died 1534.

BARTON-ON-HUMBER, a market-town in Lincolnshire, on the south side of the Humber, St. Peter's church, built in the 11th century, is one of the best existing examples of Anglo-Saxon architecture; it was restored in 1859. St. Mary's church, a fine building, dates from the 14th century Manf. Cordage, bricks, tiles, and whiting. Pop. 5,339.—A station on the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshrie Railway.

BASEVI, GEORGE, ba-se'-ve, English architect, who designed Belgrave-square, and numerous churches. Among his best works are St. Mary's Hall, Brighton, and the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge. He was accidentally killed while engaged in the restoration of Ely Cathedral by falling a distance of 40 feet through an aperture.

Born at Brighton, 1795; died 1845.

BASCHI, MATTHEW, bas'-ke, founder of the Capuchin Friars, was admitted at an early age into the order of St. Francis at Montefalconi, when, shocked at the abuses which had crept into this order, he set himself to restore the primitive discipline in all its original severity. For this purpose he gave out that St. Francis had appeared to him, clothed in a particular habit, which was surmounted by a hood, terminating in a peak called capucoio, and hence the designation of "Capuchins." Assuming this dress, he repaired to Rome, and obtained from Pope Clement VIII. permission to adopt the habit, and to observe literally the rule of St. Francis. This reform raised him many enemies, especially among those monks he had left, who succeeded in getting him sent to prison, from which he was liberated by the interest of the duchess of Camerino, niece of Clement, and in 1529 was appointed vicar-general of the order. Two years after he resigned the appointment, and went about preaching for nearly twenty years.

Born about the end of the 15th century; died at Venice, 1552.

BASEDOW, JOHANN BERNHARD, bas'-e-dou, a German writer and philosopher (frequently styled Bernhard von Nordalbingen), who made great efforts to reform education, and entered with zeal into the disputes concerning the truths of Christianity, he avowing himself a sceptic, but subsequently professed to accept the Christian faith, although the doctrines he then avowed were not considered orthodox. In 1774, under the patronage of Prince Francis of Anhalt-Dessau, he established the "Philanthropinum," a school which became the model of many others which afterwards arose, and produced a number of excellent teachers. At Magdeburg he also busied himself with the reform of the system of instruction, and with some success. The principal of his works are "Philalethia; or, New Views into the Truths of Religion and Reason;" and an elementary work of education, illustrated by 100 engravings, the text of which was printed in German, French, and Latin. This latter was an enlargement of the educational plan of J. J. Rousseau and Comenius.

Born at Hamburg, 1723; died at Magdeburg, 1790.

BASEILHAC, JOHN, ba'-sail-hak, a celebrated French surgeon, who studied under his uncle at Lyons, after which he was admitted a student at the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris. Attracted by his talents, the archbishop of Bayeux appointed him his surgeon in ordinary, and built an hospital, which he confided to his care. In 1728 the archbishop died, leaving Baseilhac a collection of surgical instruments, and a sufficient sum of money to enable him to be received as a master in surgery. He was, however, so grieved at the loss of his patron, that he repaired to Paris, and was admitted, in 1729, by the Feuillars, or Begging Friars, under the name of Frère Jean de St. Côme, continuing still to follow the exercise of his profession, and soon became celebrated in Paris. He took no recompense from the poor, and devoted the sums received from the rich to the support of an hospital near the Rue St. Honoré, which he established in 1753. Simple in his habits, sober in life, generous to the poor, and truly religious, Baseilhac ranks amongst the most celebrated men of his time.

Born at Poyestruc, near Tarbes, 1703; died at Paris, 1781.

BASELE, bai-sale', a town of Belgium, province of East Flanders, on the Scheldt. There is a handsome church, in which are some good pictures, and an old Gothic castle is in the vicinity. Manf. Bricks and sabots, or wooden shoes. Pop. 5,000.

BASHAN, bai'-shan, "in the teeth," or "in slumbering," a rich district of country east of the Jordan. (See SYRIA and PALESTINE.)

BASHEE, or BASHI ISLANDS, bash'-e, a group of the Philippines, between Luzon and Formosa. Lat. between 20° and 21° N. Lon. 122° E. —In 1687, these islands were discovered by Dampier, and a Spanish colony was founded upon them in 1783.

BASHKIN, MATTEI SEMENOF, bash'-kin, the leader of an heretical sect at Moscow, which not only opposed the ordinances and ceremonies of the Greek church, but also the divinity of Christ. He was imprisoned by Ivan the Terrible, but recanted and gave up the names of his followers among the clergy and religious orders.

Lived about the middle of the 16th century.

BASIDOH, or BASSADORE, bas'-a-dor, a village in the island of Kisham, in the Persian Gulf, in which it is used as the principal station for British ships. Lat. 26° 39′ N. Lon. 55° 22′ E.

BASIL, bas-il, a physician, the founder of a sect who asserted that God had another son besides Jesus Christ, called Sathanael, who, having revolted against his father, was, with his companions, cast down from heaven to earth; and that Jesus Christ being sent to destroy his power, shut him up in hell, and altered his name by cutting off the last syllable. His followers were allowed to have everything, even their wives, in common. By order of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, he was burnt alive.

Died 1118.

BASIL, first bishop of Ancyra, was ordained to that office by the bishops of the Eusebians, in place of Marcellus, but was himself excommunicated, and his ordination annulled in the council of Sardica, in 347, though he still retained the see. In 351 he attended the second council of Sirmium, where he disputed successfully against Photinus. He was one of the greatest enemies to the Arians, but considered the head of the Semi-Arians; and procured their opinions to be established by a council held at Ancyra in 358. None of his writings are extant. He was deposed in 360.

Died 362.

BASIL, ST., surnamed THE GREAT, bishop of Cæsarea, was ordained by Eusebius, whom he succeeded in 370. He was persecuted by the emperor Valens, because he would not embrace Arianism. He was a famous preacher, and author of a work on the Holy Spirit and many homilies founded on the Psalms and Isaiah. He is said to have introduced the monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

Died 379.

BASIL, archbishop of Thessalonica, generally known as Ascholius or Acholius. He baptized Theodosius on the occasion of a fit of illness, and was the beloved friend of St. Ambrose.

Died 384.

BASIL. (See BALE.)

BASILAN, or BASEELAN, ba-se'-lan, an island of the Soloo Archipelago, 42 miles long, and 6 in breadth. It is mountainous in the centre and there are dense forests. Pro. Rice, sugar-cane, and bananas. Lat. 6° 41′ N. Lon. 122° 17′ E.

BASILICATA, or POTENZA, bas'-il-e-ka'-ta, a territory of Naples, bounded on the N. by the provinces Principato Ulterio and Capitanata, N.E. by Terra di Bari, E. by Otranto and the Gulf of Taranto, S. by Calabria Citra and the Mediterranean, and W. by Principato Citra. It is mountainous in general, and watered by several streams and rivers, the chief of which are the Bradano, Basento, Salandrella, Agra, and Sinno, all falling into the Gulf of Taranto. The soil in the valley is fertile. Pro. Corn, maize, hemp, flax, liquorice, and tobacco; silk-worms are extensively reared. On the slopes of the mountains olives are planted, and the pasturage is excellent. Vast numbers of sheep, goats, and swine are bred. Area, 4,120 square miles. Pop. 509,000. Chief Towns. POTENZA, Melfi, Francavilla Rionero, and Tursi. Lat. between 39° 56′ and 41° 8′ N. Lon. between 15° 22′ and 16° 49′ E.

BASILIDES, ba-sil'-i-dees, Gnostic philosopher, whose peculiar and mystical doctrines have been expounded by Irenæus and Hypolitus, who, however, differ considerably as to what he really taught. He is said to have studied at Alexandria, but little is known respecting his life.

Lived in the 2nd century.

BASILISCUS, bas-i-lis'-kus, emperor of the East, was brother to Verina, wife of the emperor Leo I., by whose means he was appointed to the command of a fleet sent against Genseric, king of the Vandals, who had conquered Africa; the greater part, however, of his fleet and army perished, and he fell into disgrace. At the death of Leo, he conspired against his successor Zeno, and succeeded in placing himself on the throne in 475; but subsequently Zeno defeated him and entered Constantinople, putting Basiliscus into confinement, where he died.

Died 477.

BASILIUS I., or BASIL, ba-sil'-e-us, surnamed the MACEDONIAN, rose to be emperor of the East, though originally a common soldier. His conduct recommended him to the emperor Michael III., who made him his equerry and chamberlain. He accused Bardas of conspiring against the emperor, and afterwards assassinated him in the emperor's tent, and was made by Michael his colleague in the empire, in 866. Basilius remonstrating with the emperor for his cruelty, Michael attempted to depose him; but he anticipated his design, and one evening, when he retired intoxicated, murdered him in his bed, 867. His conduct on the throne was wise and equitable. He reformed the abuses in the state, defeated the Saracens in Asia, and carried the arms of the empire beyond the Euphrates in 872. He entered into a treaty with the Russians of Kiew, and sent them an archbishop; from which time the Russians acknowledged the authority of the Greek Church. He was killed by an accident while hunting.

Born at Adrianople, 813; died 886.

BASILIUS II., succeeded John Zimisces in 976. He was the son of Romanus the younger, and was associated in the government with his brother Constantine. He turned his arms against the Bulgarians, over whom he obtained a great victory in 1014; but treated his prisoners with horrid barbarity, dividing them into hundreds, and then putting out the eyes of ninety-nine, left the hundredth with one eye for a leader. In this condition they were sent to their king, Samuel, who was so horrified that he died two days after. He reigned 50 years.

Born 958; died 1025.

BASILOWITZ, JOHN, emperor of Russia. (See IVAN.)

BASILUZZO, ba'-se-loot'-so, anciently Insula Herculis, one of the Lipari islands, in Italy. It is uninhabited.

BASIN, bas'-sin, a geographical term applied to a collection of water, as a river, a sea, or a lake, and, in every instance, comprehending the countries which are drained by the waters that run into these.

BASING, JOHN, an English scholar, a native of Basingstoke, who travelled in Greece, and brought to this country many valuable Greek manuscripts. He was archdeacon of Leicester. He wrote several works in Latin.

Died 1252.

BASINGSTOKE, bas'-zing-stoke, a market-town and borough of Hampshire, 45 miles from London. The parish church, St. Michael's, is a large building, erected in the 16th century. There is a town-hall, containing assembly-rooms; and a large corn exchange was opened in 1865. Basing House, famous for its defence against the Parliamentary forces in 1645, is two miles distant. A good trade is done in corn and malt. Pop. 6,681. A station on the South-Western Railway.

BASKERVILLE, JOHN, bas'-ker-vil, a celebrated printer, who, in 1726, kept a writing-school in Birmingham. He subsequently engaged in the japanning business, and became possessed of considerable property. In 1750 he turned printer and type-founder, in which he was most successful. His works now possess a high value, especially his editions of some of the classics, which are greatly esteemed both in this country and on the continent.

Born at Wolverley, Worcestershire, 1706; died at Birmingham, 1775.

BASNAGE, JACQUES, bas'-naj, theologian, historian, and diplomatist, son of an advocate in Normandy, and remarkable at an early age for his knowledge of languages. Studied theology at Geneva, and became a pastor at Rouen till the suppression of the Protestant religion in that town, when he settled at Rotterdam. In 1790 he was elected one of the pastors of the Walloon congregation at the Hague, and was afterwards engaged in political negotiations. Voltaire said of him, that he was fitter to be a minister of state than minister of a parish. He wrote a history of the Reformed Churches, a work on Jewish antiquities, and other works.

Born at Rouen, 1653; died 1723.

BASQUE PROVINCES, bask (Span. VASCONGADAS PROVINCIAS), a territory in the north of Spain, divided into three provinces,—BISCAY, GUIPUSCOA, and ALAVA, identical with the ancient district of Guipuscoa. The country is mountainous and picturesque, the hills being generally covered to their summits with beeches, oaks, chestnuts, and other trees. The pastures are rich, and agriculture is well understood.

Area, 2,958 square miles.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, pulse, flax, and numerous flocks are reared.

Minerals.—Iron, tin, and copper; marble, jasper, and porphyry.

Towns.—The principal are BILBAO, SAN SEBASTIAN, and VITTORIA.

No longer officially recognized.

History.—The Basques are a brave and primitive race, much attached to music and dancing, and eminently fitted for that kind of guerilla warfare by which they have so long preserved their independence. Humboldt thinks them the descendants of the ancient Iberi; and they are supposed to have, at different periods, held the whole of Spain under their sway. The language which they speak has no analogy with any other living tongue, and is supposed to have been, in remote ages, in use over the whole of the Spanish peninsula. It is spoken in some of the southern parts of France, and the native name is Eskuara.

BASQUE, MICHAEL LE, bask, a famous buccaneer, who, in connection with L'Olonnais, took, about 1660, the towns of Maracaibo and Gibraltar, in the Gulf of Venezuela; the plunder amounting to upwards of 400,000 crowns.

Lived in the 17th century.

BASS, GEORGE, bās, the discoverer of Bass's Strait, between Australia and Tasmania, was a surgeon on board H.M.S. Reliance. With Captain Flinders in a small boat, called the Tom Thumb, with only one boy, Bass doubled the heads of Botany Bay, and explored George's River, and afterwards Port Hacking River. In 1797, being furnished with greater resources, he made further explorations, and in 1798 he determined the existence of the strait which now goes by his name. He died, it is said, somewhere in S. America, and received, for his discoveries, carried out with so few advantages, neither distinction nor reward.

Died about 1799.

BASS ROCK, a small island, consisting of a rock 350 feet high and a mile in circumference, at the mouth of the Firth of Forth, in Scotland, about a mile from the south shore of E. Lothian, much frequented by sea fowls during the breeding season. Lat. 56° 4′ N. Lon. 20° 37′ W.—Several of the most eminent of the Covenanting leaders were imprisoned on the rock. After the Revolution a desperate crew got possession of it; and, having a boat, which they hoisted up on the rock or let down at pleasure, took a great many coasting vessels, and held out the longest of any place in Britain for King James II.; but their boat being either seized or lost, and for want of the usual supplies from France, they were obliged to surrender.

BASS'S STRAIT, a strait between Australia and Van Diemen's Land, or Tasmania, about 180 miles long from east to west, and 140 miles wide from north to south. It was explored by Bass, a surgeon in the British navy, in 1798. (See above.)

BASSAHIR, ba-sa'-her, a Rajpoot state of British India, bounded on the N. by the Spiti Valley, on the E. by Chinese Tartary, on the S. by Garhwal, and on the W. by several hill states. It has an average elevation above the sea level of about 5,000 feet. The Pabur and the Sutlej are the principal rivers. Wheat, opium, and Indian corn are grown. Manf. Woollen cloths, shawls, and blankets. Pop. 90,000.

BASSAM, bas'-sam, a town on the west coast of Africa, near the mouth of a river of the same name. A considerable quantity of gold is exported. Lat. 5° 20′ N. Lon. 5° 30′ W.

BASSANI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, bas-sa'-ne, a musical composer of the 17th century, and master of the famous Corelli. His compositions, consisting of six operas, and thirty-one other pieces, range from 1680 to 1703, and are characterized as pure and pathetic.

Born at Padua, about 1657.

BASSANO, GIACOMO DA PONTE, bas-sa'-no, an Italian painter, who excelled in landscape, but painted at least one very famous altar-piece, and whose works are held in high estimation. Three of his sons were eminent artists.

Her singular attainments procured her, when twenty-one years of age, the title of doctor of philosophy. In 1745 she read lectures upon experimental philosophy, and continued to do so till her death. In 1738 she married Dr. Verati, and had twelve sons, whom she educated herself. She preserved an excellent character by the practice of every virtue.
Born at Bologna, 1711; died 1778.

BASSIANUS, JOANNES, bas-si-a'-nus, Italian jurist, professor of the law school of Bologna, author of a celebrated work the "Arbor Arborum," in which the various kinds of legal actions to be maintained are arranged like fruit on a tree. He delivered lectures on the Pandects and Codes.
Lived in the 12th century.

BASSOMPIERRE, FRANÇOIS DE, bas'-som-pé'-air, a marshal of France, celebrated for his gallantry, wit, and courage, during the reigns of Henry, IV. and Louis XIII. In 1622 he was made marshal of France, and sent as ambassador to Spain; and in 1625 was ambassador, first in Switzerland, and then in England. He was afterwards present at the siege of Rochelle, which surrendered Oct. 28, 1828. Taking part with the aristocracy against Cardinal Richelieu, he incurred that minister's displeasure, and was imprisoned in the Bastile twelve years. It is stated that when arrested he destroyed 6,000 love-letters. While in prison he wrote his memoirs, which are full of anecdotes of his time, and a narrative of his embassy.
Born in Lorraine, 1579; died 1646.

BASSORA, BUSSORAH, or BASRAH, bas'-o-ra, a town in the pashalic of Bagdad, situate on the western bank of the Shat-el-Arab, about 70 miles from the mouth of that river, which is formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. The walls, which are washed by the river, are at least 7 miles in circumference, within which space are extensive date-tree plantations and cornfields. They are entered by five gates, and surrounded by a broad and deep ditch. The city is indifferently built, the houses being mostly constructed of sun-dried clay, faced with burnt bricks; the streets are irregular, and, notwithstanding that they are intersected by numerous canals, are kept in a very filthy state. The English factory is esteemed the finest building in the city, although there is a governor's residence being built, and several mosques. Bassora being the great emporium of the Turkish empire for eastern produce, there is an extensive trade carried on chiefly by caravans.

Imp.—Silk, muslin, linen, white and blue cloth for the clothing of the Arabians, gold and silver stuffs, various metals, sandal-wood, and indigo; pearls from Bahrein, and coffee from Mocha; shawls, fruit, and the precious metals, from Persia; spices from Java; and European commodities from different ports.
Exp.—The precious metals, copper, dates, gall-nuts, raw silk, gold fringe, and horses to Bombay. Trade is conducted by means of caravans to Aleppo and Bagdad.
Pop., chiefly Arabs and Persians, about 60,000.
Lat. 30° 30′ N. Lon. 47° 34′ E.
History.—Bassora was founded in the year 636 by the caliph Omar, and was in 1668 taken by the Turks; by the Persians in 1777, and evacuated in 1778, when the Turks again took possession of it. They were once more, in 1787, expelled by the Arabs, but afterwards they recaptured the city.

BASTA, GEORGE, bas'-ta, a soldier and military writer of the 16th century, served under the Duke of Parma, and distinguished himself in 1596, by provisioning the town of La Fère, which was besieged by Henry IV. Afterwards he was engaged by the emperor, to whom he rendered signal services in Hungary and Transylvania, and was made a count. He wrote two works on military discipline.
Born at Rocca; died 1607.

BASTAR, bas-tar', a feudatory state in the central provinces of British India. The eastern part is an elevated plateau nearly 2,000 feet high; the centre and north-west are mountainous; the south part is undulating, and covered with dense forests. The climate is unhealthy. Rice and sugar are the chief agricultural products. Area, 13,000 square miles. Pop. 196,218, of whom about 29,000 are Hindoos; nearly all the remainder aboriginal tribes, in a very uncivilized condition, inhabiting the forests and jungles.

BASTI, bas'-te, a district of British India, in the Benares division, to the south of Nepaul. It is chiefly a marshy plain, traversed by several rivers. Rice and millet are the chief products. Area, 2,787 square miles. Pop. 1,613,612.

BASTIA, bas'-te-a, a fortified town, and the former capital of the island of Corsica, built on a hill, in the form of an amphitheatre, 70 miles from Ajaccio. It is defended by a citadel, and has a harbour. It is the seat of tribunals of commerce and primary jurisdiction, and there are several large and handsome churches, a college, museum, and other public buildings. Manf. Liqueurs, wax, and soap, and it has a trade in wine, oil, figs, pulse, and skins, in all of which the surrounding country is very productive. Pop. 21,500. Lat. 42° 41′ N. Lon. 9° 27′ E.—In 1383, a Genoese castle was built here, and it was for a long period the principal stronghold in the north of the island. It was taken by the English in 1745, and again in 1794.

BASTIAT, FREDERICK, bas'-te-a, a distinguished French economist and advocate of free trade. He was the son of a merchant of Bayonne, and was educated at St. Sever and Soreze. He subsequently embraced commerce as an occupation, visited England about 1845, adopted the doctrines of the free trade party, and published several works on economic subjects, the most important of which are his "Economic Sophisms," "Property and Law," "Protectionism and Communism," "Capital and Rent," "Harmonies of Economics," &c. He was a member of the Legislative Assembly after the revolution of 1848, and spoke and wrote earnestly exposing the errors of Socialism.
Born at Bayonne, 1801; died at Rome, 1850.

BATANGAS, ba-tan'-gas, a seaport of Luzon, one of the Philippine Islands, 50 miles S. of Manilla. It is well built and finely situated on an extensive bay, opening into the Strait of Mindoro. Considerable trade is carried on. Pop. of town and district, 17,100. Lat. 13° 45′ N. Lon. 121° 5′ E.

BATAVIA, bat-ai'-ve-a, the capital not only of the island of Java, but of all the Dutch possessions in the East, is at the head of a bay studded with islands, nearly at the N.E. end of Java. It stands on a marshy flat, and is cut into two sections by the Tjiliwong, or Great River, whence, in various directions, diverge several canals. The old town being extremely unhealthy, the Europeans chiefly reside in the new or suburban parts, which run for several miles over the high grounds into the country; and as each house stands apart and alone from its neighbour, and is encompassed by cocoa, banana, and other tropical trees, its inhabitants enjoy all that delightful coolness and freshness of atmosphere which belong to the shadiness of groves. In the new town, in the district of Rijswijk (rice-town), are the residence of the governor-general; and the chamber of the council of the East Indies, the new palace, barracks, artillery school, hospitals, and citadel are also in the new town. There are several large educational establishments, and scientific and industrial associations. There is a government naval establishment, with a large iron floating dock, at Onrust, six miles from the town. Tramways and a railway have been constructed. As Batavia is the commercial emporium of the Asiatic archipelago, its trade is extensive.

Exp.—The principal are sugar, coffee, rice, sago, pepper, tobacco, mace, spice, and arrack. Of the three articles most in demand for European consumption, coffee, pepper, and sugar, the two former are entirely monopolized by the Dutch government.

Imp.—Cotton and linen goods, woollen stuffs, wines, provisions, and metallic wares, and all kinds of American and European manufactures. It receives spices from the Moluccas, diamonds and gold-dust from Borneo, tea, nankin, mother-of-pearl, paper, and tobacco, from China, and opium, drugs, patna, &c., from Bengal.

Pop. 135,000.

Lat. 6° 8′ S. Lon. 106° 50′ E.

History.—In 1619, Batavia received from the Dutch its present name, and by 1723 it had risen to be a considerable town. In 1811 it was captured by the British, but was, by the treaty of 1815, restored to its former possessors.

BATE ISLE, an island off the N.W. coast of Hindostan, at the entrance to the Gulf of Cutch. There is a good harbour. Pop. 7,000.

BATE, GEORGE, bait, a writer and doctor, who became principal physician to Charles I. at Oxford. During the civil war he resided in London, where he was highly esteemed, and in 1651 attended Cromwell. At the restoration he was made physician to the king, and elected a fellow of the Royal Society. Dr. Bate wrote a history of the civil wars in Latin, and some tracts on physical subjects.

Born at Maids Morton, Buckinghamshire, 1608; died in London, 1668.

BATEMAN, WILLIAM, bait'-man, bishop of Norwich, and a great master of civil and canon law. He founded Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1347, and was employed by Edward III. in many embassies in his long contention for the crown of France.

Born at Norwich; died at Avignon, 1355.

BATES, WILLIAM, baits, an English nonconformist divine, who was one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference, for revising the liturgy, and was offered the deanery of Lichfield, which he refused. He became minister of St. Dunstan's in the West, but was deprived for nonconformity. His theological works were collected and published in one volume folio, after his death. He published the "Lives of Learned and Pious Men," in one volume 4to, 1681, Latin.—Bates is considered the politest writer, if not the best scholar, of the whole body of ministers who, in 1622, on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, seceded from the church, and formed what is called the Dissenting interest.

Born 1635; died at Hackney, 1690.

BATH, bath, a city of Somersetshire, picturesquely situate chiefly on the right bank of the river Avon, which is crossed by the Pulteney, North Parade, Cleveland, Grosvenor suspension and other bridges. The town was long famous as a fashionable resort for pleasure, and the benefit of the mineral waters. 107 miles from London. It is well and regularly built of freestone, having many beautiful edifices, and presenting a fine appearance, rising like an amphitheatre from the river valley. Its principal buildings are the abbey church, a fine cruciform structure, built at the latter end of the 15th century, and recently restored by Sir Gilbert Scott, the Roman Catholic Church of St. John the Evangelist, with a tower and spire 200 feet high, more than 30 other churches or chapels, and many places of worship for nonconformists. The buildings connected with the springs are six in number and very handsome. The assembly-rooms, opened in 1771, are handsome and commodious; the literary and scientific institution is a very fine building; and there are a handsome guildhall and market-halls, various hospitals, a fine theatre, the Sydney Gardens, and the Victoria Park, opened by the Princess Victoria in 1830. The temperature of the different springs varies from 117 to 120 degrees of Fahrenheit. Pop. 51,790, but this number is continually fluctuating by the arrival and departure of visitors.—Bath is of great antiquity, and was known to the Romans under the appellation of Aquæ Solis Fontes Calidi. In the 16th century, it is said to have been maintained chiefly by the manufacture of woollen cloths. In conjunction with Wells it forms a bishopric, which embraces all the county of Somerset, with the exception of a part of Bristol. Both the cathedral and the palace of the bishop, however, are at Wells. It communicates with Bristol and other towns by the Kennet and Avon canal. A station on the Great Western Railway.

BATH, a county of Virginia, United States, intersected by branches of the James river, and traversed by the Alleghany mountains. Area, 725 square miles. Pop. 4,482.

BATH, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 290 square miles. Pop. 11,982.

BATH, a city and port of Maine, United States of America. It is on the bank of the Kennebec, about 12 miles from the sea. There is a large custom-house. Ship-building and the fisheries are the great industries of the place. Pop. 7,874.

BATHEASTON, bath'-eest-on, a parish of Somerset, 3 miles from Bath. Pop. 1,795.—On Salisbury Hill here, there are traces of a supposed encampment of the Saxons during the siege of Bath, in 577. It has a station near the Great Western Railway.

BATHGATE, a town of Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 25 miles from Glasgow. The celebrated mineral called Torbanehill coal is worked here, and within the last few years paraffin oil and chemicals have been extensively manufactured. Pop. 9,450. It is a station on the North British Railway.

BATHORI, STEPHEN, ba-to'-re, king of Poland, who was sovereign prince of Transylvania, and was elected to the throne of Poland in the place of Henry of Valois. He reformed many abuses, and defeated the Russians, who were forced to cede Courland and a part of Livonia to the Poles.
Died at Grondo, 1586.

BATHORI, ELIZABETH, niece of the above, a monster of cruelty, who employed agents to kidnap young girls, whom she murdered by the most horrible tortures. It was stated, and generally believed, that she murdered 300 girls at one time, for the purpose of having a bath of their blood. Official investigation proved her to have been guilty of 650 murders, the victims being in all cases girls and young women. Her agents were beheaded or burned alive; but she was imprisoned for life in the fortress of Esej.
Died 1614.

BATHSHEBA, bath-she'-ba, 'daughter of a vow,' the wife of Uriah, afterwards of David, and mother of Solomon.

BATHURST, ALLEN, Earl of, bath'-urst, an eminent statesman. In 1705 he entered the House of Commons as member for Cirencester. He attached himself to the opposition, led by Harley and St. John, and distinguished himself by eloquent attacks on Godolphin and the Duke of Marlborough. In 1711 he was created Baron Bathurst. In the Upper House he impeached the directors of the South Sea Scheme, and determinedly opposed the policy of Sir Robert Walpole. He was an intimate friend of Pope, Addison, Swift, Congreve, Rowe, Gay, and most of the leading literary men of that brilliant time. In 1742 he was admitted of the privy council; in 1757 was appointed treasurer to the Prince of Wales, obtaining, at the accession of George III., a pension of £2,000 a year; and in 1772 was created Earl Bathurst.

Born in Westminster, 1684; died near Cirencester, 1775.

BATHURST, RALPH, uncle of the preceding, who originally studied divinity at Oxford, but adopted medicine as his profession; but after the restoration took orders and was offered the see of Bristol, which he declined. He was an orator, poet, and wit and humorist of a very brilliant kind.
Born 1620; died 1704.

BATHURST, a British settlement in W. Africa, on the island of St. Mary's, at the mouth of the Gambia. It exports wax, ivory, gum, gold, hides, tortoise-shell, rice, cotton, African teak, and palm-oil. Pop. about 3,000, chiefly blacks. Lat. 13° 28′ N. Lon. 16° 32′ W.

BATHURST, the principal town in the western district of New South Wales, Australia. It is situated on the south bank of the Macquarie river, on rising ground, 2,333 feet above the sea level, surrounded by hills, and is distant from Sydney 122 miles, nearly due west. Bathurst may be considered the third town of New South Wales, and its importance is steadily increasing. It has numerous well laid-out streets, of ample width, crossing each other at right angles, with a square in the centre. The public buildings are very numerous, and metropolitan almost in their character; they comprise several places of worship, court-house and gaol, numerous schools, a school of art, the joint stock and commercial banks and Bank of New South Wales, insurance offices, the hospital, the hotels (Tattersall's, the Royal, and Club, being the leading), and very many well-built and handsomely fitted up stores and business premises. The country surrounding Bathurst may be described as agricultural and pastoral, but mining is also very largely carried on, though not in the immediate vicinity. Diamonds and other gems have been found within the municipality. The soil is very productive, and especially suited to the growth of cereal crops. The manufactories in Bathurst are several tanneries, a coach factory, and two flour-mills. Soap, candles, glue, boots and shoes, and earthenware are also manufactured extensively in the town. There are both Anglican and Roman Catholic Bishops of Bathurst. Pop. 7,221.

BAUCIS, baw'-sis, an old and infirm woman of Phrygia, who with her husband lived in a small cottage, in a penurious manner, when Jupiter and Mercury travelled in disguise over Asia. The gods came to the cottage, and were so pleased with the hospitality they received, that Jupiter changed their dwelling into a magnificent temple, of which Baucis and her husband were made priests. After they had lived happily to an extreme old age, they died both at the same hour, according to their request to Jupiter, that one might not have the sorrow of following the other to the grave. Their bodies were changed into trees before the doors of the temple.

BAUDELAIRE, CHARLES, bō'-de-laire', French poet. His writings, which attained great popularity, are frequently repulsive from the choice of subjects, and affected in style; but he was capable of writing with great elegance and taste. He carried the principles of "romanticism" to an extreme. He translated the works of Edgar Poe, the American.
Born in Paris, 1821; died 1847.

BAUDET, STEPHEN, bō'-dai, a French engraver, whose chief work is a print of Adam and Eve, from a painting by Dominichino.
Born at Blois, 1643; died 1716.

BAUER, BRUNO, bou'-er, a modern German biblical critic and political writer, who, at an early age, commenced his theological disquisitions by reviewing Strauss's "Life of Jesus," and other works. Many of his works contain very bold and speculative opinions, and one of them, "Christianity Unveiled," was destroyed in 1843 at Zurich, before its publication. In his "Review of the Epistles attributed to St. Paul," he argues that the four leading ones were not written by the apostle, but are the production of the 2nd century.
Born at Eisenberg, 1809,

BAUG, bawg, a town of Hindostan, in the province of Malwah, 92 miles E. of Baroda, and where there are some remarkable cave temples. Pop. 5,000.

BAUGE, bo-zhai', a town of France, department of the Maine and Loire, 20 miles from Angers. Pop. 3,500. Here, in 1421, the English, under the duke of Clarence, were defeated.

BAULEAH, baul'-le-a, a large town of Bengal, to the N.E. of the Ganges, about 25 miles from Moorshedabad.

BAUME, ANTOINE, bo-mai', French chemist, who established the first manufactory of sal-ammoniac in France, was the first who discovered a process for bleaching raw silk, and improved the mode of dyeing scarlet at the manufactory of tapestry at the Gobelins. He lost a fortune acquired by skill and industry, by the Revolution. He was the author of several works on chemistry.
Born at Senlis, 1728; died 1801.

BAUMEEAN, or BAUMIAN. (See BAUMIAN.)

BAUME LES NONES, BAUME LES DAMES, or BAUME LES MOINES, or MESSIEURS, bome, none, dām, mwo'-een, a town of France, department of the Doubs, 16 miles from Besançon. It has paper and iron-works, and quarries of gypsum. Pop. nearly 3,000.

BAUMGARTEN, ALEXANDER GOTTLIEB, boum-gar'-ten, a German philosopher, who studied at Halle, and became professor of philosophy at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Baumgarten wrote much on æsthetics, or the philosophy of the beautiful. He wrote "Metaphysica," 8vo; "Ethica Philosophica," 8vo; "Æsthetica Initia Philosophiæ practicæ primæ."

Born at Berlin, 1714; died at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1762.

BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, LUDWIG FRIEDRICH OTTO, German theologian, professor at Jena. He was the author of numerous works, and exercised great influence.

Born at Merseburg, 1788; died, 1843.

BAUNACH, bout'-nak, a town of Bavaria, 7 miles from Bamberg. Pop. 1,000. The grotto of the Magdalene is in the neighbourhood of this locality, and is frequented as a place of pilgrimage.

BAUR, JOHN WILLIAM, a painter and engraver of Strasburg, whose pictures of buildings and landscapes are excellent.

Born 1600; died at Vienna, 1640.

BAUR, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN, bour, German theologian, leader of what is known as the Tübingen school of theology. In 1817 he was appointed professor at Blaubeuren, and in 1824 published a work, "Symbolism and Mythology," which excited great attention, and procured for him the professorship of historical theology at Tübingen. About 1835 he commenced a series of critical investigations into the New Testament, the results of which appeared in several works on the doctrines of Christianity, and the history of dogmatic theology. Although his views startled the orthodox theologians, all admitted his extraordinary ability and critical acumen.

Born in Wurtemberg, 1792; died 1860.

BAUR, FREDERICK WILHELM VON, a Russian engineer-general, who engaged early in military life; and in 1755 was in the British service, as an officer in the Hessian Artillery. In 1757 he obtained the rank of general and engineer. Frederick II. of Prussia ennobled him. In 1769 he entered into the service of Catherine II., empress of Russia, and was employed against the Turks. The empress had a high notion of his talents, and employed him in making the aqueduct of Sarskoe-Selo, for supplying Moscow with water, and in deepening the canal near St. Petersburg, at the end of which he constructed a large harbour, and other important undertakings. Baur had for his secretary the celebrated Kotzebue, who directed in his name the German theatre at St. Petersburg.

Born at Bieber, 1731; died at St. Petersburg, 1783.

BAUTAIN, LOUIS EUGENE MARIE, bo-tainh', French philosopher and theologian. In 1817 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Strasburg. In 1828 he took orders, and resigned his chair. In 1849 he went to Paris, where he obtained great reputation as an orator, and in 1853 became professor of moral theology. He endeavoured to show the connection of theology and philosophy, and his works include "Philosophy of Christianity," and others of a similar character.

Born at Paris, 1796; died 1867.

BAUTRU, WILLIAM, bo'-troo, member of the French Academy, and a celebrated wit.

Born at Angers, 1588; died at Paris, 1665.

BAUTZEN, bout'-zen, a town of Saxony, on an eminence on the right bank of the Spree, 32 miles N.E. of Dresden. The town is fortified, and there are suburbs on the left bank of the river. The cathedral is used by both Catholics and Protestants. The town-hall, the academy, the orphan-house, and house of correction, are all worthy of attention. Manf. Linen, cotton, woollen, leather, and paper; and it has a considerable general trade. Pop. 13,000. On May 21 and 22, 1813, a great battle took place here, in which Napoleon I. defeated the Russian and Prussian army.

BAVARIA, a kingdom of SOUTHERN GERMANY, composed of two separate masses, the larger, Bavaria proper, being bounded E. and S. by the Austrian dominions, W. by Wurtemberg, Hesse Darmstadt, and Baden, and N. by Reuss, Meiningen, and part of Hesse-Darmstadt. The smaller is named Rhenish Bavaria, or the Palatinate, and is situate on the W. of the Rhine, bounded N. by Rhenish Prussia and Hesse-Darmstadt, E. by Baden, S. by France, and W. by Rhenish Prussia and Hesse-Homberg. Viewed as a whole, this country may be considered as hilly rather than mountainous, although in the S. the Alps, in the Zugspitz, attain an elevation of 10,150 feet; on the E., between Bavaria and Bohemia, the Arber and Rachelberg respectively attain to 4,613 and 4,561 feet. There are numerous other peaks scattered over the country, but none of them rising to more than 3,500 feet above the level of the sea. The principal plains are the valleys of the Lech and Isar, and the extensive elevated plateau on the S. of the Danube, called the Donau-moss. It is in these that the chief sources of Bavarian wealth are to be found, where the arts of agriculture are carried to the highest state of perfection. About one-fourth of the country is covered by forests, nearly a third of which is public property.

Rivers.—The Danube, the Rhine, and the Main. The first has a winding course of 200 miles within the kingdom, and on its right bank receives the Iller, Lech, and Isar; whilst on its left the Womits, Altmuhl, Naab, and Regen, with a great many more smaller streams, are taken into its course. The Rhine forms the eastern line of the Rhenish subdivision of the kingdom, and is merely a boundary river. The Main, which has its source in two small streams in Suabia, drains all the N. part of the principal territory, and during its course receives several affluents.

Lakes.—These are neither numerous nor of great extent. The most remarkable are the Ammer, the Würm, and the Chien, which are all situate in the S. plateau. The largest is the Chien, which has a circuit of about 35 miles. There are some other lakes lying within the range of the Noric Alps, but they are of no great size.

Climate.—Differs greatly according to the character of the region, cold in the mountainous districts, but warm in the plains. On the whole the temperature is, in winter, colder than that of Great Britain, and considerably hotter in summer and autumn.

Pro.—There are few countries so highly favoured for productiveness of soil. The principal crops are wheat, rye, oats, barley, and, in some districts, maize, rice, spelt, and buckwheat. Tobacco, fruit, and potatoes are extensively cultivated in the valleys of the Rhine and the Main. The hop-plant and the vine are also largely cultivated; and the wines of Franconia have attained a wide-spread celebrity. The famed Steinwein is produced in Steinberg; and the Leistenwein is produced in the same district. The choicest of all the Bavarian wines, however, are the produce of the vineyards near Forst, Deidesheim, and Wachenheim, on the declivities of the Hardt mountains. Cattle-rearing is carried on to a great extent in the southern part of the kingdom, and the dairy produce is extensive. Swine, poultry, and wild fowl are abundant in all parts of the country.

Minerals.—Coal and iron ore are abundant, and there are large salt-mines and brine-springs. Copper, manganese, mercury, and cobalt are also found; whilst there are numerous quarries of marble, alabaster, gypsum, and stone, distributed over various parts of the territory. Porcelain clay also abounds in various districts, and is usually of the finest quality.

Manf.—Linen, woollen, and cotton-weaving, paper-making, tanning, hardware, beetroot-sugar, porcelain, jewellery, toys, clocks, and optical instruments. The brewing of beer is the most important manufacture, there being more than 5,000 breweries.

Exp.—Grain, cattle, timber, wine, wool, hides, salt, hops, fruits, liquorice, madder, butter, cheese, jewellery, and glass.

Imp.—Principally coffee, sugar, cotton, silks, woollen fabrics, and colonial products. There is besides a transit trade with Austria, North Germany, Switzerland, and Italy.

Area, Administrative Districts, and Population.—There are eight government districts:—

Districts.	Area, sq. miles.	Pop. 1880
Upper Franconia (Oberfranken)	2,702	575,357
Upper Palatinate (Oberpfalz)	3,732	528,564
Lower Bavaria (Niederbayern)	4,157	646,947
Upper Bavaria (Oberbayern)	6,582	951,977
Suabia (Schwaben)	3,243	634,530
Middle Franconia (Mittelfranken)	2,918	643,817
Lower Franconia (Unterfranken)	3,243	626,305
Palatinate (Rhein Pfalz)	2,293	677,281
Total	28,870	5,284,778

Chief Towns.—Munich, Passau, Speyer, Regensburg, Baireuth, Nuremberg, Wurzburg, Augsburg.

Religion.—No predominant national church is recognized by the government. About seven-tenths of the population are Catholics; there are more than a million and a quarter of Protestants, and about 50,000 Jews. There are two Roman Catholic archbishoprics, those of Munich and Bamberg, and the Protestant Church is under a General Consistory. There are three universities, those of Munich and Warzburg being Catholic, and that of Erlangen, Protestant.

Education is compulsory, and under the immediate superintendence of a superior board of education and ecclesiastical affairs.

Gov.—Monarchical, with the legislative power vested in two chambers conjointly, with the king as head of the state. The executive consists of the Council of State and the Ministry of State. Bavaria became a member of the German empire in 1870.

Railways and Canals.—There are about 2,000 miles of railway in operation, nearly all state property. The principal canal is the Ludwigs, connecting the Rhine and the Danube.

History.—The name Bavaria is derived from the Celtic Gauls, the Boii, conquered by the Franks in the 7th century. In 778 Charlemagne gave the title of margrave to the rulers. In 920 the title was changed to duke, and in 1180 Otho, count of Wittelsbach, succeeded to the title after the expulsion of Henry the Lion, ancestor of the Brunswick family. From Otho are descended the members of the present royal house. Duke Maximilian I. of Bavaria was elevated to the rank of elector of the Holy Roman Empire, in the Thirty-Years' War, in recompense for his opposition to Protestantism; and elector Maximilian Joseph was raised to the rank of king by Napoleon I. in 1805. The latter title was acknowledged by all the European powers in 1815, at the Congress of Vienna.

BAVENO, ba-vai'-no, a village of Piedmont, on Lake Maggiore, opposite the Borromean Islands. Pop. about 1,000. Here are fine marble and granite quarries, and behind the village is Monte Monterone, 4,350 feet high.

BAVIUS and MÆVIUS, bai'-ve-us, mi'-ve-us, two stupid and malevolent poets, in the age of Augustus, who attacked the superior talents of the contemporary writers, and have therefore become immortalized by the satire and ridicule which they drew upon themselves.

BAWIAN, baw'-yan, an island in the Eastern seas, 700 miles to the S.E. of Singapore. Ext. 30 miles in circumference. Desc. Mountainous, and intersected with fine valleys. Pop. 30,000, principally agricultural.

BAXTER, Andrew, bax'-ter, Scotch writer on metaphysics, author of an "Inquiry into the nature of the Human Soul," in which he ascribes dreams to direct spiritual influence, and asserts that matter is not eternal.

Born at Aberdeen, 1686; died 1750.

BAXTER, Richard, a celebrated Nonconformist divine, who in 1638 was ordained by Bishop Thornborough, and three years later was chosen vicar of Kidderminster; but, on the breaking out of the civil war, he took suspicion at the designs of the Parliament, and resolved to repair instantly to the army and use his utmost endeavours to bring back the soldiers to the principles of loyalty to the king and submission to the Church. So strong was the sense of duty in him, that, when Cromwell was declared Protector, he bravely withstood him to the face, telling him that "the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing and not an evil." In 1645 he became chaplain to Colonel Whalley's regiment. Whilst officiating in that capacity he wrote his "Saint's Rest;" and was present at the taking of Bridgwater, and the sieges of Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. Ill-health compelling him to leave the army, he, in 1657, returned to Kidderminster. Before his appointment to Whalley's regiment, however, he had passed some time at Coventry, officiating in the ministry; and he had even preached within hearing of the sound of cannon, when the roll of battle was passing over Edgehill. At the restoration it was expected that moderation would have pervaded the councils of the nation, and that a form of ecclesiastical government that should reconcile all parties would be established; but this was not the case, and the Act of Uniformity of 1662 drove Baxter, who had settled in London, from the church. He now occupied himself with literary composition, and his "Call to the Unconverted" was one of the fruits of this retirement. In 1672, when the flames of religious persecution, which had run over the land, began to expire, he once more came forth from his retreat. He settled in London, and occupied himself principally with writing and preaching, but was frequently suspended by those rigorous enactments to which the Nonconformists were, during the last two reigns of the Stuarts, frequently subjected. In 1682 the myrmidons of the law burst into his house whilst he was suffering from indisposition, and he was only saved from being dragged to a prison by the accidental interposition of his physician. Two years later he became one of the victims of the inhuman Jeffreys. He was apprehended on a charge of sedition, and for being hostile to episcopacy. His trial took place in 1684-5. On this occasion Jeffreys displayed his usual ferocity. When Baxter asked for time, "I will not give him a moment's time more to save his life. Yonder stands Oates in the pillory with him. I would say two of the greatest rogues and rascals in the kingdom stood there." When Baxter made an attempt to speak, the lord chief justice (how the title was abused in such a man!) exclaimed, "Richard! Richard! dost thou think we'll hear thee poison the court? Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou has written books enough to load a cart. Hadst thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy" The result was a fine of 500 marks, imprisonment till paid, and bonds for good behaviour for seven years. Lord Powis, however, stepped in, got the fine remitted, and Baxter was liberated in eighteen months. He lived for five years after this, preaching the gospel without molestation. The fame of this persevering, brave-spirited, and long-enduring man rests principally upon his two popular treatises, "The Saint's Everlasting Rest," and "A Call to the Unconverted." He was buried in Christ Church, London, his funeral being attended by a large number of persons, Churchmen as well as Nonconformists. In 1875 a commemorative statue was erected at Kidderminster.

Born at Rewton, in Shropshire, 1615; died in London, 1691.

BAXTER, WILLIAM, nephew of the above, was celebrated for his proficiency in the classics, and his antiquarian research, and was appointed master of the Mercers' School in London. He published a grammar of the Latin tongue in 1679; an edition of Anacreon in 1695; an edition of Horace in 1710; and a Dictionary of British Antiquities in 1719. His Glossary of Roman Antiquities was not printed till 1726.

Born at Lanlugan, 1650; died 1723.

BAY ISLANDS, Colony of the, a group in the Bay of Honduras, consisting of Ruatan, Bonacca, Utilla, Barbarat, Helené and Morat. Lat. between 16° 5′ and 16° 30′ N. Lon. between 85° 45′ and 87° W.—This group was, on the 17th July, 1852, proclaimed a British colony, and has been the subject of discussion between Great Britain and the United States, as it is considered by the American government that the formation of these islands into a colony is a violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

BAYARD, PIERRE DU TERRAIL, Chevalier de, baï'-yar, the celebrated French warrior, and called "the Good Knight, without fear and without reproach" (le Bon Chevalier, sans peur et sans reproche), had an ancestry of warriors, most of whom fell on various continental battle-fields. His father fought in many of the battles of Louis XI., his grandfather fell at Montlhery, his great-grandfather at Cressy, and his great-great-grandfather at Poictiers. As was the practice in the 15th century with those who were destined for the profession of arms, Bayard, at 13 years old, was placed as a page in the house of the duke of Savoy, where he remained for five years. On the completion of his eighteenth year he entered upon the actual duties of a soldier. The first battle at which he fought was that of Fornovo, in 1494, under the banner of Charles VIII. Two horses were killed under him in that field; and he himself performed feats that procured him the approbation of all who beheld him. Several years after this he was engaged in the Italian wars of Louis XII., when, on one occasion, it is said that he held a bridge over the Garigliano, single-handed, against 200 Spaniards, and enabled the main body of the French to make good their retreat. In 1513 he fought at the famous battle of Spurs, in Picardy, when his valour saved the disgrace of the whole French army. In this field, also, fought Henry VIII. of England, then a young man, but commanding in person the English force. On this occasion Bayard surrendered to an English knight, but was soon exchanged. In the battle of Marignano, fought September 13, 1515, Bayard displayed his usual prowess; and in 1522, with only 1,000 men, he defended Mezières, a frontier town of France, against the count of Nassau, with a force of 35,000 men, assisted by a powerful artillery, and compelled him to raise the siege. In 1524, whilst fighting against the Imperialists in Italy, he continued to discover his usual romantic valour, when he fell from his horse, wounded by a ball. In this condition he was pressed to withdraw from the field; but answering that he never turned his back upon an enemy, desired that he might be placed with his back against a tree, that he might watch the varying fortunes of the fight; and he there sunk under his wound. The Duke of Pescara, who, on this occasion, commanded the Spanish troops, caused the body of Bayard to be embalmed and sent to his relations. When it drew near the country of his birth, people of all ranks came forth to meet it.

Born in Dauphiné, 1476; died 1523.

BAYAZID, or BAGAZID, baï'-a-zid, a city of Turkish Armenia, in the pashalic of Erzeroum, 50 miles S.S.W. of Erivan. It contains two churches, three mosques, and the monastery of Kara Killeesea, distinguished alike by the beauty of its architecture and the remoteness of its antiquity. On the summit of the mountain, on the side of which the town is situated, are the ruins of a palace built by Mahomed Pasha. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 39° 24′ N. Lon. 43° 26′ E.—Here, in August, 1854, the Turks were defeated by the Russians; Selim Pasha having, contrary to the directions of General Guyon (Kurshid Pasha), attacked the Muscovites, who killed, wounded, and took prisoners nearly 2,000 Turks.

BAYER, JOHN, baï'-er, a German astronomer, who, in 1603, published an excellent work, entitled "Uranometria," being a celestial atlas, or folio chart of all the constellations. He was the first to distinguish the stars by the letters of the Greek alphabet, and according to the order of the magnitude of the stars in each constellation. This work was republished, with great improvements by the author, in 1627, under a new title; viz., "Coelum Stellatum Christianum."

Born at Rhain, in Bavaria, 1572; died at Augsburg, 1625.

BAYER, GOTTLIEB SIEGFRIED, grandson of the above, a learned philologist, who acquired a great knowledge of the eastern languages, particularly the Chinese. In 1717 he was appointed librarian at Königsberg; and in 1726 was invited to St. Petersburg, where he was made professor of Greek and Roman antiquities. His "Musæum Sinicum," printed in 1730, in 2 vols. 8vo, is a very curious and learned work.

Born at Königsburg, 1694; died at St. Petersburg, 1738.

BAYEUX, GEORGE, baï'-yu(r), a French advocate, who obtained from the Academy at Rouen the prize for a poem on filial piety. He translated the "Fasti" of Ovid, and wrote also "Reflections on the Reign of Trajan." He was sent to prison, and massacred by the rabble of Caen.

Born at Caen, about 1752; died 1792.

BAYEUX, a town of France, on the river Aure, in the department of the Calvados, 17 miles N.N.W. of Caen. It has a magnificent cathedral with three towers, dating from the 12th century, besides churches, convents, and a castle. Many of the houses are very old and picturesque. Manf. Lace, damask, calico, cotton yarn, serges, and pottery. There is a considerable trade in cattle, horses, and butter. Pop. 10,000.—In the town-house, formerly the episcopal palace, is preserved the celebrated tapestry of Bayeux, said to have been wrought by Matilda, the wife of William the Conqueror, or the Empress Matilda, wife of Henry I. of England, and which represents the deeds done by the Norman duke in effecting the conquest of England. Napoleon, during the excitement of his meditated invasion of England, caused this piece of tapestry to be carried from town to town and exhibited in the theatres between the acts, to rouse the spectators to the achievement of a second conquest. Bayeux is of great antiquity, having existed before the invasion of Gaul by the Romans.

BAYLE, PIERRE, bail, a celebrated French writer, author of the well-known "Historical and Critical Dictionary," was educated for the ministry among the Protestants; but, while attending the Jesuits' college, became a Roman Catholic. Shortly afterwards, however, returning to his former communion, he went to Geneva, where he formed an intimacy with Basnage. He was in 1675 appointed to the chair of philosophy at Sedan; but when that academy was suppressed, in 1681, he removed to Rotterdam, and was chosen professor of philosophy and history there. In 1684 he began a literary journal entitled "Nouvelles de la République des Lettres," which obtained great celebrity. In 1693 he was deprived of his professorship; and, in 1697, appeared the first volume of his greatest work, "The Historical and Critical Dictionary," which quickly reached a second edition. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote, "Thoughts on Comets," "A Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism," "A Philosophical Comment on the words of Christ, 'Compel them to come in,'" &c. His writings generally exhibit a sceptical spirit of indifference.

Born near Foix, 1647; died 1706.

BAYLEN, bai'-len', a Spanish town in the province of Andalusia, 22 miles N.E. of Jaen. Manf. Linen, glass, bricks, tiles, and soap. Pop. 5,000.—The French were defeated here by the Spaniards in July, 1808, about 20,000 French soldiers being captured. Joseph Bonaparte fled from Madrid in consequence.

BAYLY, LEWIS, bai'-le, an eminent prelate, educated at Oxford, who was ordained bishop of Bangor, 1616, and is celebrated for his well-known work entitled "The Practice of Piety."

Born at Carmarthen, about 1565; died 1632.

BAYONNE, bai-yon', a well-built, opulent, and commercial town of France, in the department of Basses Pyrenées, situate at the confluence of the Nive and Adour, at a distance of three miles from the sea. These rivers here form a commodious harbour, three miles from the Bay of Biscay, and divide the town into three parts, called Great and Little Bayonne and St. Esprit (the last-named inhabited almost exclusively by Jews), communicating by bridges. A citadel, constructed by Vauban, on the top of an eminence in the suburb, commands both the harbour and the town, which are further defended by small redoubts. The cathedral is a large and beautiful Gothic structure of the 12th century; the other most important public buildings are the mint, exchange, theatre, and chamber of commerce. One of the finest arsenals in France is in the town, and there is a very large military hospital. The old castle is in Great Bayonne and the new castle in Little Bayonne. Manf. Glass, ropes, cordage, chocolate, and liqueurs. It has some sugar-refineries, and distilleries; and a large trade is carried on in resins, woollen cloths, serges, linens, dyed silks, drugs, cream of tartar, and wines. The principal objects of the maritime trade are the cod and whale fishery. The hams of Bayonne have long been famous, and its wines and chocolate are exported in great quantities to the north of Europe. Pop. 26,261. Lat. 43° 29′ N. Lon. 1° 24′ W.—The military weapon called the bayonet takes its name from this city. A Basque regiment in a fight with the Spaniards near here, in 1523, found their ammunition exhausted, and fixed their long knives to their musket-barrels, and so charged the enemy. Although the city itself has often been besieged, it has never been taken. The last siege was by the English in 1814, and was interrupted by the news of Bonaparte's surrender.

BAZA, ba-tha, a city of Spain, in the province of Granada, situated in a beautiful valley in the Sierra Nevada. In the time of the Moors it was a place of great importance, and there are many remains of Moorish architecture. The church is very ancient, and was used as a mosque. In 1480 this place was taken from the Moors, by the assistance of nine iron cannons, which it still preserves as memorials of the event. Hemp is the chief article of trade. Pop. 7,300.

BAZARD, ARMAND, ba-zar', a French socialist and founder, in 1820, of a secret political society, Les Amis de la Vérité, which was dissolved in consequence of an unsuccessful outbreak at Belfont. He afterwards joined the St. Simonians, contributed to the journal, and wrote an exposition of their doctrines, but disapproving of their views as to the emancipation of women, and a community of wives, quarrelled with them in 1831. In one of the discussions he was seized with apoplexy, and died a few months afterwards.

Born at Paris 1791; died 1832.

BAZAS, ba'-za, a town of France, department of the Gironde, 30 miles from Bordeaux. Pop. about 5,000, many of whom are engaged in the manufacture of glass.

BAZHENOV, VASSALI IVANOVITCH, bazhen-off', Russian architect, first vice-president of the St. Petersburg Academy of Fine Arts, employed by the empress Catherine, and designer of some of the finest buildings at St. Petersburg.

Born at Moscow, 1737; died at St. Petersburg, 1799.

BEACHY HEAD, bé'-chee, the loftiest promontory on the S. coast of England, 530 feet high, in the county of Sussex, 27 miles from Dungeness. Lat. of lighthouse, 50° 44′ N. Lon. 0° 1′ E.—It was off here, on the 30th June, 1690, that the French defeated the English and Dutch fleets, commanded by the earl of Torrington.

BEACONSFIELD, bé'-kons-feeld, a market-town of Buckinghamshire, 23 miles from London. It consists of four streets arranged as a cross. It was formerly a more busy place than now, there being a manufacture of ribbons. Pop. 1,524.

BEACONSFIELD, EARL OF. (See DISRAELI, BENJAMIN.)

BEALE, MARY, beel, an English portrait-painter, who copied with great exactness the works of Sir Peter Lely and Vandyke.

Born 1631; died 1697.

BEAMINSTER, bé'-mins-ter, a town of Dorsetshire, 18 miles N.W. of Dorchester, on the river Birt. The tower of the church is nearly 100 feet high, and is decorated with sculptures illustrative of the woollen trade. The church was restored in 1862. Manf. Sailcloth, iron, and copper goods. Pop. about 3,000.

BEAR ISLAND, bair, an island on the S.W. coast of Ireland, at the entrance of Bantry Bay, sheltering the harbour of Bearhaven, considered the finest in Ireland. Ext. 6 miles long, by 1½ broad.

BEAR LAKE, GREAT, a lake of British North America, lying near the Arctic circle. (See AMERICA, NORTH.)

BEARD, JOHN, beerd, an English actor and singer, who was brought up in the king's chapel. In 1739 he married Lady Henrietta Herbert, daughter of the earl of Waldegrave, and widow of Lord Edward Herbert, who brought him little fortune. After quitting the stage some years, he returned to it in 1744.

Born 1694; died 1768.

BEARN, bai'-arn, an ancient province of France, now included in the department of the BASSES-PYRENÉES.

BEAS DE SEGURA, bai'-as-dai-sai-gu'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, 50 miles N.W. of Jaen, on the left bank of the Guadalimar. Manf. Coarse cloths and linen, leather and oil. Pop. 2,700.

BEATON, or BETHUNE, DAVID, be'-ton, a cardinal, and archbishop of St. Andrews, in Scotland. In 1519 he was appointed resident at the court of France, and in 1523 he obtained the rich abbey of Arbroath. In 1528 he was made keeper of the privy seal, and negotiated the marriage of James V. with Princess Magdalen of France, and afterwards with Princess Mary of Lorraine. In 1537 he was consecrated bishop of Mirepoix, in Languedoc; and Pope Paul III. raised him to the cardinalate in 1538; and in the following year he was made primate of Scotland. On the death of the king, the lords of the council sent the cardinal to prison, whence he was released, not long after, by the regent, and made chancellor, and crowned the young Queen Mary at Stirling. He persecuted the Protestants with great fury; and, among others, caused the celebrated Wishart to be burnt before his own palace. A conspiracy was formed against him, and he was assassinated in the castle of St. Andrews. His private life was scandalous.

Born at Balfour, in Fife, 1494; died 1546.

BEATTIE, JAMES, LL.D., be'-te, a distinguished Scotch writer, was the son of a shopkeeper and farmer, who sent him to the University of Aberdeen, where he pursued his studies with so much success as to receive a bursary, which is equivalent to an exhibition or scholarship in the English universities. After following the profession of a schoolmaster for some time, and publishing a volume of poems, and other works, in 1771, he produced the first canto of his poem called "The Minstrel," which was received with great favour. He went to London, was received by the king, and admitted into the friendship of Dr. Johnson, Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other celebrities of the period. Previous to the appearance of this effusion, he had published an "Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth," designed to stem, if possible, the tide of infidelity, which the philosophic speculations of David Hume were then diffusing over the land. For this he received, in 1773, a substantial token of the royal favour in a pension of £200 a year. The second canto of "The Minstrel" appeared in 1774, and was as enthusiastically received as was the first. He was for more than forty years professor of moral philosophy and logic in Marischal College, Aberdeen. Beattie wrote several other works, which were much thought of in his days; but his fame rests principally on his "Minstrel," which was designed to trace the progress of a poetical genius, from the first dawning of fancy and reason till that period at which he may be supposed capable of appearing in the world as a minstrel.

Born at Laurencekirk, Kincardineshire, 1735; died 1803.

BEATUS RHENANUS, be-ai'-tus re-nai'-nus, a learned man, whose name was Bilde, which he altered to Rhenanus, from the place of his nativity, Rheinach. He was a profound scholar, and was the first who published the History of Velleius Paterculus. He also edited the works of Tertullian, to which he added valuable notes, which he also did to several classical works.

Born 1485; died at Strasburg, 1547.

BEAU, CHARLES LE, le(r) bo, a French writer, was professor in the Royal College, and secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions. He was the author of a "History of the Lower Empire," in 22 vols. 12mo, and also of "Opera Latina," 3 vols. 12mo. A brother, John Louis le Beau, was the author of an edition of Homer, Greek and Latin.

Born 1701; died at Paris, 1778.

BEAUCAIRE DE PEGUILLON, FRANCIS, bo'-kair, archbishop of Metz, who, at the council of Trent, pleaded with great eloquence in favour of reformation. He afterwards resigned his bishopric, and went into retirement, and wrote his "Rerum Gallicarum Commentaria, ab anno 1461 ad annum 1562."

Born 1514; died 1591.

BEAUCAIRE, a well-built town of France, on the right bank of the Rhone, in the department of the Gard, chiefly remarkable for its great annual fair held in a large meadow on the banks of the river, from the 22nd to the 28th July. It has a trade in silk, wine, oil, almonds, spices, drugs, leather, wool, and cotton; and during the period of its fair is frequented by merchants from all parts of Europe and Asia, to the number of 100,000. On the opposite side of the Rhone is Tarascon, with which Beaucaire is connected by a very fine iron suspension bridge, considered second only to that of Menai. The town suffered severely in the wars of the League, and in 1632 the castle was partially destroyed by Richelieu. It occupies the site of the ancient Ugernum, and several remains of the Roman city have been discovered. Pop. 7,900.

BEAUCHAMP, ALPHONSE DE, bo'-shaahm, French historian. At the age of 17 he entered a Sardinian regiment of marines, but, refusing to fight against the French Republic, was imprisoned. He afterwards went to Paris, and obtained employment under the minister of police, being expressly charged with the superintendence of the press; but was deprived of his post, his history of La Vendée and the Chouans being displeasing to the authorities. He left Paris, but returned two years afterwards, and again received an official appointment. Besides the work mentioned, he wrote histories of the conquest of Peru, of Brazil, of the revolution in Piedmont, a life of Louis XVIII., and is supposed to have been the real author of the memoirs of Fouché.

Born at Monaco, 1767; died 1832.

BEAUCOURT, bo'-koor, a town of France, in the department of Haut-Rhin, 10 miles from Belfort. Manf. Watch and clock movements in great quantities. Pop. 2,000.

BEAUFORT, CARDINAL HENRY, bo'-fort, a natural son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, the father of Henry IV., by Catherine Swynford. Beaufort was appointed bishop of Winchester in 1404. He was made cardinal by Pope Martin V.

He opposed the project of Henry V. to levy an impost on the clergy to carry on the war against France, but lent the king the enormous sum of 28,000*l.* He was chosen guardian of young Henry VI. in opposition to Humphry, duke of Gloucester, who was the nominal head of the council of regency, which assumed the reigns of government on the death of Henry V. In 1429, after several years of determined rivalship, the cardinal succeeded in destroying the power of the duke, and had the young king crowned. Notwithstanding this circumstance, the hostility between them continued until the murder of the duke of Gloucester (in which, it was suspected, he was concerned) which took place on the 28th February, 1447. The cardinal survived him only six weeks, according to Shakspeare's delineation, in an agony of despair.

"Lord Cardinal, if thou think'st on heaven's bliss,
Hold up thy hand, make signal of thy hope.—
He dies, and makes no sign."

His last words to those by whom his deathbed was surrounded were, "I pray you all to pray for me." He presided over the tribunal which senteneed Joan of Arc to death. He was buried in the elegant chantry which bears his name in Winchester cathedral.

Born 1370; died at Winchester, 1447.

BEAUFORT, MARGARET, countess of Richmond and Derby, was the daughter and heiress of John, duke of Somerset, and married Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son, afterwards Henry VII. Her first husband dying in 1456, she married Sir Henry Stafford, by whom she had no issue; and on his death she became the wife of Thomas, Lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby. She distinguished herself as an author, and founded the colleges of Christ and St. John, in Cambridge.

Born 1441; died 1509.

BEAUFORT, FRANCIS DE VENDOME, duke of, the son of Cæsar, duke of Vendôme, who was imprisoned on the charge of conspiring against Cardinal Mazarin, but, escaping, began a civil war, which soon ended. He was subsequently made admiral of France, and in 1665 defeated the Turkish fleet near Tunis. He was killed at the siege of Candia.

Born 1616; died 1669.

BEAUFORT, LOUIS DE, a learned writer of French, but afterwards settled in Germany. He was chosen fellow of the Royal Society of London, and was the author of the "History of Germanicus," "Dissertation upon the Uncertainty of the First Five Ages of the Roman Republic," "History of the Roman Republic; or, Plan of the Ancient Government of Rome.

Died at Maestricht, 1795.

BEAUHARNAIS, ALEXANDRE, bo-har'-nay, Viscountde, served in the American War. He went to France, was elected the States General for Blois, and became secretary of the National Assembly. In 1793 he declined the office of Minister of War, and tendered his resignation as general of the army of the Rhine, because it had been determined to exclude the military from the service. During the Reign of Terror he was accused, condemned, and guillotined. He was the first husband of Josephine, afterwards the wife of Napoleon.

Born in Martinique, 1760; died 1794.

BEAUHARNAIS, EUGENE DE, was the son of Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon I., and of the above-named viscount. He entered the army, and under the eye of his step-father, Napoleon, fought in the campaigns of Italy, and also went with him to Egypt, where he acted as his aide-de-camp. As a matter of course, he rose to rank with his years, and with the fortunes of Napoleon I., and fought in the Consular Guards at Marengo. When Napoleon assumed the emperorship, he was created a prince, and in 1805 was appointed viceroy of the kingdom of Italy. In the following year he was adopted by Napoleon, and married to the daughter of the king of Bavaria. When, in 1809, the war between Austria and France broke out, he was actively engaged, being placed in command of the French and Italian army, and displaying great knowledge of his profession. He was with the emperor in the Russian campaign of 1812; and during the retreat, after Napoleon and Murat had left the army, he took the chief command. At the battle of Lutzen he commanded the left of the new army which the emperor had raised. So long as the last rays of fortune shone upon Napoleon, he adhered to him; but when these were shed, he retired with his family to Bavaria. During the remainder of his life he lived principally at Munich, with the title of Prince of Leuchtenberg.

Born at Paris, 1781; died at Munich, 1824.

BEAUHARNAIS, a county of Lower Canada, lying to the S.W. of Montreal. Ext. 55 miles long and 22 broad. Area, 710 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and, from the extent of its frontage to the St. Lawrence, possessing considerable advantages. Pop. 16,000, chiefly Scotch, Irish, and Americans.

BEAUJEU, bozh-u(r), a parish and town of France, in the department of the Rhone, 30 miles from Lyons. Manf. Cotton goods, hats, and paper; and it is famous for its mines. Pop. about 4,000.

BEAULIEU, SEBASTIAN PONTAULT DE, bole-yu(r), a French engineer, and field-marshal under Louis XIV., and the author of "Views and Plans of the Sieges and Battles of Louis XIV."
Died 1674.

BEAULIEU, JOHN PETER, Baron de, an Austrian general, who was actively engaged as an artillery officer during the Seven Years' War, and in 1792 commanded the Austrians against the forces whom the French republic sent into the Netherlands, and gained several victories over them. In 1796 he was commander-in-chief in Italy, and his army was routed in several conflicts with General Bonaparte, whose fame was then beginning to dawn.
Born 1725; died 1820.

BEAULIEU, a town of France, department of the Corrèze, 20 miles from Tulle. Pop. 2,500.—Another in the department of the Indre and Loire, 2 miles from Loches. Pop. 2,000.—Another in the department of the Loiret, with a small population.—This name is common to several more small towns in France.

BEAULIEU, or EXE, bo'-lu, a parish at the mouth of the river Exe, 6 miles from Lymington, where Margaret of Anjou, and afterwards Perkin Warbeck, fled for refuge. Exemption from arrest for debt is still a privilege within its manorial bounds.

BEAUMANOIR, PHILIPPE DE, bo-man-wawr', French jurist, author of a great work on the old French law, which is highly valued.
Died 1296.

BEAUMARCHAIS, PIERRE AUGUSTIN CARON DE, bo-mar'-shai, a celebrated French comic dramatist, was the son of a clockmaker at Paris, and applying himself to the same trade, was the inventor of a new escapement, which brought him into notice at the French court, where he became a great favourite with the daughters of Louis XVI., having great musical talent, and playing exceedingly well on the flute and harp, which latter instrument he much improved. He now became acquainted with Duverney, the rich farmer-general, by whose aid he acquired a handsome fortune, and at his death was involved in lawsuits with his heir, gaining great notoriety from the wit, satire, and reasoning which distinguished his pleadings and memorials. He is best known to the world, however, by his being the author of several comedies, of which "The Barber of Seville" and "The Marriage of Figaro" are the best; the latter meeting with immense success. He visited England, as an agent of Louis XV., on secret service connected with some scurrilous pamphlets concerning Madame du Barry, and becoming interested in the dispute between Great Britain and the American colonists, induced the French government to afford assistance to the latter. Under the Convention he was charged with treason to the Republic, having failed to fulfil a contract to supply the Convention with arms for Holland, and took refuge in that country and in England.

BEAUMARIS, bo-mar'-is, borough and market-town of the isle of Anglesey, North Wales, on a spacious bay near the entrance to the Menai Straits, and 3 miles from Bangor. It has a handsome church, with a lofty square tower, and an elegant town-hall, a custom-house, and a free school. There is a castle built by Edward I. at the end of the 13th century. There is little trade, but, as a sea-bathing place, it is much resorted to. Pop. 2,291.—Beaumaris has steam-communication with Liverpool.

BEAUMONT, FRANCIS, bo'-mont, dramatist. His grandfather was a master of the Rolls, and his father, Francis, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas. At the age of 15 he became a member of the Inner Temple, but from the shortness of his life, and the great number of his productions, it is to be presumed that he devoted very little of his time to the practice of law. He tells us himself, in an epistle, that he was intimate with rare Ben Jonson, whom, with other wits of the period, he would seem to have been in the habit of meeting at the Mermaid tavern. His name is indissolubly associated with that of John Fletcher, in conjunction with whom he wrote "Philaster," "The Maid's Tragedy," "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," "The Scornful Lady," and about 50 other dramatic and poetic works. It is beautiful, in retrospect, to contemplate the friendships of these two celebrated dramatists. Their affection for each other appears, in every respect, to have been of the closest kind: they lived in the same house, and, it is affirmed, held their worldly goods in common; and although their geniuses would seem to have been cast in different moulds, yet how well and how sweetly do they amalgamate! Beaumont excelled more in pathos and tragic sentiment; Fletcher in lightness and vivacity; and the names of Beaumont and Fletcher will, as long as the language shall last, be associated as two of the brightest ornaments of our dramatic literature.
Born in Leicestershire, 1585; died in London, 1616.

BEAUMONT DE PEREFIX, HARDOUIN, bo'-mong, a French historian, tutor to Louis XIV., by whom he was made archbishop of Paris. He wrote a "History of Henry IV."
Died 1670.

BEAUMONT, ÉLIE DE, a French advocate, who distinguished himself by his memoir in favour of the unfortunate family of Calas, which produced a powerful effect upon the nation. He was also the author of several other esteemed pieces; and his wife produced a novel, entitled "Letters of the Marquis de Roselle."
Born at Carentan, 1732; died 1785.

BEAUNE, FLORIMENT DE, bone, a French mathematician, who discovered a method of determining the nature of curves by the properties of their triangles, and may be regarded as the discoverer of the differential calculus.
Born in Blois, 1600; died 1652.

BEAUNE, JAMES DE, baron of Samblançai, was superintendent of the finances under Francis I., and lent to the queen-mother a sum of 300,000 crowns, which had been sent to Lautrec to pay his troops, and for want of which the expedition to relieve Milan failed. The queen-mother bribed his secretary, Gentil, to deliver to her the receipts she had given, which being the only testimonies poor Samblançai had, he was accused of having applied the money to his own use, and was hanged. The fraud was afterwards discovered, and his secretary, Gentil, hanged.

Died 1527.

BEAUNE, a town of France, in the department of Côte-d'Or, 23 miles S.S.W. of Dijon. There are several buildings of interest, especially two churches, which date from the 12th century, an hospital, founded in 1443 by Nicholas Rollin, and the belfry of the old town-house. Manf. Cloth, cutlery, and leather. The town is the principal seat of the Burgundian wine trade, and there are dye-works, flour-mills, and distilleries. Pop. 10,500.

BEAURAIN, JOHN DE, bō'-rē̆, a celebrated geographer at the court of Louis XV., who constructed a number of charts, and published a topographical and military description of the campaigns of Luxembourg.

Born at Aix-en-Essart, 1696; died at Paris, 1771.

BEAURIEU, GASPARD-GUILLARD DE, bō'-re-u(r), an ingenious French philosopher, the author of "L'Elève de la Nature" (the Pupil of Nature), and of many other works. To the disgrace of the Revolution, he died in an hospital.

Born in Artois, 1728; died 1795.

BEAUSOBRE, ISAAC DE, bō-zobr', learned Protestant writer. He studied at the Protestant Academy of Saumur, but having broken the royal signet put upon the door of a church of the reformers to prevent the public profession of their religion, he fled to Holland, and afterwards went to Berlin, where he was made chaplain to the king of Prussia, and councillor of the royal consistory. He was a very learned writer, and his critical history of Manicheeism especially gained him a great reputation.

Born at Niort, 1659; died at Berlin, 1738.

BEAUSSET, LE, bōsē'-sai, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 7 miles from Toulon. Manf. Wine, brandy, and soap. Pop. 3,000.

BEAUVAIS, bō-vai', a well-built commercial town of France, in the department of Oise, 45 miles N. of Paris, in a valley at the junction of the Avelon and the Therain. Before the Revolution it was the see of a bishop (who had under his inspection 598 parishes), a governor, and several royal offices. The cathedral of St. Pierre is much admired, its choir being the loftiest in the world, being 153 feet from the pavement to the roof; which is 13 feet higher than that of Amiens. The edifice was begun in 1225, and continued at intervals during the next four centuries, but is still incomplete. Another old church, Saint Etienne, is remarkable for its beautiful stained windows. The episcopal palace, built in the 16th century, is now used as a court-house. There are also a town-house, college, museum, library, and barracks. Manf. Tapestry, for which the town has had a great reputation for more than 200 years; cotton, woollen goods, leather, and earthenware, and a large trade is carried on in grain and wine. Pop. 14,934. —This town is of great antiquity, and was in existence in the time of the Romans. In 1472 it successfully withstood a siege against an army of 80,000 Burgundians under Charles the Bold. On this occasion the women particularly distinguished themselves, especially Jeanne Hachette, who seeing a Burgundian planting his standard on the walls, hurled him to the earth, and bore away the banner in triumph. The raising of the siege is still commemorated in the procession of St. Angadrème, when the ladies, conformably to an order of Louis XI., lead the procession, carrying the trophy which Jeanne Hachette so valorously acquired. The original name of this heroine was Lainé; but from the battleaxe with which she accomplished the above feat, she was henceforth distinguished as Hachette.

BEAUVOIS, AMBROSE MARIA FRANCIS JOSEPH PALISOT DE, bō'-vwaw, a French naturalist and traveller, whose enterprising disposition led him to pursue his investigations over a great portion of W. Africa and America. During his wanderings in the latter country, he discovered, on the banks of the Ohio, the jaws and molar teeth of the great mastodon, and from the west of Virginia brought the tooth of a megalonyx. He published various works in connection with his travels and pursuits.

Born at Arras, 1752; died at Paris, 1820.

BEAUZÉE, NICHOLAS, bō'-zai, a French writer and member of the academy, who wrote the articles on grammar in the Encyclopédie; and though allied with sceptics, was himself a sincere Christian. Beauzée once asked Diderot how they came to elect him a member of the academy, as he was a Christian? "Because," answered the other, "we had not a grammarian among us, and we knew you to be an honest man." He wrote a "Universal Grammar; or, an Exposition of the Elements of Languages;" an "Exposition of the Historical Proofs of Religion," and other works.

Born at Verdun, 1717; died 1789.

BEAVER, bē'ver, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Ohio and Beaver rivers. Area, 650 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile, producing wool, wheat, oats, butter, and pork. Timber is plentiful, and in minerals it produces coal and limestone. The county being well supplied with water, has many saw-mills on its different streams. Manf. Woollens and cottons; it has some iron-foundries, tanneries, breweries, and paper-manufactories. Pop. 39,605.

BEAVER ISLANDS, a chain of islands in Lake Michigan, 40 miles from Mackinaw. Area of the largest estimated at 40 square miles.—This name is common to several villages and creeks in America.

BEBINGTON, bēb'-ing-ton, a parish of Cheshire, on the Mersey, 5 miles from Great Neston. Area, 5,250 acres. Pop. about 11,000.

BECCADELLI, ANTONIO, bek'-ka-del'-e, called Antony of Palermo, and also PANORMITA, was professor of belles-lettres and rhetoric at Pavia, where he, in 1432, received the poetic laurel from the Emperor Sigismund. Alphonso, king of Naples, created him a nobleman, and gave him several honourable employments. He wrote a book on the sayings and actions of Alphonso, king of Aragon; and a collection of his epistles and other pieces was printed at Venice, in 1453.—This man is said to have sold a farm in order to buy a copy of Livy.

Born at Palermo, in 1394; died at Naples, 1471.

BECCAFUMI, DOMENICO, bek-ka-foo'-me, son of a poor peasant, and himself trained to hard labour. His talent for drawing was natural, and encouraged by his master, who adopted him, and had him taught painting. In 1509 he went to Rome to study the works of the great masters. On his return to his native town, Siena, he painted many pictures for churches, and decorations for private mansions. For 27 years he was engaged on the famous pavement of the cathedral of Siena, on which he depicted a commesso work (a kind of tesselated pavement), Scripture incidents, on a large scale. He was a man of varied artistic and mechanical acquirements, and is said to have hastened his death by over-exertion in bronze-casting. His Saint Sebastian is one of the finest pictures in the Borghese palace.

Born at Siena, 1488; died 1551.

BECCARIA CÆSAR BONESANA, Marquis, bek-ka'-re-a, Italian writer on jurisprudence and political economy. He published, in 1764, a treatise on crimes and punishments, which attracted great attention, was translated into English, and is thought to have instigated reforms in the penal code of most of the European states. In 1768, a professorship of public law and economy was established expressly for him at Milan. In 1771, he was made a member of the Supreme Economic Council, and, in 1791, one of the board for the reform of the judicial code. He was of the utilitarian schools, and his views have a great affinity with those of eminent English writers.

Born at Milan, 1735; died 1793.

BECCARIA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Piedmontese natural philosopher, who was professor at Palermo and at Rome, whence he removed to Turin. He was greatly respected by the king of Sardinia, to whose sons he was tutor, and made several discoveries in electricity, publishing some valuable works on that and other philosophical subjects.

Born at Mondovi, 1716; died 1781.

BECCLES, bek'-kels, a market town and borough of Suffolk, on the river Waveney, 33 miles N.E. of Ipswich. It has an elegant Gothic church, enlarged in 1859, a corn exchange, custom house, and free grammar school, and a town-hall. Pop. 4,844. Station on the Great Eastern Railway.

BECERRA, GASPAR, bai-ser'-ra, a celebrated Spanish painter and sculptor, the pupil of Michael Angelo. He painted well in fresco.

Born at Baisa, 1520; died at Madrid, 1570.

BECHER, JOHN JOACHIM, bek'-er, an eminent German chemist. He was of a roving disposition, residing some time at Vienna, and assisting in a variety of manufactures: then at Haarlem, where he invented a machine for throwing silk. In 1680 he went to England, and examined the mines in Cornwall and Scotland, and returning to Germany, he there died. His principal works are "Physica Subterranea," "Institutiones Chymicæ," and "Epistolæ Chymicæ."

Bort at Spires, 1625; died 1682.

BECHSTEIN, JOHANN MATTHEUS, bek'-stine, a celebrated German ornithologist, who, intended for the church, relinquished theology for natural history; and, in 1785, was made professor of the Botanic Institute of Salzmann, at Schnepfenthal. In 1791 he proposed to the duke of Gotha to create a forest-school; but, not meeting with success, he resolved to establish one, at his own cost, at Kammote, near Walterhausen. He afterwards published a journal devoted to forest science, called "Diana;" and in 1800 offered his services to the duke of Saxe-Meiningen, who gave him the direction of a botanic academy, newly founded at Dreis-gacker. Bechstein's whole life was spent in enriching natural history with most important observations. He published many valuable works, of which may be named "German Natural History," "Forest Entomology," "Complete Course of Forest Science," "Natural History of Cage-Birds," which has been translated into English, and has passed through several editions.

Born at Walterhausen, Saxe Gothe, 1757; died 1822.

BECKER, WILHELM ADOLF, archæologist. He studied at the university of Leipsic, and, in 1836, was appointed extraordinary professor of classical archæology, and, 1843, professor of antiquities. He published several works on Greek and Roman Antiquities.

Born at Dresden, 1796; died at Meissen, 1846.

BECKET, THOMAS A, bek'-et, archbishop of Canterbury. He was the son of a London merchant, and received an excellent education, becoming also a proficient in all martial exercises. He studied theology at Paris, and, on his return, soon obtained notice by his talents and agreeable manners. He was appointed archdeacon of Canterbury, and, in 1155, was raised to the dignity of chancellor of England, and in that capacity took part in the war of Toulouse, distinguishing himself by acts of personal prowess. His love of magnificent display was exhibited to an extent beyond precedent. In 1159 he went to France on a special mission to arrange a marriage between the son of Henry II. and the daughter of the king of France, and the magnificence of his retinue excited general wonder. In 1162 he was made archbishop of Canterbury, although he had not taken priest's orders. He now affected extreme and even squalid asceticism, laid aside all his pomp, and resigned the chancellorship. From that time a bitter hostility ensued between him and the king, Becket supporting the authority of the Pope, and the king endeavouring to make the church subordinate to the state. The Saxon populace sided with Becket, the Norman nobility with the king. The strife continued for seven years, and an ill-guarded wish by the king that somebody would relieve him of "this turbulent priest," led to the assassination of Becket, in the cathedral at Canterbury. King Henry was afterwards obliged, by the Pope, to do penance before Becket's tomb, by having his royal back scourged by the monks, and passing one whole day and night fasting upon the bare stones. Two years after his death, Becket was canonized; and his pretended miracles were so numerous that his shrine became the richest in Europe.

Born in London, 1118; died 1170.

BECKFORD, WILLIAM, bek'-ford, the only legitimate son of Alderman Beckford, who, in the time of George III., was twice lord mayor of London. He inherited the alderman's wealth, which enabled him to spend several years in travel, and live for a time in splendid style at Cintra, in Portugal, and to erect at a cost of £273,000, the magnificent structure Fonthill Abbey, Wiltshire, which he afterwards sold, and then erected another house, with a lofty tower, on Lansdowne Hill, Bath. He wrote, in French, "History of the Caliph Vathek," an Arabian tale, which was composed at one sitting. "It took me," said he, "three days and two nights of hard labour. I never took off my clothes the whole time." It is a work of great genius, and, according to Byron, for correctness of costume, beauty of description, and power of imagination, the most eastern and sublime tale of all European imitations. He was the author of several works of less note. He possessed extensive knowledge and artistic taste, but his disposition was morbid and his mode of life solitary and eccentric.

Born 1761; died at Bath, 1844.

BECKINGHAM, CHARLES, bek'-ing-ham, an English dramatic writer, who wrote two plays of merit, viz., "Henry IV. of France," and "Scipio Africanus." He also wrote some poems.

Born in London, 1699; died 1730.

BECKMANN, JOHANN, bek'-man, professor of philosophy at the university of Gottingen, known to the world by his remarkable work entitled "Contributions to the History of Inventions." This work has, in several different editions, appeared in England in a translated form.

Born at Hoya, Hanover, 1739; died at Gottingen, 1811.

BECKSKERICK, bek'-ske-rick, a town of Hungary, standing on the river Theiss, the former 45 miles from Temesvar. It is an important market-town. Pop. 19,600.

BECKUM, beck'-um, a Prussian town in the government of Westphalia, 23 miles S.E. of Munster, and capital of a district of the same name, on the river Werse. Manf. Linen, beer, and spirits. Pop. 2,100.

BECQUEREL, ANTOINE CÆSAR, bek'-e-rel, a distinguished French physicist, to whom we are indebted for several discoveries in electro-chemistry.

Born at Chatillon-sur-Loing, 1788; died 1878.

BEDALE, be'-dail, a market-town and parish in Yorkshire, on a rivulet which runs into the Swale near Gatesby, 34 miles N.W. of York. The church here is a large structure, containing some ancient monuments, and erected in the time of Edward III. It was restored in 1868. During an inroad of the Scots, the inhabitants converted its tower into a fortress; and, from its great strength, were enabled successfully to defend themselves. Pop. 5,550. Station on the North-eastern railway.

BEDARRIEUX, bai-dar'-e-u(r) a town of France, in the department of the Herault, 18 miles from Beziers. Manf. Silks, hosiery, cotton, woollens, leather, and paper. Pop. 8,900.

BEDDOES, THOMAS, bed'-doze, physician and scientific writer. In 1787 he was appointed reader in chemistry, at Oxford, but resigned the office in 1792, in consequence of his approval of the French Revolution. In 1798 he established an hospital for the cure of diseases by the inhalation of certain gases, but the project was a failure. He was a man of great ability, and author of many medical works of repute.

Born at Shifnal, Shropshire, 1760; died 1808.

BEDDOES, THOMAS LOVELL, son of the preceding, a dramatic writer of great genius, educated at the Charter-House and Oxford, who produced at an early age the "Bride's Tragedy," "Death's Jest Book," and other plays, exhibiting remarkable powers, but deficient in dramatic construction. He was a man of independent and eccentric character, and spent several years in travelling about the continent, studying anatomy, and taking part in democratic movements. His death was the result of a fall from his horse.

Born at Clifton, 1803; died 1849.

BEDE, or BEDA, beed, "The Venerable," an ancient English writer, whose fame for learning was so great, that Pope Sergius wrote to his abbot to send him to Rome; but Bede declined the honour. He lived in the monastery at Wearmouth, refusing the dignity of abbot offered to him, and devoted the whole of his life to the writing his "Ecclesiastical History," and other works, and in instructing the young monks. An English council directed his works to be publicly read in churches.

Born at Wearmouth, Durham, 673; died 735.

BEDFORD, bed'-ford, a market-town and parliamentary borough, county town of Bedfordshire, 50 miles N.W. of London, situated on both sides of the Ouse, crossed by a handsome stone bridge of five arches. There are five parish churches, some of which are of considerable antiquity, but recently restored, a district church, and various chapels. There are a corn-exchange, shire-hall, assembly-rooms, infirmary, and gaol. John Bunyan was born near the town, and a handsome building, in the Italian style, the Bunyan schools, was opened in 1867, and a statue of Bunyan erected in 1874. A large sewage farm employs the sewage of the town. Bedford is famous for its public schools, for which it is chiefly indebted to Sir W. Harper, lord mayor of London in 1561. Manf. The large agricultural implement works conduce to the prosperity of the town, and lace and straw-plait are made. Pop. 19,532. Station on the London and North-western and Midland railways.

BEDFORDSHIRE, an inland county of England, bounded on the N. and N.W. by Northamptonshire, on the E. by the counties of Huntingdon, Cambridge, and Hertford, and on the W. by the counties of Buckingham and Northampton. It is the smallest county in England, with the exception of Middlesex, Huntingdon, and Rutland. The surface of the county is generally level, or slightly undulating, excepting on the S., where it is crossed by the Chiltern Hills. The western and eastern parts of the county are, in many parts sandy, the centre is flat, and three-fourths of the whole is judged to be alluvial soil. Limestone, coarse marble, and imperfect coal are obtained here. The rivers are the Ouse, Ivel, Lea, and Ouzel. Area, 461 square miles. Manf. Engineering, the manufacture of agricultural implements, and the plaiting of straw and making thread lace, in which nearly three-fourths of the female population are employed. Towns, BEDFORD, LEIGHTON BUZZARD, DUNSTABLE, and LUTON. Pop. 149,461.

BEDFORD, JOHN, duke, was the third son of Henry IV. of England, and one of the greatest commanders ever opposed to the French. By the will of Henry V. he became regent of France, and well sustained the glory of his country in the whole of the struggle which raged in that kingdom throughout his career. He laid siege to Orleans, which, on account of the supernatural awe which his troops entertained for Joan of Arc, he was compelled to raise; and was subsequently one of the principal instruments in bringing that extraordinary maid to the stake. His death was hastened by vexation at the treaty of peace, signed at Rouen.

Born 1389; died 1435.

BEDFORD, NEW, a port of entry in the state of Massachusetts, United States, 55 miles from Boston. Its inhabitants are principally engaged in whale-fishing, ship-building, and candle-making. Pop. 16,500.—This town communicates with Boston by railway, and has a harbour which connects it with Fairhaven.

BEDFORD, the name of three counties in the United States. 1. In Pennsylvania, bordering on Maryland. Area, 1000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected by fertile valleys, producing wheat, oats, and butter. Pop. 34,929.—2. Another in the S. part of Virginia. Area, 504 square miles. Desc. Fertile, yielding abundance of Indian corn, wheat, oats, and tobacco. Pop. 31,205.—3. In Tennessee. Area, 550 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing corn, tobacco, and wool, and rearing a great number of cattle and swine. Pop. 26,025.

BEDFORD LEVEL, a tract of land in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Northampton, Lincoln, Cambridge, and the isle of Ely, consisting of about 450,000 acres, a large portion of it being marshy ground. At various periods, efforts had been made to reclaim this immense tract; but it was not accomplished till the 17th century, when the Duke of Bedford effected what had baffled all previous attempts; and in later time, extensive works have been constructed. It produces fine crops of grain, flax, and cole-seed.

BEDJA, bed'-ja, a district of Nubia, on the W. coast of the Red Sea, between lat. 19° and 22° 30′ N.

BEDLOE, WILLIAM, bed'-lo, captain, an infamous informer, who gave evidence respecting the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and for his perjury received a reward of £500.
Died 1680.

BEDMAR, ALFONSO DE CUEVA, marquis de, ambassador from Spain to Venice in 1607, who took advantage of his position to conspire with the viceroy of Naples and the governor of Milan, to seize and destroy Venice. One of the conspirators betrayed the plot, and several persons were executed. Otway's play of "Venice Preserved" is founded on this incident. Bedmar afterwards went to Flanders, and in 1622 was made a cardinal, and afterwards bishop of Oviedo in Spain.
Born 1572; died at Oviedo, 1655.

BEDNORE, or NUGGUR, bed'-nor, a town of Hindostan, in the territories of the rajah of Mysore, the chief town of a district of the same name. This was once a magnificent city, containing 100,000 inhabitants, fortified by natural and artificial defences; but it has been greatly reduced in the course of its successive captures, by Hyder Ali (who, in 1763, pillaged it of property value £12,000,000), Tippoo, and the British. Here, in 1783, General Matthews, being attacked by a vastly superior force under Tippoo Sahib, was obliged to surrender, and he and the principal officers were put to death, the remainder of his force being closely imprisoned. Lat. 13° 50′ N. Lon. 75° 6′ E.

BEDNORE, the district of which the above-named is the chief town. It occupies the summit of the Western Ghauts, at an elevation of about 5,000 feet. The soil is very fertile.

BEDOUIN, bai'-dou-an, a French town, department of Vaucluse. It is surrounded by old walls. Manf. Silk and pottery. Pop. 2,600. This town was the scene of a frightful massacre of the inhabitants at the time of the great Revolution.

BEECHER, LYMAN, D.D., bé'-cher, studied divinity under President Dwight, in Yale College, United States, and in 1798 became pastor of a church at East Hampton. He subsequently became pastor of a church at Boston, and took an active part in the opposition to Dr. Channing and others, in the controversy which occurred among members of a number of the churches of New England, in 1826. In 1832 he became president of the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati; but after 1842 he resided principally at Boston. He was the author of many theological works, sermons, and treatises on temperance.
Born at Nowhaven, Connecticut, 1775; died 1863.

BEECHER, HENRY WARD, son of the above, studied theology under his father at Lane Seminary, and in 1847 became pastor of the Plymouth church, in Brooklyn, New York. As a preacher, he is said to have the largest congregation in the United States. In 1875 he was prominently before the public in connection with a memorable trial arising out of charges of immorality which were not established.
Born at Litchfield, Connecticut, 1813.

BEECHER, HARRIET. (See STOWE.)

BEECHWORTH, a town in Victoria, Australia, 185 miles N.E. of Melbourne, the chief town of the Oven gold fields. There are a town-hall, several churches and chapels, and several other good public buildings. Pop. 3,300.

BEECHY, SIR WILLIAM, R.A., bé'-che, a celebrated English portrait-painter, who, although originally articled to a conveyancer, pursued his art with such ardour that he became portrait-painter to the queen of George III. He painted the portraits of most of the celebrated characters of his time, became a Royal Academician, and received the honour of knighthood.
Born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, 1753; died at Hampstead, 1839.

BEECHY, FREDERIC WILLIAM, son of the above, early entered the navy, and in 1818 accompanied Franklin as a lieutenant in his voyage in search of the North-west Passage. Being possessed of considerable artistic talent, he made drawings of many of the natural objects which came under his observation in this expedition, and for which he was rewarded by a parliamentary grant of £200. In the following year he accompanied Sir Edward Parry to the Polar Seas, and in 1821 was commissioned with his brother, to examine the coasts of N. Africa to the east of Tripoli. On his return from this service, he received the command of the Blossom, with orders to penetrate the Polar Sea by the Pacific Ocean and Behring's Strait, while Franklin was to make the attempt over-land by N. America. This expedition occupied two years and a half. In 1827 he received the rank of post-captain, and being afterwards unemployed for some time, he devoted himself to writing accounts of the various expeditions in which he had been engaged. Between 1829 and 1839, he was employed in surveying the coasts of S. America and Ireland, and in 1854 was created rear-admiral of the blue. In the following year he was elected president of the Geographical Society.
Born in London, 1796; died 1856.

BEETHOVEN, LUDWIG VON, bait'-ho-ven, a celebrated musical composer, and the pupil of Haydn. He was descended from a family remarkable for musical ability, and in his thirteenth year he was capable of playing extemporaneous fantasias which were the admiration of the most accomplished musicians of his time. About 1791 he composed his opera of "Leonore," better known in England by the name of "Fidelio," which, however, had not much success. He continued, however, to compose, bequeathing to posterity a noble monument of his industry and genius in his many brilliant compositions, the most famous among which are the pastoral "Eroica Choral," and other symphonies, overtures, sonatas, and quartettes for piano and stringed instruments. In 1845 a statue was erected to his memory in his native town, in the presence of the queen of England; and in 1870 the centenary of his birth was celebrated by a festival.

Born at Bonn, 1770; died 1827.

BEFORT, or BELFORT, bel'-for, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, on the small river Savoureuse, 36 miles from Strasburg. It carries on an extensive trade with Switzerland and Germany. Pop. about 8,000. It is a strong place, and was fortified by Vauban.

BEGAS, KARL, bai'-gas, German historical painter, who studied at Paris, and at an early age attracted the notice of the king of Prussia, who gave him several commissions. He painted for the royal gallery portraits of eminent Prussian men of letters; but he generally preferred historical and scriptural subjects.

Born at Heinsberg, 1794; died 1854.

BEGEYN, ABRAHAM, be'-gine, a Dutch painter, who executed some fine landscapes for the royal palaces, and several good pictures, which are at the Hague.

Born in Holland, 1650; died 1710.

BEG-SHEHR, beg-sher', a freshwater lake of Asia Minor, in the province of Karamania, 44 miles S.W. of Konujeh. The lake is about 20 miles long, and from 5 to 10 broad, containing many small islands. It is supposed to be the ancient Caralites.

BEG-SHEHR, a town, on the river of the same name, flowing into the above lake. There are some handsome buildings, including a highly ornamented mosque, but the town generally is mean and dirty.

BEGYN, or BEGA, CORNELIS, Dutch painter and engraver, a pupil of Ostade, whose style he followed. He led an irregular life, and died of the plague.

Lat. between 24° and 28° N. Lon. 83° and 89° E.

History.—The province comprises the ancient kingdom of Magadha, which, when Alexander the Great invaded India, was one of the most magnificent in the world, and which flourished until the 5th century of our era. Ancient Behar was the cradle of Buddhism, and is held by the Chinese and other Buddhist nations to be sacred. In 1202, Behar was annexed to the dominions of the Mahometan rulers of Bengal. The East India Company acquired it in 1765.

BEHBEHAN, be'-be-han', a walled town of Persia, in the province of Fars. It stands in a fertile plain, at the distance of 130 miles from Shiraz. Pop. about 4,000.

BEHEM, or BEHAIM, MARTIN, be'-hem, a German geographer and navigator, who, in 1484, explored the west coast of Africa, is said to have discovered the isle of Fayal and the Brazils, and to have sailed as far as the Straits of Magellan; but this is doubtful. John II. of Portugal created him a chevalier. There is, at Nuremberg, a very curious globe made by him, on which are traced his discoveries.

Born at Nuremberg, 1430; died at Lisbon, 1506.

BEHISTUN, or BISUTUN, be-his-tun', a ruined town of Persia, in the province of Irak-Ajemi, in the neighbourhood of which is a mountain, on the perpendicular face of which is a remarkable inscription, with sculptures, in the cuneiform character, deciphered by Sir H. Rawlinson.

BEHMEN, JACOB. (See BOEHME.)

BEHN, APHRA, ben, an English authoress, who, at Surinam, where her father was lieutenant-general, became acquainted with Prince Oroonoko, whose story she afterwards published. In 1666 she was at Antwerp, where, it is said, she was employed as a spy by the English government, and discovered the design of the Dutch to ascend the Thames and burn the English fleet. This intelligence she communicated to the English court; but it was treated with contempt. She subsequently returned to London, and devoted herself to pleasure and the muses, writing several plays, histories, and novels, which evince a lively but most licentious imagination. Pope refers to her as Astrea.—"The stage how loosely does Astrea tread."

Born at Canterbury, 1642; died in London, 1689.

BEHNESEH, be-ne'-seh, a town of Central Egypt, 110 miles S.S.W. of Cairo, formerly a place of considerable importance, as indicated by extensive ruins.

BEHRING, VITUS, beer'-ing, a German, who, entering the naval service of Russia, was subsequently, by the empress Catherine, promoted to the command of various expeditions fitted out for the purposes of geographical discovery. Behring's Strait derives its name from him, although it is believed that he never reached it; and he was the founder of a settlement at Petropaulovski.

BEKE, CHARLES TILSTONE, beke, an eminent traveller, geographer, and biblical investigator. He was educated for commercial life, but was led to turn his attention to philology and its kindred sciences, and in 1834 published a work on primeval history. From 1836 to 1838 he was acting British consul in Saxony, and from 1838 to 1846 spent the greater part of his time in Abyssinia, publishing, on his return to Europe, "An Essay on the Nile and its Tributaries," and other works of a similar character. In 1865 he undertook a mission to procure the release of Colonel Cameron and the other British and European captives in Abyssinia, but in this he was unsuccessful. In 1870 he received a pension on the civil list. In his 74th year he made a journey for the purpose of determining the real position of Mount Sinai.

Born in London, 1800; died at Bromley, in Kent, 1874.

BEKES, or BEKESVAR, a market-town of Hungary, at the confluence of the two branches of the river Koros. A large trade is done in corn, cattle, flax, wine, and honey. Pop. 32,616.

BEKKER, BALTHAZAR, bek'-er, a Dutch divine, who published a book entitled "The World Bewitched," in which he opposed the popular superstitions respecting witchcraft, incantations, &c. which, from its rationalistic mode of dealing with the influence of Satan, led to his being deprived of his ministry. This work has been translated into French, English, and Italian.

Born in Friesland, 1634; died at Amsterdam, 1698.

BEKKER, IMMANUEL, German philologist, appointed, in 1810, professor in the university of Berlin. He edited a large number of classical authors, and the Byzantine historians.

Born at Orsova, 1684; died at Presburg, 1749.

BELA, or BEYLA, bé'-la, a town of Beloochistan, on the river Poorally. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 26° 1′ N. Lon. 66° 4′ E.

BELALCAZAR, bal'-al-ka'-zer, a Spanish town, province of Andalusia, on the left bank of the Caganchas, 45 miles N.N.W. of Cordova. There is an ancient fortress of great strength. Pop. 3,400.

BELASPOOR, bel'-as-poor, a town of Hindostan, on the left bank of the Sutlej, in a fertile valley, 1,465 feet above the sea level, 60 miles N.E. of Loodiana.

BELBEYS, bel'-bez, a town of Lower Egypt, on the E. arm of the Nile, 28 miles N.N.E of Cairo. Pop. 5,000.

BELCHITE, bal-keet', a Spanish town, province of Arragon, 30 miles S.S.E. of Saragossa. There is an old Gothic parish church. Manf. Serge, blankets, coarse cloths, and linen. Pop. 2,400.

BELEM. (See LISBON.)

BELEM. (See PARA.)

BELENYES, bai-lan'-yes, a town of Hungary, 32 miles S.E. of Groswardein. In the vicinity are quarries of beautiful black marble, and iron, copper, and silver mines. Pop. 3,300.

BELESIS, bel'-e-sis, a Chaldean, who raised Arbaces to the throne of Media, for which he was rewarded with the government of Babylon, 770 B.C. When Sardanapalus, with his gold and silver, was burnt in his palace, Belesis was permitted to take away the ashes, and extracted immense treasures.

Lived in the 8th century B.C.

BELFAST, bel-fast', the capital of the province of Ulster, a municipal and parliamentary borough, and the chief manufacturing and commercial town of Ireland, is situated at the mouth of the Lagan, which flows into Belfast Lough. It is built on alluvial deposit, and land reclaimed from the sea. On the opposite eastern bank of the river is a large suburb, Ballymacarret. The Lagan is crossed by the Queen's Bridge, opened in 1843, and two other bridges. The chief public buildings are the corn exchange, commercial-buildings, white and brown linen halls, museum, several handsome banks, townhall, customs, inland revenue and post-offices, the Albert Memorial, Royal Academical institution, Queen's college, General Assembly's college, and other educational institutions. There are about twenty Episcopalian churches, more than that number belonging to the Presbyterian body, and nearly forty places of worship, including a Roman Catholic cathedral, for other denominations. There are seven large docks and tidal basins, and extensive works, undertaken in 1840, to deepen the channel of the river, enable ships of large size to be brought up to the quay, which extends for about a mile on each side of the river. The outer harbour is large and safe. The scenery around Belfast Lough is very picturesque. The lough is 13 miles long, and 8 miles wide at the entrance.

Manf. and Commerce.—Flax-spinning and linen-weaving are the staple of the town. About 30,000,000 lbs. of linen yarn are annually produced, and there are about 13,000 looms employed in weaving, about five per cent. of the population being engaged in connexion with the linen trade. Damasks and linen goods generally are manufactured. Cotton-spinning, at one time extensively carried on, is now comparatively unimportant. It is estimated that the annual exports are of the value of £20,000,000. A large trade is carried on with British North America, France, Belgium, the Baltic, and the Mediterranean.

Communications.—There is regular steam communication with Barrow, Bristol, Whitehaven, Glasgow, Greenock, Dublin, Cork, Waterford, Fleetwood, Liverpool, Plymouth, and London. A station on the Belfast and Northern Counties railway.

Population in 1881, 207,671, about two thirds being Protestants and one third Catholics.

Lat. 54° 36′ N. Lon. 5° 56′ W.

BELFAST, a seaport of Maine, United States, capital of Waldo county, beautifully situated at the north-west part of Penobscot Bay. There is a good harbour. Pop. 5,308.

BELFORD, bel'-ford, a market-town in Northumberland, about 2 miles from the sea. The church has been recently rebuilt, in the early English style. Pop. 1,724.

BELFORT, bal'-for, a fortified town of France, formerly in the department of the Upper Rhine, but since the Franco-German war of 1870 not included in any department. It is situated on the left bank of the Savoureuse, 38 miles S.S.W. of Colmar, and, from its position, carries on a large trade with Germany and Switzerland. It is a most important military post, and there are a citadel and intrenched camp. The church of St. Christophe is very handsome, and there are a college, public library, and hospital. Manf. Iron, tin-plate, leather, and hats. Pop. 8,000.

BELGARD, bel-gard', a Prussian town, in the province of Pomerania, 20 miles E.S.E. of Colberg. It is surrounded by a wall, and has an old castle. Manf. Cloth and tobacco. Pop. 6,200.

BELGAUM, bel-gaum, a district of British India, in the Bombay presidency. In the northern and eastern parts the country is open and well cultivated, but mountainous and thickly wooded in the south. The principal cereals, rice, sugar, and tobacco, are cultivated. Area, 4,591 square miles. Pop. 864,014, of whom more than half are Hindoos. Lat. between 15° 30′ and 16° 15′ N. Lon. between 74° and 76° 30′ E. The chief town, Belgaum, has a population of about 30,000. The district was ceded to the East India Company by the Peishwa in 1817. Capital of same name. Pop. 32,697.

BELGERN, bel-gern', a Prussian town, province of Saxony. The markets are large and well frequented. Pop. 3,300.

BELGIOJOSO, bel'-jio-jo'-so, a town of Italy, 8 miles S.E. of Pavia, situated on a fertile plain, between the Po and Olona. The old castle has been converted into a superb château. There is an important annual fair. Pop. 2,800.

BELGIUM, bel'-je-um, a kingdom of central Europe, bounded on the N. by the Netherlands, E. by the duchy of Luxembourg, Rhenish Prussia, and Dutch Limbourg, S. and S.W. by France, and N.W. by the North Sea. In point of size it ranks as the sixteenth, and in population the tenth, of European states. The greatest length from N.W. to S.E. is 174 miles; and greatest breadth from N. to S. 105. The country may be regarded as an inclined plane, interspersed with hills in the S.E., more or less gradually falling away in slopes, until they finally sink into plains, only a few feet above the level of the sea. It has, properly speaking, no mountains, and what hills it has are connected with the Ardennes and the Vosges, which, stretching along the S. of Namur, occupy the greater part of Luxembourg, and attain their culminating point in the neighbourhood of Spa, where they rise to 2,000 feet above the level of the sea. In the south-eastern provinces there are large forests containing a great deal of oak, from which charcoal is made for the iron-foundries, and the bark is used for tanning. In the western and north-western provinces there are extensive, fertile, and highly-cultivated plains. In some parts near the sea, the land is so low that embankments are necessary to protect it from inundation. About 190 square miles have been reclaimed from the sea and rivers.

Rivers.—The Scheldt, Meuse, Yser, with their tributaries. The Scheldt, which has a length of 108 miles from S.W. to N.E., is navigable throughout. The Meuse has a nearly parallel course of 115 miles, and is also navigable. The Yser, which flows into the sea at Nieuport, is navigable for 26 miles. Of the smaller streams, affluents of those above named, there are 370 miles navigable. There are 29 canals, with a navigable length of 376 miles.

Climate.—Wet and foggy, except in the S.E.

Pro.—There is no country in the world in which agriculture has been brought to a higher state of perfection. One-fourth of the population is engaged in agricultural pursuits. The chief objects of culture are flax, hemp, rape-seed, clover, hops, and potatoes, with the usual cereals. Beet-root, chicory, and tobacco are raised in the central provinces. It is estimated that less than one-seventh of the country is uncultivated.

Minerals.—Coal (of which about 15,000,000 tons are yearly raised, more than 285 pits being worked), iron, lead, copper, zinc, marble, and building stones. There are numerous mineral springs, especially in the neighbourhood of Liége and at Spa.

Manf.—Important; linen yarn and cloths, carpets, woollen cloths, linens, lace, cotton, hardware, and cutlery; embroidery, ribbons, hats, hosiery, leather, oil-cloth, paper, glass, porcelain, nail-making, bronze-wares, chemicals, beer, spirits, vinegar, sugar, and scientific and musical instruments.

Commerce.—The chief exports are coal, corn, flax, hemp, oil, silk, laces, woollen, linen, and cotton goods; arms and hardware. The principal imports, colonial produce, and the raw material for woollen and cotton manufactures.

Area, 11,373 square miles.

Provinces and Population.—There are nine provinces. The following was the result of a census taken at the end of 1876:—

Provinces.	Inhabitants.
Antwerp	625,876
Brabant	1,044,324
East Flanders	714,785
West Flanders	915,464
Hainault	1,021,158
Liége	702,149
Limbourg	216,794
Luxembourg	213,373
Namur	331,095
	5,784,958

Belgium is the most densely populated country of Europe, having 508 inhabitants to the square mile. (See each province under proper heading.)

Principal Towns.—BRUSSELS, ANTWERP, GHENT, LIEGE, BRUGES, VERVIERS, TOURNAY, MALINES, LOUVAIN, ARLON, and NAMUR.

Railways.—There are more than 2,000 miles of railway, of which about one-fourth belongs to the state.

Government.—Belgium is a constitutional, representative, and hereditary monarchy. The legislative power is vested in the King, the Chamber of representatives, and the Senate. The royal succession is in the direct male line in the order of primogeniture.

Religion and Education.—The Roman Catholic religion is professed by nearly the entire population. The Protestants do not amount to 15,000, while the Jews number a little over 2,000. Full religious liberty is granted by the constitution, and part of the income of the ministers of all denominations is paid from the national treasury. The kingdom is divided into six Roman Catholic dioceses, the archbishopric of Malines, and the bishoprics of Bruges, Ghent, Liége, Namur, and Tournay. There is no compulsory law of education. Numerous public schools are established, supported by communal, provincial, and government funds, and gratuitous education is afforded to those who are unable to pay for it; but notwithstanding these facilities more than 40 per cent. of the whole population are unable to read or write. For the higher education there are ten royal athenæums, for professional and classical instruction two state, one free, and one Roman Catholic university, the latter having by far the greater number of pupils. The Jesuits' colleges are numerously attended.

Language.—French is the language of the upper and educated classes, and is generally understood. The Walloon (a dialect of the ancient French), Flemish, and Dutch, are spoken in the provinces.

History.—Belgium takes its name from the old inhabitants, the Belgæ, and at different times, from the 15th century, formed part of the dominions of Austria and Spain. In 1795 it was conquered by the French, and at the peace of 1814 was joined to Holland, when they together formed the kingdom of the Netherlands. A portion of Flanders, so conspicuous in history as "the cockpit of Europe," is included in the present kingdom of Belgium, which formed itself into an independent state. The secession was decreed on the 4th of October, 1830, by a provisional government, established in consequence of a revolution which broke out at Brussels on the 25th of August, 1830. A national congress elected Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg king of the Belgians on the 4th of June, 1831; the prince accepted the dignity July 12, and ascended the throne July 21, 1831. The crown had previously been offered to, but was refused by, the Duke de Nemours, second son of King Louis Philippe of the French. It was not until after the signing of the treaty of London, April 19th, 1839, which established peaceful relations between King Leopold I. and the sovereign of the Netherlands, that all the states of Europe recognised the kingdom of Belgium.

BELGOROD, bel-go-rod', or "white town," a Russian town in the province of Kursk, on the Donetz. It is an archbishop's see, and has numerous churches and two monasteries. Manf. Leather and soap; a large trade is carried on in wax, bristles, and hemp. Three large fairs are held. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 50° 40′ N. Lon. 36° 35′ E.

BELGRADE, bel-graid', a town and fortress of Servia, the capital of the principality, near the conflux of the Save and Danube, on the right bank of the latter stream. The number of mosques in the town is considerable. They are protected by treaty from actual demolition, but are falling into decay; and the progress of building in modern style is rapidly changing the Oriental appearance of the town. There are a royal and an episcopal palace, government offices, a cathedral, and several Greek and other churches, a citadel, barracks, and some good commercial buildings. The ruins of Prince Eugene's palace are historically interesting. The university was established in 1863.

Manf.—Arms, cutlery, saddlery, carpets, cottons, and silk goods.

Pop. 35,471.

Lat. 44° 47′ N. Lon. 20° 28′ E.

History.—This important fortress was taken by Solyman, the Turkish emperor, in 1521; retaken by the Imperialists, under the elector of Bavaria, in 1688; but again lost in 1690. It surrendered to Prince Eugene in 1717, but was taken by the Turks in 1739. The Imperialists retook it in the year 1789, but were forced to restore it at the peace of 1791. In the year 1806 it was taken by the Servian insurgents; and in 1813 was greatly injured by the Servian insurrection. In 1815 the town was placed under Prince Milosch, subject to Turkey, but surrendered to the Servians in 1867. (See SERVIA.)

BELGRADO, GIACOMO, bel-gra'-do, an Italian Jesuit, who was an eminent mathematician, antiquary, and poet. His works are principally in Latin, and in his eighty-first year he published a book filled with new views in Egyptian architecture. In one of his works he endeavours to demonstrate the existence of God by geometrical theorems.

Born at Udina, 1704; died 1789.

BELIAL, be-lē'-yal, "wicked," "rebellious," or "worthless," as a licentious person. The Jews applied this title to the devil.

BELIDOR, BERNARD FOREST DE, bel'-e-dor, a continental engineer, professor of the French school of artillery at La Fère, well known by his "Dictionnaire Portatif de l'Ingénieur," and his "Course of Mathematics, Hydraulics, and Architecture," for engineer and artillery officers. This work rapidly passed through many editions, and Belidor's fame brought around him military men of all countries and high rank to gain instruction. He made numerous experiments on, and entered deeply into, the powers of gunpowder; and discovered that it was erroneous to suppose that the greater the charge the further the bullet would be carried; and he proved that nearly one half of the powder used at that time was wasted.

Born in Catalonia, 1693; died at Paris, 1761.

BELING, RICHARD, bē'-ling, an Irish writer, who was concerned in the rebellion of 1641, and was appointed ambassador from the council of Kilkenny to the pope in 1645. On his return, he went over to the marquis of Ormond, through whose intercession at the restoration he recovered his estates.

Born at Belingstown, Dublin, 1613; died at Dublin, 1677.

BELISARIUS, bel'-i-sai'-re-us, a Roman general in the emperor Justinian's reign, who, in 530, ended the war in which that prince was engaged with the Persians. In 533 he took Carthage, and made prisoner Gelimer, king of the Vandals. He was next sent against the Goths, in Italy; and, arriving on the coasts of Sicily, he took Catania, Syracuse, Palermo, and other places. He then proceeded to Naples, which he took, and marched to Rome. After this he conquered Vitiges, king of the Goths, and sent him to Constantinople, at the same time refusing the crown, which was offered him. For these great exploits he was selected sole consul in 535, and was regarded as the saviour of the empire; and medals are still extant which bear this inscription, Belisarius gloria Romanorum. He was soon obliged to go into the East against Chosroes I., king of Persia; and, having succeeded, he returned to Italy, whence he expelled the Huns in 558. In 563 Belisarius was accused of participating in a conspiracy against the emperor, who imprisoned him, and confiscated his estates, to which, however, he was shortly restored. The story of his being a blind beggar in his latter days is a fiction. He married, 527, Antonina, an actress of abandoned character, who exercised great influence over him, and doubtless was the cause of the worst passages of his life.

Born at Germania, in Illyria, about 505; died 565.

BELIZE, be-leez', the capital of British Honduras, at the mouth of a river of the same name. It exports mahogany, rosewood, cedar, logwood, cocoa-nuts, and sugar. There is regular steamboat communication with Jamaica. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 17° 29′ N. Lon. 88° 8′ W.

BELKNAP, bel'-nap, a county of the United States, in New Hampshire. Fertile and productive in the usual cerealia, with numerous saw-mills upon its streams and rivers, and several iron-foundries. Area, 387 square miles. Pop. 18,000.

BELL, ANDREW, bel', educational reformer. A clergyman of the Church of England, who, while chaplain at Madras, taught the children in the military asylum, and introduced the monitor system, which he described in a pamphlet published on his return to England in 1797. His method was adopted by Joseph Lancaster, and soon spread. Bell organized a series of schools, and for his exertions was made prebend of Westminster and master of Sherborn Hospital, Durham. He left a large fortune for the purpose of founding the Madras College at St. Andrews, and for the promotion of education at Edinburgh, Leith, Glasgow, Inverness, Aberdeen, and other places.

Born at St. Andrews, 1753; died at Cheltenham, 1832.

BELL, HENRY, the first person who applied steam successfully to the purposes of navigation in Europe. He was apprenticed to a millwright in Scotland, and afterwards worked as an engineer in London. In 1812 he launched a small steam-vessel, which he called the Comet, on the river Clyde, to be propelled with a steam-engine of his own construction; and so successful was his experiment, that it encouraged others of greater means to undertake similar enterprises.

Born in Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 1767; died at Helensburgh, on the Clyde, 1830.

BELL, JOHN, an eminent modern sculptor, who executed many beautiful and graceful figures; among which may be noticed his "Una and the Lion," his "Babes in the Wood," his "Dorothea," and his "Child's own Attitude," now the property of the Queen. He also sculptured some of the historical statues for the new Houses of Parliament; such as Falkland, Shakspere, and some others.

Born in Norfolk, 1800.

BELL, SIR CHARLES, son of a poor Scotch clergyman, one of the most distinguished anatomists of modern times, and the discoverer of the arrangement and operation of the nervous system, which places him on an equality with Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. He was a most industrious writer on professional subjects, was professor of anatomy and physiology to the College of Surgeons, and afterwards professor of surgery in the University of Edinburgh. He was knighted in 1830.

Born at Edinburgh, 1774; died at Hallow Park, near Worcester, 1842.

BELLAI, or BELLAY, GUILLAUME DU, bel-lai', a French general of great distinction, and one of the ablest negotiators of his time. In 1537 he was appointed viceroy in Piedmont, and obtained several victories over the Imperialists. He wrote a history of his own times.

Born at Glatigny, 1491; died 1543.

BELLAMY, JACOBUS, bel'-la-me, Dutch poet, at first apprenticed to a baker, but some friends, noticing his abilities, sent him to the University of Utrecht. His songs and poems are very popular, and he is looked upon as one of the creators of modern Dutch literature.

Born at Flushing, 1757; died 1786.

BELLARMINE, ROBERT FRANCIS ROMULUS, bel'-ar-meen, a Roman cardinal, who, at the age of eighteen, entered in the society of Jesuits. In 1599 he was made a cardinal, and in 1601 archbishop of Capua; but resigned the see in 1605, and was afterwards bishop of Montepulciano. His writings are numerous, but chiefly polemical, and have acquired a great reputation. He was one of the most virtuous members of the conclave, and was accustomed to say that "one ounce of peace was worth a pound of victory."

Born at Montepulciano, Tuscany, 1542; died at Rome, 1621.

BELLARY, or BELLARI, bel'-a-re, a district of British India, in the Madras presidency. The extreme length from N. to S. is 170 miles; breadth from E. to W. 120 miles. The most elevated tracts are in the west and south, where the surface of the country rises to the lofty table-lands of the Mysore. The general character of the district is that of a plateau, about 900 feet as average elevation, between the Eastern and Western Ghauts. The rivers are small hill-streams, none of which are navigable. Pro. Cotton, indigo, rice, sugar, hemp, tobacco, and grain. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, antimony, and manganese. Diamonds are occasionally found, and at one time were numerous. Manf. Cotton, carpets, blankets, paper, leather, glass, oil, dyes, and sugar. Area, 11,496 square miles. Pop. 1,336,696, nearly all of whom are Hindoos.

BELLARY, capital of the above district. The fort is situated on a huge granite rock 450 feet above the plain. The town is the head-quarters of the military forces in India, and the cantonment is considered to be one of the best in India. Pop. 53,460. Lat. 15° 18′ N. Lon. 76° 59′ E.

BELLAY, JOACHIM DU, bel'-ai, a French poet, surnamed the French Ovid, was celebrated for his odes, both in French and Latin. He was the first French writer of good sonnets. He entered the church, and was nominated archbishop of Bordeaux, but did not live to enjoy the honour.

Born near Angers, 1524; died at Paris, 1560.

BELLE ALLIANCE, LA, la bel al-lé'-ans, a hamlet of Belgium, 13 miles from Brussels, and memorable for being the nucleus of the operations in the field of Waterloo, and the locality where Napoleon I. commanded in this conflict, designated by the Prussians the battle of La Belle Alliance, fought on the 18th June, 1815. After the battle had been won, it was here that Wellington and Blucher met.

BELLEAU, REMY, bel'-lo, a French poet, one of the seven poets known as la Pléiade Française, and whose pastorals are held in great esteem.

Born at Nogent-le-Rotrou, 1528; died at Paris, 1577.

BELLEISLE, bel-ile, an island of British North America, in the Atlantic Ocean, lying between Labrador and the N. extremity of Newfoundland. Area, 21 miles in circumference. Lat. 52° N. Lon. 56° W.

BELLEISLE-EN-MER, bel-eel-ă-mair, an island of France, in the Atlantic, 8 miles from Quiberon Point, about 10 miles long, and 5 broad. It is noted for the excellence of its draught-horses and its wheat. The fisheries and the preservation of sardines and anchovies are profitable industries. The chief town is Palais, which has a good port, and about 3,400 inhabitants. Pop. about 10,000.—In 1761 the island was captured by the British, and held by them till 1763. In 1765 an attempt was made to retake it, but it failed.

BELLENDEN, or BALLANTYNE, JOHN, bel'-len-den, Scotch poet and translator, who took the degree of doctor at the University of Paris, and was afterwards archdeacon of Moray. He strenuously opposed the Reformation. He translated Boece and Livy, and was the author of some admired small poems.

Died at Rome, 1536.

BELLENDEN, WILLIAM, Scotch classical scholar and author. Very little is known of his life, but he appears to have been for some time a professor in the University of Paris. He wrote the lives of Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny. Hallam speaks in the highest terms of his powers as a philosopher, critic, and historian.

Born 1610.

BELLEROPHON, bel-ler'-o-fon, in mythology, son of Glaucus, king of Ephyre, by Eurymede, was at first called Hipponous. The murder of his brother, whom some call Alcimenus and Bellero, procured him the name of Bellerophon, or murderer of Bellero. After this murder, Bellerophon fled to the court of Prœtus, king of Argos, whose wife became enamoured of him; and because he slighted her passion, she sought to destroy him. He, however, escaped her machinations, was introduced to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, and after a number of adventures, in one of which he conquered the Chimæra, he married the daughter of Jobates and succeeded to the throne of Lycia.

BELLEVILLE, bel'-veel, capital of the county of St. Clair, in Illinois, United States, 14 miles S.E. of St. Louis. It is a thriving commercial city. Manf. Woollens, iron, beer, and flour. Many Germans reside there. Pop. 10,683.

BELLEY, bel-lai', French town in the department of Aine, near the Rhône, 39 miles E. of Lyons. It is the seat of a bishopric, and there are an episcopal palace, a cathedral, a school, museum, and library. There are the remains of a Roman temple. Manf. Cotton-weaving; silkworms are cultivated. Pop. 4,000.

BELLHEIM, bel-hime', a market-town of Bavaria, of great antiquity, on the Spiegelbach. Pop. 2,700.

BELLIN, JAMES NICHOLAS, bel-lă, a French marine geographer, who was member of the Royal Society of London, and published the "Hydrographie Françoise," containing maps of all the coast-board in the world then known, and several other valuable geographical works.

Born at Paris, 1703; died at Versailles, 1772.

BELLINI, or BELLIN, GENTILE, bel-lé'-ne, a Venetian painter, son of a painter of some eminence. He was employed by the republic in painting the pictures for the council-hall. It is said that, while at Constantinople, he was engaged by Mahomet II. to paint the Beheading of St. John the Baptist. The sultan, who was a connoisseur, pronounced the work inaccurate, and ordered a slave to be beheaded in his presence, to prove that the skin of the Baptist's neck was faultily painted. This sight so shocked the painter, that he took the earliest opportunity to return to his own country.

Born 1421; died 1507.

BELLINI, GIOVANNI, brother of the above, who, with his brother, is generally held to be the founder of the Venetian school of painting, which afterwards produced Giorgione and Titian. His pictures are considered the rarest among the most valued treasures of religious art, and, when sold, obtain enormous prices. He lived to an advanced age.

Born 1424; died 1516.

BELLINI, LORENZO, Italian physician and anatomist, studied at Pisa, and when only 20 years of age was appointed professor of philosophy there. He was afterwards physician to the Grand Duke Cosmo of Florence, and to Pope Clement XI. He was the author of works of repute.

Born at Florence, 1643; died 1703.

BELLINI, VINCENZO, bel'-le-ne, a distinguished musical composer, who in his youth discovered so much genius as to induce the inhabitants of his native town, Catania, to send him to Naples to study at their expense. In his twenty-third year, he produced his first opera, which was performed within the walls of the Conservatorio at Naples, and contained sufficient indications of the originality of his genius, to raise high expectations in those who heard it. In 1829 he produced "I Montecchi e Capulete," and shortly afterwards, at Milan, "La Sonnambula" and "Norma," both of which were received with the utmost enthusiasm. In 1833 appeared his "Beatrice di Tenda," which was heavy; and, in 1834, came forth his "I Puritani," which is one of his most brilliant efforts, and shortly after this he was taken ill, and ended his short career in a few days.

Born at Catania, in Sicily, 1802; died at Puteaux, near Paris, 1835.

BELLINZONA, or BELLENZ, bel-in-zo'-na, a town in the Swiss Canton of Tessin, or Ticino. It is fortified, and there are three castles. The abbey church, built in the 16th century, contains some fine paintings. A large trade is carried on with Italy, and the "acqua di cedro," made from the blossom and rind of the orange, is a famous speciality of the town. Pop. 21,000.

BELLMAN, KARL MIKAEL, bel'-man, Swedish poet, considered to be the greatest lyric poet of his country. He improvised verses when a little child, and began to publish at the age of 17. Some of his songs and odes, chiefly of an amatory and tender kind, are very elegant. His fine person and voice, and great gifts of mimicry made him a favourite companion of royalty. Several statues have been erected to his memory, especially one in the public gardens of Stockholm, erected in 1829 by the Swedish Academy. His finest poems were extemporaneous effusions.

Born at Stockholm, 1740; died 1795.

BELLONA, bel-lo'-na, in mythology the goddess of war, and, according to some, the sister of Mars, but according to others, his daughter or his wife. The Romans paid great adoration to her. In her temple at Rome, the senators gave audience to foreign ambassadors, and to generals returned from war. At the gate was a small column, called the "column of war," against which they threw a spear whenever war was declared against an enemy.

BELLOT, JOSEPH RENE, bel'-lo, French Arctic explorer, a lieutenant in the French Navy, who accompanied Captains Kennedy and Inglefield, on the expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin. In the last voyage, he accidentally lost his life. An obelisk was erected in front of Greenwich hospital to his memory.

Born at Paris, 1826; died 1852.

BELLOTTI, PETER, bel-lo'-te, an Italian artist, who painted portraits and caricatures with astonishing exactness and delicacy.

Born at Volgano, 1825; died at Garignano, 1700.

BELLOVAR, bel-o'-var, a fortified town of Austria, on the Croatian military frontier. Manf. Silk and pottery. Pop. 2,800.

BELLOY, PIERRE LAURENT BURETTE DE, bel-loi', a French dramatist, who was for some time an advocate, but quitted the law for the stage, and went to Russia, where he acted as a comedian with considerable success. Returning to France in 1758, he brought out his tragedy of "Titus," which was followed by the "Siege of Calais," and other pieces. —The inhabitants of Calais were so delighted with the tragedy of the "Siege of Calais," that they sent him the freedom of their town in a gold box.

Born at St. Flour, 1727; died 1775.

BELL ROCK, or INCH CAPE, bel' rok, a reef of rocks in the German Ocean, 12 miles south of Arbroath. It has a lighthouse 90 feet high and 42 in diameter at its base. Lat. 56° 9' N. Lon. 2° 22' W.

BELLUNO, bel-loo-no, a city of Italy, at the confluence of the Piave and the Ardo, 50 miles N. of Venice. Besides the cathedral, built by Palladio, in the 16th century, there are 15 churches. Manf. Silk, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 15,500. —It gave the title of duke of Belluno to Marshal Victor, one of the generals of Napoleon I.

BELMONT, bel-mont', a county of the United States, in Ohio. Desc. Fertile, and producing wheat, oats, tobacco, and rearing cattle and horses. Area, 520 square miles. Pop. 49,638.—The Ohio Central Railway passes through this county.

BELON, PIERRE, bel'-awng, French naturalist, who, between 1546 and 1549, travelled into Palestine, Greece, and Arabia. The tribe of plants known as Belonia are named after him. He was assassinated in the Bois de Boulogne. The result of his travels he communicated to the world in his "Observations of many Singular and Memorable things found in Greece, Asia, Judæa, Egypt, Arabia, &c.," which has been translated into Latin and German.

Born 1510; died 1564.

BELOOCHISTAN, or BALUCHISTAN, bel'-oo-kis-tan', a country of Asia, situate on the north-west coast of the Indian peninsula, and extending from Seistan and the country of the Afghans on the N., to the Indian Ocean; and from Persia on the W., to that of Scinde on the E. The coast line, about 600 miles long, is regular, and not over elevated. There is no good harbour but several roadsteads. The surface of the country is generally rugged and elevated. Several parallel ranges enter Beloochistan from Afghanistan, north of the Bolan Pass, and traverse the country in a direction generally S.S.W. throwing out an easterly branch to the Indus, and terminating on the Arabian Sea, reaching in the Chehils Tan an altitude of 1,200 feet. In the north are various ranges traversing the country from east to west, and to the south of these mountains is a desert land.

Rivers.—The Bolan, Moola, Gaj, and Aara.

Pro.—All sorts of grain and vegetables, and the finest fruits flourish abundantly. In the northern districts madder, cotton, and indigo are produced, the latter of excellent quality. Assafœtida, which is a favourite kind of food among the Beloochees, grows among the hills. Trees of large size are seen, although Beloochistan does not seem generally to be a woody country.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, limestone, marble, rocksalt, sulphur, and saltpetre.

Zoology.—The domestic animals are horses, mules, asses, camels, dromedaries, buffaloes, black-cattle, sheep, goats, dogs, and cats, besides fowls and pigeons. There are neither geese, turkeys, nor ducks. The wild animals are lions, tigers, leopards, hyænas, wolves, jackals, tiger-cats, wild dogs, foxes, hares, mongooses, mountain goats, antelopes, elks, red and moose deer, and wild asses, which inhabit both the mountains and the plains. Of birds there are almost every species to be met with either in Europe or India.

Area, 106,500 square miles.

Pop. about 400,000, chiefly divided into two classes, the Beloochees and Brahooes, differing from each other in their outward appearance, as well as in their manners. These are divided into an infinite variety of tribes, which it is impossible to enumerate. In their domestic life, the Beloochees are almost all pastoral. Though naturally indolent, they are fearless of danger, and in battle fight with great gallantry. They are a race of lawless robbers, however, and undertake distant excursions in quest of booty, or for the purpose of carrying off the inhabitants of other countries for slaves.

Religion.—All the Beloochees are Mahometans of the Soonee faith, and entertain a great antipathy to other sects. Polygamy is common among them.

Political Divisions.—There are seven territories, Khelat, Jalawan, Sarawan, Mekran, Lus, Cutch-Gundava, and Kohistan.

Chief Towns.—KHELAT, the capital; Mustoong, Kosdar, Beyla, Kej, and Bagh.

Lat. between 24° 50′ and 30° 20′ N. Lon. between 61° 10′ and 68° 38′ E.

BELPASSO, bal-pas'-so, a town in Sicily, on the slope of Mount Etna. It was destroyed by an eruption in 1669, but rebuilt. Pop. 7,700.

BELPER, bel'-per, a market-town of Derbyshire, 7 miles N. of Derby, on the left bank of the Derwent, which is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of three arches. The principal church is new. Manf. Cottons, silks, earthenware and nails. Pop. 9,875. A station on the Midland Railway.

BELSHAM, THOMAS, bel'-sham, Unitarian minister and metaphysician. Educated at Daventry. Having entered the ministry he was, in 1805, chosen for the Essex Street chapel in the Strand, where he remained until his death. He was the author of a reply to Wilberforce's "Practical View," a work on the evidences of Christianity, translation and exposition of the Pauline epistles, and "Philosophy of the Human Mind." He is generally considered one of the ablest of Unitarian writers.

Born at Bedford, 1750; died 1829.

BELSHAZZAR, bel-shaz'-ar, "master of the treasure," a profligate king of Babylon, son of Evil-merodach, and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar. His history is related in the Book of Daniel.

BELSUNCE, HENRY FRANÇIS XAVIER DE, bel-soonz, a French prelate, who was made bishop of Marseilles in 1709. He showed his zeal and charity during the plague in 1720, and his devotion will always be worthy of admiration. He was offered, in 1723, the bishopric of Laon, but refused it, saying, "he would not leave a church to which he had devoted his life;" and he also refused the bishopric of Bordeaux, 1729.—Belsunce is mentioned by Pope in his "Essay on Man."

Born in Perigord, 1671; died at Marseilles, 1755.

BELT, GREAT and LITTLE, belt, two straits which unite the Baltic Sea and the Kattegat.

BELUS, be'-lus. Among those of this name mentioned by ancient writers, the most celebrated is one of the ancient kings of Babylon, who was worshipped with much ceremony by the Assyrians and Babylonians. He was supposed to be the son of the Osiris of the Egyptians.

BELVEDERE, bel'-vai-de-re, an Italian town in the province of Calabria-Citra, beautifully situated on the shores of the Mediterranean. Pop. 6,000.

BELZIG, bel'-zig, a town of Prussia, 23 miles S.W. of Potsdam. There are an old castle and three churches. Manf. Linen, woollen cloth, and paper. Pop. 2,600.

BELZONI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, bel-zo'-ne, a distinguished traveller, whose Egyptian explorations have been of great value to those who are engaged in the study of antiquities. He was born in Italy of humble parentage, and was for a short time a monk at Rome. Being driven out by the French occupation in 1798, he visited Holland and England, where he supported himself and wife by performing feats of strength and agility, at first in the streets and afterwards at Astley's Amphitheatre. In 1812 he set out on his travels, and visited Egypt, where he commenced his researches. He caused to be transported the colossal bust popularly known as that of Memnon, now in the British Museum, and was the first to open the great temple of Abousambul, which is cut in the side of an Egyptian mountain. In 1817 he commenced his excavations at Karnak, and opened the splendid tomb in the Bebanel-Molouk, or Valley of the Tombs of the Kings. He also opened numerous other sepulchres, and in all that he did, not only displayed great ingenuity, but much perseverance, under labours and difficulties of the most discouraging kind. In 1818 he visited the shores of the Red Sea, and discovered the ruins of the ancient Berenice, and visited the emerald mines of Mount Zabarah. After an absence of five years, he returned to England, and published an account of his operations. In 1823 he set out for Africa, with the view of exploring part of that country. Arriving at the Bight of Benin, he was well received by the king of Benin, and prepared to set out on a journey to Houssa, when he was attacked by dysentery, which carried him off.

Born at Padua, 1778; died at Gato, in Benin, 1823.

BEM, JOSEPH, bem, a brave general, who first served in the army under Marshal Davoust, and subsequently under Macdonald, at the siege of Hamburg. In 1819 he was made a captain, and became professor of a school of artillery established at Warsaw. In 1830 he took part in the Polish insurrection, and after the defeat of the Polish army, fled into France. On the commencement of the revolution of 1848, he tried to organise an insurrection at Vienna, and afterwards attached himself to the Hungarian cause. In 1849 he fought at the battle of Temesvar, in which the Hungarians were defeated. Seeking refuge in Turkey, he subsequently became a Mussulman, and was raised by Abdul-Medjid to the dignity of Pasha.

Born at Jarnow, Galicia, 1795; died at Aleppo, 1850.

BEMBATOOKA, bem-ba-too-ka, a large bay on the north-west coast of Madagascar. On the north side of the bay is the town of Majunga. Lat. 16° S. Lon. 46° E.

BEMBO, PIETRO, baim'-bo, a cardinal and poet, who, in 1513, was appointed by Leo X. his secretary, and made bishop of Bergamo by Paul III., who made him a cardinal in 1539. He was also a favourite of the celebrated Lucrezia Borgia when residing at Venice. His principal works are the "History of Venice;" "Letters," containing anecdotes of the age, and a "Treatise on the Nature of Love." His literary style is remarkable for classic purity.

Born at Venice, 1470; died 1547.

BENAIAH, ben-ai'-ya, "son of the Lord," or "understanding of the Lord," a captain of King David's guard, and chief general to Solomon. There was a famous king of Judah also of this name.

BENAMEJI, bain'-am-ai-je, a town of Spain, province of Andalusia, 38 miles S.W. of Cordova. Manf. Mats, soap, and vinegar. Pop. 4,600.

BENAMOCARRA, bain'-a-mo'-car-ra, a Spanish town, province of Andalusia, 20 miles N.E. of Malaga. The mineral baths are much esteemed. Manf. Linen, brandy, wine, and oil; fruit is extensively exported. Pop. 2,400.

BENAOCAZ, bain'-a-o'-caz, a Spanish town, province of Andalusia, in a mountainous district, 60 miles N.E. of Cadiz. There are beautiful promenades and gardens.

BENARES, ben-a'-res, a division of British India, under the jurisdiction of the Governor of the North-west Provinces. It is bounded on the N. by Oude, the Dooab, and Bundelcund; on the E. by Nepaul; on the S. by Bengal; and on the W. by Riwa, and comprises the districts of Mirzapoor, Ghazipoor, Azimgin, Basti, and Gorakpoor. Area, 18,314 square miles. Pop. 9,820,728, of whom nearly 90 per cent. are Hindoos, the remainder nearly all Mahometans.

BENARES, a district in the above division. The surface is very level, and the soil generally fertile, producing cereal crops, millet, tobacco, opium, sugar-canes, and oil-seed. Area, 996 square miles. Manf. Sugar, opium, indigo, cotton, cloth, woollens, silk, and leather. Pop. 892,684.

BENARES, the chief town of the above district, one of the most ancient cities in the world, the most populous in the north-western provinces of India, the religious centre of Hindooism, and a "sacred city." It is situated on the north bank of the Ganges, which at this point has a fine curve of about four miles in length. The city is about three miles long, and rises from the river bank in the form of an amphitheatre. The river is embanked, and there are numerous "ghats," or landing places, some known as "burning ghats," where dead Hindoos are burned, and there are many shrines and temples crowded with worshippers, a large number of whom are beggars of the most repulsive aspect. The streets of the city are winding and narrow, and the houses lofty, with galleries, overhanging windows, and projecting eaves. Many of them are painted in bright colours, and adorned with pictures of the divinities of Hindoo mythology, elephants, bulls, and human figures. There are a great number of small but highly ornamented and elaborately carved temples. It is said that there are a thousand places of Hindoo worship in the city, besides many Mahometan mosques, the chief of which is that of Aurungzebe, erected on the ruins of an ancient temple. Numerous sacred bulls, tame and fat, roam the streets, besides monkeys, which are also considered sacred, and who have a temple especially dedicated to them. The principal English institution is the Government, or Queen's, College, in which there are two distinct departments, Sanskrit and English. A new town-hall was opened in January, 1876, by the Prince of Wales, who also laid the foundation of a new hospital. The foreign residents chiefly reside at Sikrul, an extensive suburb on the north-west side of the city, divided into two portions by the Barna river, to the south of which are the military cantonments, the English church, the college abovementioned, other public buildings, and the palace of the Maharajah. The residence of the civil officers of the government, the courts of the commissioners and magistrates, public gardens, jail, various asylums, and the cemetery, are on the north side of the Barna. Benares is a place of great trade, the bazaars being filled with beautiful silks, gold-embroidered cloths, gold filagree-work, muslins, and gold-bordered lace scarves. A large trade is carried on in English piece goods, and in sugar, saltpetre, and indigo. The native part of the city swarms with so-called religious devotees and mendicants, frequently deformed and of disgusting appearances. Thousands of pilgrims from every part of India, Thibet, and Burmah resort to the sacred city, to wash away their sins in the waters of the Ganges, or to pass there the remainder of their lives. Some of these devotees are very wealthy, and contribute largely to the maintenance and ornamentation of the shrines and temples. Pop. 199,700. of whom about 76 per cent. are Hindoos, and 24 per cent. Mahometans. Lat. 25° 7′ N. Lon. 83° 4′ E. Benares was ceded to the East India Company by the Nabob of Oude in 1775.

BENAVENTE, ben'-a-ven-te, an old town of Spain, in the province of Zamora, on a slight eminence near the river Esla. It was formerly of much greater importance than at present, and was famous for many fine churches, two of which remain—Santa Maria, dating from the 13th century, and San Juan del Mercado, once belonging to the Knights Templars, and containing some fine monuments. There are the ruins of an ancient castle. Manf. Silk-spinning. Pop. 4,500.

BENBECULA. (See HEBRIDES.)

BENBOW, JOHN, an English admiral, who early entered the merchant service, and in 1680 commanded a ship in the Mediterranean trade, with which he beat off a Sallee rover. The gallantry of this action being reported to Charles II. of Spain, he invited the captain to court, and presented him with a letter of recommendation to King James II. who made him captain of a man-of-war. William III. dispatched him to the West Indies to protect the British colonies, where he recaptured several English vessels which had been taken by the Spaniards. On his return he was advanced to the rank of vice-admiral, and, in 1701, again dispatched to the West Indies. Shortly after his arrival there, he fell in with the French admiral Du Casse, near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, when a skirmishing action commenced, which continued three or four days; in the last day the admiral was singly engaged with the French, his other ships having fallen astern. Though a chain-shot had shattered his leg, he would not be removed from the quarter-deck, but continued the fight till morning, when the French bore away. The admiral made signal for his ships to follow; but his orders were disobeyed. In consequence of this, he was obliged to return to Jamaica, and on his arrival, ordered those officers who had behaved so ill to be confined, and brought to a court-martial, when the most culpable of them suffered according to their deserts. He died from the effects of his wound.

Born at Shrewsbury, 1650; died at Jamaica, 1702.

BENCOOLEN, ben-koo'-len, a seaport-town and Dutch residency, on the W. coast of the island of Sumatra, in a low and swampy situation, most of the houses being built on piles. The town formerly stood six miles to the north, but was removed to its present site in 1714. It is defended by a fort. The town is inhabited by a mixed population of natives of the country, Malays, Javanese, natives of Bengal, Malabar, and Coromandel, and a trifling proportion of Europeans and their descendants. The chief exports are pepper and camphor. The town was formerly in the possession of the East India Company, but was ceded to the Dutch in exchange for settlements on the coast of India, in 1825. Pop. 129,000. Lat. 3° 50′ S. Lon. 102° 3′.

BENDER, ben'-der, a town of European Russia, in Bessarabia, on the right bank of the Dniester, the capital of the territory of the same name, 58 miles from Odessa. The citadel is on the Suivaroff Mound, an eminence near the town. There are three Greek churches, a Roman Catholic church, a synagogue, and other places of worship. There is a harbour on the Dniester, and a large overland trade is carried on with Odessa and Jassey. Manf. Tobacco, candles, and bricks, corn, timber, cattle and tallow are the chief articles of trade. Pop. 32,535 including a large number of Jews. Lat. 46° 49′ N. Lon. 29° 29′ E. This place was taken and stormed by the Russians in 1770 and in 1809. In its vicinity is Varnitza, a place celebrated as the retreat of Charles XII., king of Sweden, from 1709 to 1712, after the battle of Pultowa.

BENDER-ABASI, a town of Persia, on the northern shore of the Persian Gulf. The port is shallow and small, and a poor trade is carried on. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 27° 13′ N. Lon. 56° 57′ E.

BENDORF, ben'-dorf, a Prussian town, on the right band of the Rhine, 6 miles N. of Coblentz. Manf. Iron, cloth, worsted, and tiles. Pop. 2,100.

BENEDICT, ben'-e-dikt, a famous English abbot, who made frequent tours to Rome, and took to England several artists, eminent in architecture, painting, and music. He founded the monastery at Wearmouth in 674, and that of Jarrow in 682.
Born in Northumberland, 628; died 690.

BENEDICT, ST., founder of the religious order of the Benedictines. He belonged to an old Italian family, and was educated at Rome. There are many extravagant stories related of him, and his contests with diabolical temptations; but it appears to be authentic that at an early age he retired to a grotto near Subiago, 40 miles from Rome. He was followed by a number of persons, who adopted the rules he established, and in a short time he had twelve monasteries under his direction. About 528 he withdrew to mount Cassino, where he founded a monastery, which became the prototype of all the institutions of that kind in western Europe.
Born at Nursia, 480; died 542 or 543.

BENEDICT, a name adopted by a great number of the Roman pontiffs, among whom the most distinguished were:—

BENEDICT VIII., who obtained the tiara in 1012. He was at first opposed by an anti-pope, and compelled to flee from Rome. After his restoration he crowned the emperor Henry II. and his wife in the church of St. Peter, on which occasion the pope presented the emperor with an apple of gold, surrounded with two circles of precious stones crossed, and surmounted with a cross of gold. This pope united the warrior with the ecclesiastic, and defeated the Saracens and Greeks, who invaded his territories.
Died 1024.

BENEDICT XII., was the son of a baker, and became doctor of the university of Paris, and cardinal priest. In 1334 he was elected to the papal chair, on the death of John XXII. He corrected several abuses in the church.
Died at Avignon, 1342.

BENEDICT XIII., VINCENZO MARCO ORSINI, was born at Rome in 1649, of an illustrious family, and took the religious habit among the Dominicans at Venice. In 1672 he was made cardinal, and obtained also the archbishopric of Benevento, where, in 1688, his palace was shattered by an earthquake, and the cardinal narrowly escaped with his life. In 1724 he was chosen pope, and the year after he called a council at Rome, in which the bull Unigenitus was confirmed. He was a reforming pope and corrected many abuses.
Died 1730.

BENEDICT XIV., was born at Bologna in 1675, of the noble family of Lambertini. In 1728 he received a cardinal's hat; and in 1731 was nominated archbishop of Bologna. On the death of Clement XII., in 1740, the cardinals were a long time deliberating on the choice of a successor. Lambertini, by way of quickening them, said, Why do you waste your time in discussions? If you wish for a saint, elect Gotti; a politician, choose Aldrovandus; a good companion, take me." This sally pleased them so much, that they elected him at once. He reformed abuses, introduced good regulations, cultivated letters, encouraged men of learning, and was a patron of the fine arts.
Died 1758.

BENEDICT, JULIUS, Sir, a modern German pianist and musical composer. He studied under Hummel and Weber, and in 1824, on the recommendation of the latter, was appointed musical director of the theatre of the Carthusians at Vienna. At the San Carlo of Naples he produced his first compositions, and was subsequently very favourably known as an admirable performer on the piano in most of the large cities of southern Europe, and finally settled in London. He was with Jenny Lind in the United States, during her remarkably successful engagement there under the auspices of Barnum. He has been for many years a resident in England, and received the honour of knighthood as a recognition of his talents.
Born at Stuttgart, 1805. Died 1885.

BENEKE, FRIEDRICH EDUARD, baï-ne-kus(r), German philosopher, who wrote in opposition to Kant and Hegel. He studied at Halle and Berlin, and after a long struggle against adverse influences, was in 1832 appointed an extraordinary professor in the university of Berlin. It is supposed that he committed suicide.
Born at Berlin, 1798; died 1854.

BENEVENTO, baï-ne-vaint'-to, a city of Italy, capital of a province of the same name, 32 miles N.E. of Naples. No place in Italy, with the exception of Rome, contains so many interesting remains of antiquity. Among others, the triumphal arch, which was erected in honour of the emperor Trajan, A.D. 114, is still in good preservation, and forms one of the gates of the city, which is fortified. There are also some remains of an amphitheatre. The cathedral is in the Lombardo-Saracenic style, and in front of it is an Egyptian obelisk, with hieroglyphs. The town-hall, lyceum, and several hospitals, are among the public buildings. Manf. Leather, parchment, and plated goods. Pop. 21,305. This city is of great age, and is supposed to have been one of the principal towns of the Samnites. In a neighbouring plain, Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, defeated and slew his rival Manfred, in 1266. Under the Lombards, Benevento was the capital of a duchy. In 1806 Napoleon I. gave it to Talleyrand, with the title of prince; but, in 1815, it was restored to the Pope.

BENEZET, ANTONY, ben'-e-zet, an American philanthropist, who, at an early age, removed with his family from France to Philadelphia, where they became Quakers. He devoted his life to acts of charity, and the negroes were especially objects of his care. He published various tracts on Guinea and the slave-trade; an account of the Society of Friends, &c. A fine eulogium was pronounced over his remains by an American officer. "I would rather," says he, "be Antony Benezet in that coffin, than George Washington with all his fame."
Born at St. Quentin, Picardy, 1713; died 1784

BENGAL, ben-gawl', the largest of the three presidencies of British India, and also a province of the presidency. It is bounded on the N. by Nepaul, Assam and Bootan; W. by the north-western provinces; E. by the mountainous region separating it from China and northern Burmah; and S. by the Bay of Bengal, and Burmah and Madras. The territory may be described as two great river valleys, that of the Ganges in the west, and that of the Brahmapootra in the east

The surface is in general level, without any great elevations throughout the province. The soil, too, is generally of a light sandy loam, except in those tracts which are inundated by the overflowing of the rivers, and which are enriched by the deposit of a rich vegetable matter, thus renewing its productive capabilities.

Rivers.—The Ganges and the Brahmapootra, and numerous other streams, which water it in every direction. It is affirmed that there is hardly a spot in the province twenty miles distant from a river, which, in the rainy season, is not navigable.

Climate.—From the beginning of June to the end of September the rainy season prevails, from November to February the cold season, and in the middle of the latter month the hot weather begins, and continues up to April. In this last month a change begins to take place, the heat being tempered by thunder-storms and rain, and wind from the north-west. On the plains the thermometer is sometimes as low as 52° Fahr., but in summer reaches 103° in the shade. The rainfall also varies considerably. In the mountain ranges between Silhet and Assam the average is from 500 to 600 inches in a year, but in Behar it is only about 37 inches.

Pro.—Almost every kind of grain cultivated in Europe, besides rice, millet, peas, beans, linseed, mustard-seed, sesamum, sugar, cotton, indigo, tea, pepper, ginger, quinine, turmeric, silk, opium, pine-apples, citron, lemons, grapes, pomegranates, almonds, tamarinds, plantains, ginger, and vegetables of most descriptions.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, salt, and coal; the western coal-fields yielding about 600,000 tons per annum.

Zoology.—The wild animals are lions, tigers, boars, wolves, foxes, jackals, leopards, hyenas, panthers, zebras, buffaloes, antelopes, apes, and monkeys. The tiger is the most formidable of all. He infests the thick jungles, watching unseen every opportunity to pounce upon his prey. Dogs swarm in the streets of every Bengal town, and goats are numerous. Of birds, a large kind of heron frequents the towns, and clears them of their offal. Reptiles are both numerous and formidable; and fish is so abundant as to be within the reach of the poorest inhabitant.

Manf.—Cotton piece-goods of various kinds, chintzes, blanketing, diaper, woven silks, packthread, and sailcloth. Formerly muslins of the most beautiful and delicate texture were made at Dacca, but the manufacture is now extinct.

Area, 156,564 square miles.

Divisions.—The presidency of Bengal now comprises four provinces, Assam having been separated from it in 1874:—BENGAL PROPER, BEHAR, ORISSA, and CHOTA NAGPOOR. (See each under proper heading.) These provinces are subdivided into 47 districts.

Pop. 69,536,861, of whom about 40,000,000 are Hindoos and 20,000,000 Mahometans, nearly equal in numbers in Bengal proper. There are about 3,000,000 of hill tribes, who are pagans, and some of them in the lowest state of civilisation, practising human sacrifices. They occupy the mountain ranges and dense forests in the north, east, and south-west.

Languages.—Bengali is spoken in Bengal proper and Chota Nagpoor; Hindostanee in Behar and Bengal; Uriya in Orissa, and various aboriginal languages and dialects in that province and Chota Nagpoor.

Railways.—Bengal is traversed by the East Indian, the Eastern Bengal, and Northern Bengal railways.

Lat. between 19° 18′ and 28° 15′ N. Lon. between 82° and 97° E.

History.—Bengal was first invaded and conquered by the Afghan Mahometans about A.D. 1200, and continued tributary to the emperor of Delhi till the year 1340. From this period it was partially independent till 1538, when it was subdued by Shere Shah, from whose descendants it was conquered by the emperor Akbar, and continued subject to Delhi, or nominally so, till 1765, when it passed into the possession of the East India Company. In 1854 Bengal was constituted a lieutenant-governorship.

BENGAL, BAY OF, a part of the Indian Ocean, which includes the sea from Cape Negrais on the E. to the delta of the Godavery on the W., and extending from hither to further India. The Ganges, Brahmaputra, the Irawaddy, the Kistnai, the Caudevery, and the Godavery, disembogue themselves into it. Lat. between 16° 30′ and 23° N. The Sea of Bengal extends to lat. 8° N. between the islands of Junkseylon and Ceylon.

BENJAMIN, OF TUDELA, Jewish rabbi, who visited the East and penetrated as far as the frontiers of China. His "Itinerary" abounds in strange and interesting matter.

Born in Navarre in the 12th century.

BENNET, HENRY, ben'-et, earl of Arlington, a statesman, who served in the royal army during the civil war, was knighted in 1658, and after the Restoration made secretary of state and one of the famous Cabal, which word was formed from the initials of the noblemen who composed it; viz.—Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, Lauderdale. In 1672 he was created an earl, and afterwards invested with the order of the Garter, and appointed lord chanberlain.

Born at Arlington, 1618; died 1685.

BENNETT, SIR WILLIAM STERNDALE, musical composer. His father was organist at Sheffield; in 1826 he entered the Royal Academy of Music, and afterwards studied in Germany, where he made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn and other leading musicians. He was appointed professor of music at Cambridge in 1856, principal of the Royal Academy of Music, 1868, and in 1871 was knighted. He was the author of several cantatas, sonatas, and many orchestral pieces, which gained him the reputation of being the foremost English musician of his time.

Born at Sheffield, 1816; died 1875.

BENNIGSEN, LEVIN AUGUSTUS THEOPHILUS, count, ben'-nig-sen, Russian general, a native of Brunswick, at first in the Hanoverian service, but joined the Russian army in 1773, and soon attracted the notice of the Empress Catherine. He was one of the conspirators who planned the assassination of the Emperor Paul, and afterwards greatly distinguished himself in the war against Napoleon. He defeated Murat at Woronowa, and for his services at Leipsic was created a count upon the field of battle.

Born at Brunswick, 1745; died in Hanover, 1826.

His writings consist principally of sonnets and dramas, and for the last years of his life his chief occupation was a translation of the Psalms.

Born at Lions-la-Forêt, Normandy, 1612; died at Chantilly, 1691.

BENSHEIM, bens'-hime, a German town, in Hesse Darmstadt, 17 miles S. of Darmstadt. It is surrounded by old walls. Agriculture and vine culture are the principal industries. Pop. 4,700.

BENTHAM, JEREMY, the son of a rich attorney in Houndsditch, and remarkable from his earliest years for the fascination which books had over him. In his fifth year he was named by his family the "philosopher;" and in his fourteenth was admitted to Queen's College, Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself among his fellow students. In 1763 he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and studied for the law, but abandoned that profession, in disgust at the exorbitant and unjust charges which he beheld made upon suitors, and from other corruptions by which he saw the machinery of the law upheld. After visiting France three different times previous to the breaking out of the great Revolution, he became acquainted with M. Dumont, the Swiss librarian of the marquis of Lansdowne, then residing at Bowood. This gentleman greatly assisted him in the improving and polishing of his compositions before they were given to the world. The biography of such a person as Bentham can contain little more than the record of his writings and opinions. The sum of his existence was the improvement of legislation and jurisprudence. The leading principle of his philosophy is, that the end of all human actions and morality is happiness. Seeing, in a pamphlet of Dr. Priestley, the phrase, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," he saw delineated, for the first time, "a plain as well as a true standard of whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human conduct, whether in the field of morals or politics." From this his whole life took its direction, and he laboured long and continually for what he conceived to be the happiness of his species. The principal works of this distinguished juridical philosopher are his "Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation," a "Fragment on Government," a "Book of Fallacies," the "Rationale of Judicial Evidence," the "Plan of a Judicial Establishment," and his "Panopticon," a work on prison discipline. He produced many more works, and, in the words of Sir James Mackintosh, "has done more than any other writer to rouse the spirit of juridical reformation, which is now gradually examining every part of law; and when further progress is facilitated by digesting the present laws, will, doubtless, proceed to the improvement of all. Greater praise it is given to few to earn.' In accordance with directions in his will, his body was embalmed, and is preserved, dressed in his ordinary costume, and in a sitting position, in University College.

Born 1748; died at Westminster, 1832.

BENTINCK, WILLIAM, bent'-tink, the first earl of Portland, was a page to William Prince of Orange (afterwards William III.), to whom he endeared himself by a singular act of devotion. The prince being ill of the small-pox, it was deemed necessary that he should receive the natural warmth of a young person in the same bed with him. Bentinck, though he never had had the distemper, immediately offered himself for this hazardous service. He subsequently suffered severely from the disease, but recovered, and his master ever afterwards esteemed him as one of his greatest friends. He accompanied William to England, and, on the prince's accession to the English crown, he was created earl of Portland, and was employed in several high offices, military and civil, and attended his master on his death-bed. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Holland, 1648; died in London, 1709.

BENTINCK, LORD WILLIAM HENRY CAVENDISH, the second son of the third duke of Portland, entered the army, and, after serving in Flanders, Russia, and Egypt, attained to high rank, and, in 1803, became governor of Madras. Here the singularity of his reforms in reference to the beards, moustaches, and turbans of the sepoys led, in 1806, to the mutiny at Vellore, which caused him to be recalled. On his return he received several diplomatic appointments, filled some military commands in Spain and Italy, and, in 1828, under the government of Canning, was appointed to the governor-generalship of India. There again his reforming spirit led to much dissatisfaction among the soldiery. He, however, effected the abolition of suttee, or the practice of widow burning, which, on December 17th, 1829, was declared illegal. He also obtained the liberty for Englishmen to settle in India, although belonging to neither the military nor the civil service; systematically favoured the native population, and extended the liberty of the press. He also annexed the territory of the rajah of Coorg to the British possessions. In 1835 his health began to fail, when he resigned his office, and left Calcutta in the month of March of the same year. The native population regretted his departure, and erected an equestrian statue to commemorate his administration. After his arrival in England he became, in 1836, M.P. for Glasgow, for which city he sat until a few days before he died, when he resigned.

Born 1774; died at Paris, 1839.

BENTINCK, LORD WILLIAM GEORGE FREDERICK CAVENDISH, was the third son of William Henry, fourth duke of Portland. This nobleman, who is better known as Lord George Bentinck, entered the army, but quitted the profession of arms to take a part in the politics of his country. In 1826 he became private secretary to his uncle George Canning, who was then secretary for foreign affairs. In 1827 he was returned to the House of Commons for the borough of King's Lynn, for which he sat till the close of his life. Up to 1846 he may be said to have been an ardent supporter of Sir Robert Peel; but when, in that year, that statesman repealed the corn-laws, he became one of his greatest opponents, and was selected for the leadership of the conservative party in the House of Commons. Lord George threw great ardour and energy into all that he undertook; and, with Mr. Disraeli for his ally, was one of the strongest opponents of free trade. He was passionately fond of horse-racing, and was wont to say that "the winning of the Derby was the blue-ribbon of the turf." He died from the bursting of a blood-vessel in the heart while taking a country walk in Nottinghamshire.

Born 1802; died 1848.

BENTIVOGLIO, GIOVANNI, ben-te-vo'-le-o, who for nearly fifty years ruled the republic of Bologna. He encouraged the fine arts, and erected many sumptuous edifices. He was expelled by Pope Julian II. in 1506.

Born at Bologna, 1438; died at Milan, 1506.

BENTIVOGLIO, GUIDO, a cardinal, was sent as nuncio to Flanders by Paul V., to endeavour to bring it again under the papal authority; and here it was he wrote his historical work on the insurrection of Flanders against the Spaniards, and the subsequent wars of the duke of Alva and the Hollanders. In 1616 Bentivoglio was sent as nuncio to France, and in 1621 was made a cardinal, and afterwards became the confidant of Urban VIII., whom it was supposed he would have succeeded as pope but for his death. He was made bishop of Terracina in 1621.

Born at Ferrara, 1579; died 1644.

BENTIVOGLIO, HERCULES, an Italian poet, whose satires are considered next in merit to those of Ariosto.

Born at Bologna, 1506; died at Venice, 1573.

BENTKOWSKI, FELIX, bent-kof'-ski, Polish historian, professor and librarian in the University of Warsaw, author of a valuable history of Polish literature.

Born 1781; died at Warsaw, 1852.

BENTLEY, RICHARD, a celebrated divine and critic, who, from Wakefield school, was sent, at the age of fifteen, to St. John's College, Cambridge. Thence he removed to Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A., and, in 1691, published a Latin epistle to Dr. Mill, containing critical observations on the Chronology of John Malala. He was the first who preached the lecture founded by Mr. Boyle, on which occasion he delivered eight admirable discourses in confutation of atheism. In 1693 he was appointed keeper of the royal library. In 1697 commenced his famous controversy with the Honourable Mr. Boyle on the genuineness of the epistles of Phalaris, in which much personal abuse passed on both sides; but, though some of the greatest wits of the age were on the side of Boyle, posterity has determined the case in favour of Bentley. In 1700 he was presented to the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge, with which he held the archdeaconry of Ely; but, in consequence of some encroachments made by him on the college for his own emolument, a charge was laid against him, which never came to a determination. He afterwards became regius professor of divinity, when, having exacted an exorbitant fee from persons who were admitted to the degree of D.D. by mandate, he was suspended in the vice-chancellor's court. This arbitrary decree was subsequently reversed by the court of King's Bench, and the doctor was restored to his privileges.—Dr. Bentley is advantageously known as a critic by his editions of Horace, Terence, and Phædrus, his unrivalled epistle to Mill, and his splendid dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris. These last established his reputation throughout Europe as a critic of the very highest order of excellence.

Born at Oulton, in Yorkshire, 1661; died 1742.

BENTON, the name of six counties in the United States;—Arkansas (pop. 20,328), Indiana (11,108), Iowa (24,888), Minnesota (3,012), Missouri (12,396), and Oregon (6403.

BENVENUTE, GIOVANNI BATTESTA, ban-vai-nu'-te, Italian painter, commonly called L'Orbolani (the gardener). He painted many fine altar-pieces.

Born at Ferrara, at the end of the 15th century.

BENYERTA, LAKES OF, ben-yer'-ta, two lakes in North Africa, the one salt and the other fresh. They are about 30 miles from Tunis, the inhabitants of which they supply with fish. Between the channel of the one that is salt and the sea, stands the town of Bizerta, which see.

BENYOWSKY ben'-e-ous'-ke, COUNT MAURICE AUGUSTUS DE, a Hungarian adventurer, who in 1768 joined the confederacy of the Poles against the Russians. Falling into the hands of the latter, he was exiled to Kamchatka; but, gaining the good offices of the governor, Nilof, he was made preceptor to his children, the youngest of whom, Alphanasia, fell in love with and married him. Afterwards, accompanied by her and some seventy companions, he quitted Kamchatka, and, in 1771, sailed to Formosa, and afterwards to Macao, where his wife and most of his comrades died. On his return to France, he was commissioned to found a colony in Madagascar, and in 1774 landed there, and gaining the esteem of many of the aborigines, was, in 1776, made their king. A short time after he returned to Europe to form alliances for his new rule. In 1783 he sought assistance from England and America for another expedition to Madagascar, and landed there in 1785. At the commencement of hostilities against the French he was mortally wounded. Benyowsky wrote an account of his memoirs and travels.

Born at Verbowa, 1741; died 1786.

BERANGER, PIERRE JEAN DE, bai-rawnzh'-ai, a French poet, who, from being first a waiter, became a printer, and then a writer of poetry. His first performances were by no means propitious to his fame or his fortunes; and when Napoleon I. was in Egypt, Béranger entertained the idea of proceeding to that country and realizing a dream of riches and glory with which he had been haunted. This, however, circumstances prevented; and in 1803, when suffering from great indigence, he sent some of his poems to Lucien Bonaparte, who subsequently assigned him an income as a member of the Institute. He now continued to write, became an editor, and, in 1809, was appointed a clerk in the secretary's department in the Academy. By this time he had written many songs, and had become popular. His effusions had spread far and wide; and as many of them were pointed satires against the governments which succeeded the fall of Napoleon, in 1821 he was discharged from his office, and subsequently, up to 1830, was twice fined and imprisoned. In the revolution of that year, he says, "he was treated with as one of the great powers;" but he remained free and independent. After the revolution he was elected a representative of the department of the Seine, in the Constituent Assembly, but soon resigned the honour which the admiration of his country had forced upon him. In his retirement he continued to chant and employ himself with a biography of his contemporaries, but did not publish so freely as he had formerly done. His funeral, on the day after his death, was attended by an immense concourse, who assembled to pay their last tribute of respect to the remains of one of the greatest of the national poets of France.

Born at Paris, 1780; died in Paris, July 17, 1857.

BERAR, bai-rar', a province of British India, consisting of six districts, ceded to the British Government by the Nizam of Hyderabad. It is bounded on the N. and E. by the Central Provinces, on the S. by the Nizam's dominions, and on the N. by the Nizam's territory, part of the Bombay presidency, and the Central Provinces. BERENGARIUS, JACOBUS, ber'-en-gair'-e-us, an eminent anatomist of Carpi, was the first to discover the peculiar curative qualities of mercury, and used it with great effect. He amassed great wealth, which he bequeathed to the duke of Ferrara.

Lived in the first half of the 16th century.

BERENGARIUS, French theologian, who was superintendent of the cathedral school at Tours, and archdeacon of Angers. Becoming convinced of the unsoundness of the doctrine of transubstantiation, he was charged with heresy, and was imprisoned by a decree of a synod held in 1050, but was soon released. He was again charged before a synod held in Rome in 1078, and Pope Gregory VII., although he had previously befriended him, forced him to make a confession, which he afterwards bitterly repented. He passed the remainder of his life in retirement and prayer. For many years afterwards his death was commemorated by an annual visitation to his tomb at Tours.

Born at Tours, 998; died 1088.

BERENICE, and BERONICE, be-re-ni'-se, a name common to many of the queens and princesses in the Ptolemean family in Egypt. The most celebrated was the daughter of Philadelphus and Arsinoe. She married her own brother Euergetes. When he went on a dangerous expedition, she vowed all the hair of her head to the goddess Venus, if he returned. Some time after his return, the locks, which were in the temple of Venus, disappeared, and Conon, an astronomer, to make his court to the queen, publicly reported that Jupiter had carried them away, and had made them a constellation. The name "Coma Berenice" is still applied by astronomers to a constellation, and the legend suggested the theme of Pope's charming "Rape of the Lock." She was put to death by her own son, B.C. 221.

BERENICE, daughter of Agrippa the Elder, king of the Jews. She was married to Herod, her uncle, after whose death she became the wife of Ptolemy, king of Cilicia; but she afterwards left her husband, and lived in an incestuous manner with her brother Agrippa. Titus fell in love with her, and would have declared her empress, but for fear of the Roman people. Berenice forms the subject of one of Racine's tragedies.

Born 28.

BERENICE, an ancient city of Egypt, on the W. side of the Red Sea, where a number of interesting antiquities have been found. It is 20 miles from Ras Bernass. There are interesting ruins in the neighbourhood. Lat. 23° 56′ N. Lon. 35° 34′ N.

BERENICIUS, PAUL PETER, ber'-e-nis'-e-us, a Dutch poet and adventurer, who was conjectured to be an expelled Jesuit, and got his livelihood by sweeping chimneys and grinding knives. It is reported that he would turn into extempore verses what was said to him in prose; translate the gazettes from Flemish into Greek or Latin verse, standing on one foot; that modern and ancient languages were quite familiar to him; and that he knew by heart, Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, and several parts of Cicero and Pliny. He was suffocated in a bog, into which he fell in a fit of intoxication. The "Georgarchoniomachia" is attributed to him.

Born 1650.

BERESFORD, WILLIAM CARR, Viscount, ber'-es-ford, British general, was the natural son of the first marquis of Waterford, and early entered the army. He served in Nova Scotia, at Toulon, and several other places, when, in 1808, he went to Portugal with the British forces, and organized the Portuguese army. On May 4th, 1811, he invested Badajoz, and on the 16th defeated Marshal Soult at Albuora. In 1812 he was wounded at Salamanca; and, under Wellington, had command of a division at Vittoria and Bayonne, where he greatly distinguished himself. On the 10th of April, 1814, he carried the heights of Toulouse, and was created a British peer, with the title of Baron Beresford. In 1814 and 1815 he was at Brazil; and on his return resumed the command of the army of Portugal, but in a few years resigned it. In 1823 he was made Viscount Beresford, and in 1828 was appointed master-general of the ordnance; and, at the time of his death, was governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and also governor of Jersey.

Born 1768; died at Bedgebury Park, Kent, 1854.

BERETTINI, PETER, surnamed PETER OF CORTONA, ber'-et-te'-ne, an eminent Tuscan painter, remarkable for the boldness of his conceptions. He decorated many chapels at Rome, as also the Barbarini Palace; then went to Florence, where he painted the ceiling of the Pitti Palace. His style, however, is described as loose, and as having tended to corrupt the taste of his age.

Born at Cortona, 1596; died 1669.

BEREZINA, bai'-rai-ze'-na, a river of Russian Lithuania, rising in White Russia, near Polozk, and falling into the Dnieper. The small town of Berezina is situate on its banks. At the village of the same name Charles XII. crossed the Berezina on June 29th, 1708; but this river has been especially rendered famous on account of its disastrous passage by the French army during the retreat of Napoleon I. from Russia in 1812.

BEREZOV, ber'-e-zof, a town of Asiatic Russia, 700 miles N. of Tobolsk. There are a cathedral and other churches, a school, and a strangers' hospital. A considerable trade is carried on in furs and salted fish. Pop. 1,460. Lat. 63° 55′ N. Lon. 64° 7′ E.

BERG, MATHIAS, VAN DEN, bairg, a Flemish painter, who became a pupil of Rubens. He excelled chiefly as a skilful copyist, being defective in composition.

Born 1615; died 1647.

BERG, formerly a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia, bounded N. by the duchy of Cleves, E. by the county of Mark and the duchy of Westphalia, S. by the Westerwald, and W. by the Rhine. This territory was formed by Napoleon I.

in 1806, but was in 1815 ceded to Prussia, and is now included in Prussian Westphalia.

BERGA, bair'-ga, a town of Spain, 50 miles from Barcelona. It is overlooked and defended by a castle. Pop. about 7,000, engaged in the mechanical arts, the manufacture of cotton fabrics, and as muleteers conveying the produce of the neighbourhood from place to place. It was taken and retaken during the civil war of Spain in 1840.

BERGAMA, ber'-ga-ma, a ruined city of Natolia, in Asia Minor, standing about two miles distant from the site of ancient Troy.

BERGAMO, bair'-ga-mo, a province of Italy. It is mountainous and covered with wood in the N. and in the S. fertile and level; abounding in rich pastures, rearing large numbers of sheep and goats, and producing chestnuts and olives in great quantities, but neither corn nor wine equal to the consumption of its inhabitants. The culture of the silkworm is extensively carried on. Minerals. Iron, marble, whetstone, and lignite. Area 1,100 square miles. Pop. 402,954.

BERGAMO, the capital of the above province, situate between the rivers Brembo and Serio, and 39 miles N.E. of Milan. It is divided into the old and new town, the former built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the side of a rocky hill, and the latter occupying the level ground below. Bergamo contains numerous churches, one of which, S. Maria Maggiore, dates from the 12th century, a school of arts, a lyceum, and a library. Manf. Silk, cotton and woollen goods, iron-wares, wax candles, and playing cards. A large fair, now chiefly in connection with the silk trade, has been held annually for about 900 years. Pop. 23,819.—This is an ancient city, being the Bergomum of the Romans. It was the birthplace of Bernardo Tasso, the father of Torquato Tasso, the author of "Jerusalem Delivered," to whom there is a statue erected in the great square of the city. It was also the birthplace of many painters of note, of Rubini, the famous singer, and Donizetti, the composer. In 1798 it was taken by the French and made the capital of the Serio.

BERGARA, bair'-ga-ra, a town of Spain, situate on the bank of the Deva, 25 miles from Bilbao. Pop. about 4,000.—Here the "Convention of Bergara" was concluded on August 31st, 1839, between Espartero and Maroto, which terminated the disastrous civil war that had been raging for years, Don Carlos being obliged to seek refuge in France.

BERGEN, DIRK, VAN DEN, bair-gen, a celebrated landscape and animal painter, who was a pupil of Vandereldt.

Born at Haarlem, about 1640; died 1689.

BERGEN, a seaport and capital of the province of South Bergen, in Norway, and one of the largest and best-built places in that country, situate about 270 miles from Drontheim. It is situated on a promontory at the head of a deep bay, named the Vaag, inclosed on all sides by rugged and barren rocks. There is a good harbour with two entrances, defended by strong fortifications. The houses are in general good, although, from their being founded on rocks, many of the streets are uneven and slanting. A large part of the town was burnt down in 1855, and has been rebuilt in a regular manner. The appearance of the town is picturesque, the wooden houses being generally painted in bright colours. There are a cathedral and several churches, one dating from the 12th century. There are also an hospital for the reception of persons infected with leprosy, a naval academy, national museum, several schools, and five public libraries. It is besides one of the three public treasuries of Norway, and the station of a naval squadron. A large export trade is carried on in fish, timber, skins, horns, and whale oil. Pop. 43,026. Lat. 60° 23′ N. Lon. 5° 29′ E.

BERGEN, the capital of the island of Rugen, in the Baltic, at the end of a small lake 13 miles from Stralsund. Pop. about 3,500, principally employed in linen manufacture and agricultural pursuits.

BERGEN, a small town of Germany, about 2 miles from Frankfort, where, in 1759, the French under the duke of Broglio defeated the Prussians, commanded by the duke of Brunswick.

BERGEN, ber'-jen, the name of a county in New Jersey, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Desc. Fertile. Pop. 36,786.—This is also the name of two townships in the United States, the one in New Jersey, the other in New York.

BERGEN-OP-ZOOM, or BERG-OP-ZOOM, op-zoom, an important fortress and town of the Netherlands, in North Brabant, 15 miles N. of Antwerp. It is situated on both sides of the river Zoom, has a harbour, arsenal, a town-house, and an academy of design. The tower of the old castle is remarkable, being wider at top than bottom, and rocking in a high wind. Manf. Pottery and tiles; a large trade is carried on in anchovies caught in the Scheldt. Pop. 8,500. Lat. 51° 29′ N. Lon. 4° 17′ E. So early as 422 a castle is said to have occupied a site in this town, which, at various times, has suffered greatly during the wars of Spain. In 1747, after a siege of sixty-three days, it was taken by the French under the count of Lowenthal; and again, in 1794, it fell before the arms of the French. In 1814 an attempt was made to reduce it by the British, under Sir Thomas Graham; but it was unsuccessful, and the loss to the besiegers considerable. The French surrendered the town by the treaty of 1814.

BERGERAC, bairsh'-e-rak, a town of France, department of Dordogne, on the river Dordogne, which divides it into two parts, and is crossed by a fine bridge. Manf. Paper, hosiery, serges, hats, iron and copper wares, and leather; a large trade in wine is carried on. Pop. 8,700.

BERGHEM, NICHOLAS, bairg'-hem, a Dutch painter, celebrated for his landscapes. Some of his compositions are in the Dulwich Gallery. His drawings and etchings are also very beautiful, and are eagerly sought after.

Born at Haarlem, 1624; died 1683.

BERGION and ALBION, ber'-ge-on, al'-be-on, in mythology two giants, sons of Neptune, who opposed Hercules as he attempted to cross the Rhône, and who were killed with stones from heaven.

BERGLER, JOSEPH, berg'-ler, German historical painter, who studied at Milan and Parma, and on his return was appointed painter to Cardinal Anersperg, at Passau, where he painted some fine altar-pieces. In 1800 he was appointed director of the Academy at Prague, a position he held for nearly 30 years, and exercised great influence in the development of the fine arts.

Born at Salzburg, 1753; died at Prague 1829.

BERGMANN, TORBERN OLOF, bairg'-man, Swedish chemist and naturalist, was educated at Upsal, where he devoted himself to medicine and the sciences connected with it. Here he gained the friendship of Linnæus, to whom he communicated a collection of undescribed insects, to one of which Linnæus gave the name of Bergmann. In 1761 he was appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and we find his name in the list of those who observed the transit of Venus in 1761. In 1767 he obtained the chemical professorship. We are indebted to him for the knowledge of the nature of fixed air, and for a number of chemical experiments. He was knighted by the king of Sweden, and received a pension of 150 rix-dollars; and his wife, at his death, received a pension of 200 rix-dollars, on condition of giving up his library and apparatus to the Royal Society of Upsala. His works were published in 6 vols., under the title of "Opuscula Physica et Chemica."

Born at Catherinberg, West Gothland, 1735; died at Mederi, 1784.

BERGUES, bairg, a town of France, department of Le Nord, 5 miles S.S.E. of Dunkirk, with which it is united by canals. The most remarkable building is an old belfry, 160 feet high; and there are two lofty towers, once belonging to the abbey of St. Winnoc. They are preserved as landmarks for vessels entering Dunkirk. Manf. Soap, tobacco, earthenware, cotton yarn, lace, and sugar. Pop. 5,700. During various wars, it has been several times taken and retaken, and was ceded to France at the peace of the Pyrenées, 1659. The British unsuccessfully laid siege to it in 1793.

BERHAMPORE, ber-ham-pore', a town and military station of British India, Madras presidency. Pop. 24,000. Lat. 19° 20'. Lon. 84° 50' E.

BERJA, bairzh'-a, a town of Spain, province of Andalusia, on the S. slope of the Sierra de Gador, 22 miles W. of Almeria. Pop. about 8,000. —This town is in the centre of a district abounding in lead-mines, and was, in 1804, visited by an earthquake, by which 67 lives were lost.

BERKELEY, GEORGE, bishop of Cloyne, a celebrated divine and metaphysician, who was educated first at Kilkenny, and next at Trinity College, Dublin, of which he was chosen fellow in 1707. The same year he published two small mathematical treatises, and in 1709 his "Theory of Vision," which was the first attempt that ever was made to distinguish the immediate and natural objects of sight from the conclusions we have been accustomed from infancy to draw from them. In 1710 appeared the "Principles of Human Knowledge," in 1711, "Discourse on Passive Obedience," and in 1713 the "Dialogues between Hylas and Philonus;" the object of both being to disprove the common notion of the existence of matter, and to establish the hypothesis that material objects have no other existence than in the mind. However singular his opinions were, there was so much beauty in his writings that the greatest men—amongst others Steele and Swift—courted his friendship. For the former he wrote several papers in the "Guardian," and through him became intimate with Pope. Swift recommended him to the earl of Peterborough, who took him abroad as his chaplain. In 1714 he returned to England, but set out again for the continent, with a son of Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher, and continued on his travels four years. He returned in 1721, and became chaplain to the duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. At this time he took his degree of D.D., and a fortune was bequeathed to him by Mrs. Vanhomrigh, Swift's "Vanessa." In the same year appeared, stimulated by the bursting of the South Sea Bubble, an "Essay towards preventing the Ruin of Great Britain." In 1724 he was promoted to the deanery of Derry, and the year following he printed a proposal for converting the American Indians, by erecting a college in the Bermudas. His mind was so intent on this project that he obtained a promise of a grant of £20,000 from the Commons, and set sail for Rhode Island, America, where he resided for three years, waiting for the money, which was not forthcoming. In 1733 he published the "Minute Philosopher," a masterly attack on infidelity. The next year he was made bishop of Cloyne, and about this time published the "Analyst," in which he endeavoured to prove that the mathematicians admitted mysteries, and even falsities, in science, particularly instancing the doctrine of fluxions. He was answered by several writers, to whom he replied in 1739, in "A Defence of Freethinking in Mathematics." In 1735 he began the publication of the "Querist," addressed to magistrates, occasioned by the licentiousness of the times; and in 1744 his book on the virtues of tar-water made its appearance. He died suddenly while sitting surrounded by his family, and was buried in Christ-church, Oxford, where there is a monument to his memory. —Pope ascribed, no less justly than beautifully, to Berkeley, "every virtue under heaven." But Pope was not the only one who admired and loved the good bishop of Cloyne. Bishop Atterbury says, "So much understanding, so much innocence, and such humility I did not think had been the portion of any but angels, till I saw this gentleman."

Born at Dysart Castle, Kilkenny, 1685; died at Oxford, 1753.

BERKELEY, a market-town of England, in the county of Gloucester, situate on the Little Avon, 16 miles S.W. of Gloucester. It principally consists of two irregular streets, and has a church in the style of the later Norman and early English architecture, which is the burial-place of the celebrated Dr. Edward Jenner, and has been recently partially restored. There is a trade in timber, cheese, coal, and malt. A station on the Midland Railway. Pop. 4,344. This town is famous for its Gothic castle, begun in the reign of Henry I., and finished in that of Stephen. The room in which King Edward II. was imprisoned and murdered, in 1327, is still to be seen.

BERKHAMPSTEAD, GREAT, berk'-hamsted, a market-town of Hertfordshire, 26 miles N.W. of London. The town has two principal streets, at the end of one of which are the remains of an ancient castle, of an elliptical form, defended on the one side by a double, and on the other by a triple moat. There is a large cruciform church, the tower of which was built in the 10th century, a market-house, built in 1860, and including a corn-exchange and library, and a grammar-school. Manf. Straw-plait and wooden wares. Pop. 7,103.—This town was formerly a Roman station, and the kings of Mercia afterwards resided in the castle. A wittenagemot, or Saxon parliament, was held in it in 697, and Ina's laws were published here. Cowper the poet was born in this parish in 1731, while his father was its rector. A station on the North-Western Railway.

BERKHEY, JOHANNES LEFRANCA VON, bairk-hi', eminent Dutch author, who wrote a work on natural history, and distinguished himself as a poet.

Born at Leyden, 1729; died 1812.

BERKLEY, SIR WILLIAM, governor of Virginia, was born of an ancient family near London, and educated at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1641 he was named governor of Virginia; and, during the civil war, took the side of the king, Virginia being the last of the colonies to acknowledge the authority of Cromwell. In 1651 he was compelled to submit to the rule of the Commonwealth; but, on the death of Governor Matthews, who had been appointed by Cromwell, he resumed the government, on condition that the people would submit to the king's authority. This was agreed to, and Charles II. was accordingly proclaimed in Virginia before his restoration to the throne took place in England.

Died 1677.

BERKS, or BERKSHIRE, berks, a county of England, bounded N. by the counties of Oxford and Buckingham, from which it is separated by the river Thames, E. by Surrey, S. by Hampshire, and W. by Wiltshire. It is of very irregular shape, extending for 60 miles from east to west, and from north to south, at the widest part, 35 miles, but near Reading not more than 7 miles. In this shire a great deal of chalk is found lying in beds, and strata of fossil shells are found below the surface. A considerable portion of its eastern part is occupied by Windsor Forest, which is estimated to be 56 miles in circuit, including a great part of Bagshot Heath, which has an elevation of 400 feet. The western part of the county is more elevated, a range of chalk hills separating the valleys of the Kennet and the Thames, and another range extends from near Wantage to the border of Wiltshire, White-horse Hill (893 feet) being the highest point. In many places it is well clothed with timber, particularly oak and beech.

Rivers.—The Thames, Kennet, Loddon, Ock, Auburn, and Lambourn.

Manf.—Berkshire was formerly one of the principal seats of the clothing manufacture, which was carried on until the middle of the 17th century; but it has since entirely declined. Cotton, sacking, paper, blankets, and biscuits, are made in different places, and also silk to some extent.

Chief Towns.—READING, WINDSOR, WALLINGFORD, ABINGDON, and NEWBURY.

Area, 702 square miles.

Pop. 218,382

BERKS, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Schuylkill. Area, 1,020 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and well watered, producing the usual cerealia, and rearing numbers of cattle, pigs, and horses. Minerals. Iron, copper, tin, and porcelain clay. Manf. Paper, gunpowder, and there are several distilleries, tanneries, saw, rolling, and linseed-oil mills. Pop. 122,597.

BERKSHIRE, a county of Massachusetts, U.S., in the western part of the state. Area, 1,400 square miles. Desc. Fertile. Minerals. Iron, coal, and limestone. Manf. Woollens, cottons, iron, paper, glass, and calico-printing. Distilling and tanning are carried on to a considerable extent. Pop. 69,032.

BERLANGA ber-lan'-ga, a town in Spain, province of Badajoz. Manf. Frieze cloth. Pop. 3,500.

BERLICHINGEN, GOETZ, or GOTTFRIED VON, bair'-lik-ing-an, "of the iron hand," a famous German knight, who was in continual feuds with other barons. At the siege of Landshut he lost his right hand, which was replaced by one made of iron. He was one of the leaders of the Peasants' War of 1525, for his part in which he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in his own castle. On the dissolution of the Suabian League he was liberated after a confinement of eleven years, and afterwards took part in campaigns in Hungary and France. He wrote an account of his life, on which Goethe founded a drama, translated by Sir Walter Scott.

Born 1480; died 1562.

BERLIN, ber-lin', the chief city of the Prussian province of Brandenburg, the capital of the kingdom of Prussia, and the metropolis of the German Empire, one of the largest, finest, and most important cities of Europe. It is situated on a marshy plain on both sides of the river Spree, not far from its junction with the Havel, a tributary of the Elbe. The river, a sluggish stream, enters the city from the S.E., with a width of about 400 feet, and a depth of 6 or 7 feet, and near the centre forms an island by the division of its channel. Near this point it falls about four feet, and, having received the waters of the Panke, quits the city on the N.W., a slow stream, narrowed to about 160 feet, but considerably increased in depth. The river is crossed by numerous bridges, the finest of which is the Schlossbrücke, or Castle bridge, leading from the island (Frederichswerder) to the eastern end of the fine street, the Unter den Linden. On the bridge are eight colossal figures in marble representing the ideal stages of a warrior's career. Another fine bridge is the Kurfürstenbrücke, adorned by a bronze statue of the Great Elector, Frederick William, leading from the Schloss Platz (castle place), on the island, to the western, or new part of the town. Until within a recent period Berlin was a walled city, with nineteen gates, some of which, possessing historical or architectural interest, have been allowed to remain. The finest, the Brandenburg Gate, the western entrance of the city, is an imitation of the Propylæa at Athens. It is 201 feet broad, and 65 feet high, supported by twelve lofty Doric columns, and surmounted by a car of Victory. There are two lateral colonnades, each supported by sixteen columns. The Royal Castle, or Schloss, on the island formed by the Spree, is a vast rectangular pile, enclosing two courts, and containing more than 600 rooms. The most striking external feature is the lofty dome of the modern chapel. At the north-western side of the castle garden are the old and new museums, very superb and interesting edifices, with collections of great beauty and value. Near the western foot of the Castle Bridge are the palace of the Crown Prince and the arsenal, and beyond them the splendid street Unter den Linden ("under the limes"), nearly three quarters of a mile long and 160 feet wide, with a double avenue of lime-trees. The Königgrätzerstrasse, the Friedrichstrasse, and the Oranienstrasse are also splendid streets. Altogether there are about 520 streets and sixty open squares. The public buildings are 700 in number, including about sixty churches and other places of worship, twenty-five theatres, fourteen halls for regular entertainments, and several large hospitals. The buildings most distinguished for architectural beauty are the various royal palaces, the houses of the Prussian and Imperial Legislature, the Royal Library, the museum before referred to, the Exchange, a splendid synagogue, the Rath-house, the University and the National Gallery and the Opera House. There are numerous statues of military heroes, the finest being the colossal statue of Frederick the Great, erected in 1851, in the Unter den Linden. The central equestrian figure of the king is surrounded by thirty-one portrait statues, his most eminent ministers and generals. Another fine memorial is the Monument of Victory, 197 feet high, erected to commemorate the victories of 1864, 1866, and 1870-71. In the principal streets, especially in the more modern quarters of the town, the houses are handsome and well built, but a vast number of the poorer classes, it is said over 70,000, live in underground cellars, and in dwellings containing no room which can be warmed. The dead level on which Berlin is situated prevents effectual drainage, and even in the principal streets the water stagnates and emits offensive odours. The public pleasure grounds are the Thiergarten, beyond the Brandenburg Gate, a noble piece of woodland; the Friedrich's Hain, the Humboldt's Hain, and the Hasenheide. The older part of Berlin is on the right bank of the Spree, and is irregularly built. The entire city now occupies an area of about 25 square miles.

Pop.—The census taken at the end of 1885 showed 1,316,382 inhabitants.

Manf. and Trade.—Locomotives and machines, copper, brass, and bronze wares, percelain, sewing-machines, lamps, paper, tobacco, and musical instruments, are the manufactures giving employment to the largest number of hands. Silk, cotton, and woollen manufactures, once extensive, are now insignificant, and other branches of trade have similarly decreased. The trade in petroleum has grown rapidly; and, next to Leipzig, Berlin is the largest publishing centre in Germany.

Educational Institutions.—The university, founded in 1810, is now attended by more than 3,000 students. There are 25 public, and more than 200 other schools. There are a Royal Academy of Sciences, founded in 1700, a Royal Academy of Arts, 9 public libraries, 15 people's libraries, and 8 museums, besides the splendid Royal Museum.

Communications.—Berlin is in direct railway communication with Hamburg, Stettin, Leipzig, Dresden, Cracow, Warsaw, and Austria, and the continental system generally. There is water communication with the North Sea and the Baltic.

History.—In the 13th century there were two small towns, Berlin, on the north side of the river, and Cöln, on the south, united under one administration in 1307. The town was raised to the rank of a royal residence in 1701, since which time it has rapidly increased in size, and now includes 16 townships.

BERLIN, a township of Worcester county, Massachusetts, U.S. Pop. 2,562.

BERLIN, a township of Connecticut, United States, 10 miles S.W. of Hartford. Manf. Tin ware. Pop. 5,300.

BERLINCHEN, bair-link'-an, a Prussian town in the government of Frankfort, 40 miles S.E. of Stettin. Manf. Linen and paper. Pop. 5,000.

BERLIOZ, HECTOR, bair'-le-oz, an eminent French musician, whose father was a physician, and who was forced to study for the medical profession greatly against his inclinations. When he had reached his twentieth year, he was sent to Paris to finish his studies; but there the natural bent of his genius prevailed over every other sense of duty. His father, withdrawing his allowance, the young man supported himself by singing in the chorus at the Gymnase theatre, but a reconciliation having been effected, he entered the Conservatoire de Musique, and in 1830 gained the first prize of the Conservatoire by his cantata of "Sardanapalus." He then went to Italy, where he studied for eighteen months, when he returned, and produced his overture to "King Lear." He now gradually rose in fame, and was the author of a great many works. As a conductor of concerts, however, he attained considerable eminence both in England, Germany, and Russia. He was the most "romantic" of musical composers.

Born at Côte-St.-André, in the department of Isère, 1803; died at Paris, 1869.

BERMEO, bair'-maiss, a seaport-town of Spain, on the Bay of Biscay, 14 miles from Bilbao. Pop. about 4,000, chiefly occupied in the fisheries.

BERMUDAS, SOMER'S ISLANDS, or SUMMER ISLANDS, ber-mu'-das, a cluster of small islands belonging to Great Britain, in the Atlantic Ocean, about 600 miles E. by S. from Cape Hatteras, North Carolina, on the American coast, number about 300, but for the most part so small and barren as to have neither inhabitants nor name. The largest of them is Great Bermuda, or Long Island, 15 miles long; St. George's, St. David, Cooper, Ireland, Somerset, Bird Island, and Nonsuch. The island of St. George is a military station, and is strongly fortified. The harbour is very spacious. The town of St. George's was founded in 1790, and was formerly the capital. Hamilton, on the Great Bermuda, is now the seat of Government. Pro. Indian tobacco, fruit, and legumes. Climate. The temperature is so mild, that a perpetual spring prevails, except during the middle of summer, when the heats are oppressive, and yellow fever and typhus occasionally break out. Pop. 14,888. Lat. between 32° 14′ and 32° 25′ N. Lon. between 64° 38′ and 64° 52′ W.—These islands were discovered in 1522 by Juan Burmudas, a Spaniard, and in 1609, George Somers, an Englishman, was wrecked there, and soon afterwards the British formed a settlement upon them. Hulks were established subsequently, wherein were confined a great number of convicts.

BERN, or BERNE, bern, a canton of Switzerland, in point of size the second canton in rank of the Swiss confederation, is bounded on the E. by Uri, Unterwalden, and Lucerne; on the N. by Aargau and Solothurn, on the W. by the Jura mountains, Fribourg, and Vaud; and on the S. by the Valais. The surface of the country is very mountainous, especially in the south, where are many of the highest points of the Alps (see ALPS), and some of the most beautiful valleys, as those of Simmenthal, Grindelwald, and Hasli. The Jura mountains cover the north, the two regions being separated by the valley of the Aar, whilst the whole of the territory is included in the basin of the Rhine.

Area, 2,660 square miles.

Rivers.—The Rhine, the Aar and its tributaries, the Emmen, Simmen, Kander, and Thiele.

Lakes.—Neuchâtel, Bienna, Thun, and Brienz, the two former being formed by the Thiele, and the two latter by the Aar.

Forests.—Extensive, covering the mountains, and chiefly consisting of pine and beech.

Pro.—The vine is cultivated in the valleys, and cheese is produced as an article of commerce; grain, hemp, and potatoes are grown in sufficient quantities for the purposes of the inhabitants; but the rearing of cattle and horses is the chief source of wealth.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, gypsum, freestone, lime, sandstone, marble, and granite.

Manf.—Wooden wares of the Oberland; iron and copper wares, watches, linens, woollens, and leather.

Pop. 532,164, chiefly Protestants.

Lat. between 46° 19′ and 47° 30′ N. Lon. between 6° 50′ and 8° 29′ E.

History.—Bern, in 1353, joined the Helvetic league, which then only included seven cantons, and in 1528 adopted the Reformed religion. In the Swiss revolution of 1847 Bern was elected the principal canton.

BERN, the capital of the above canton, and seat of the government and diet of the Swiss Confederation, stands on the declivity of a hill, near the Aar, where it is crossed by four bridges, 22 miles from Bâle. It is large, in part fortified, and has some beautiful edifices. The three principal streets are furnished with arcades or piazzas on both sides. The chief public buildings are the cathedral, founded in the year 1471, and which is a beautiful Gothic edifice; the church of the Saint Esprit, the council-house, a beautiful modern structure in the Florentine style; the arsenal, the great hospital, the orphan-house, the town library, the university, founded in 1834; the cabinet of medals and antiquities, the Economical Society, the concert-hall, several asylums, the arsenal, and the Murtner Gate.

Manf.—Crape, silk, linen, woollen and cotton stuffs, leather, clocks, and watches.

Pop. 44,087, chiefly Protestants.

History.—Bern was founded in 1191, by Berthold V.; in 1218 it was made an imperial city; and, in 1288, was unsuccessfully besieged by Rudolph of Hapsburg. In 1405 the whole town was destroyed by fire, but afterwards rebuilt in its present form. Its name is said to be the Old Suabian word for bear, its site having originally been a favourite resort of that animal. In 1835 its fortifications were destroyed, and, up to 1847, the federal diet held its sessions in it, alternately with Zurich and Lucerne. Since that time Bern has been the seat of the government.

BERNADOTTE, JEAN BAPTISTE JULES. (See CHARLES XIV. of Sweden.)

BERNARD, GREAT ST., bair'-nar, a pass of the Pennine Alps, in Switzerland, where is a monastery, built by Bernard de Menthon, a Savoyard nobleman, in 962, for the benefit of pilgrims to Rome, at an elevation of 8,150 feet above the level of the sea. This is near the line of perpetual snow, and is the highest habitation in Europe. Its inmates are monks of the order of St. Augustine, and have long enjoyed a great celebrity for their humane efforts in saving and assisting lost travellers in the mountains. The hospice is a substantial stone building, large enough to give shelter to 300 persons. The monks are admitted at the age of 18, and take a vow to remain in the hospice for fifteen years. The dogs of St. Bernard also enjoy a world-wide fame for their sagacity in assisting the monks in tracking out those who have been so unfortunate as to sink exhausted amongst the snows of these sublime but terrific Alpine heights. One famous dog saved forty lives. This pass was traversed by 30,000 French troops under Napoleon, in 1800.

BERNARD, LITTLE ST., a mountain of the Graian Alps, to the south of Mont Blanc, upon which there is also a hospice, 7,192 feet above the sea. (See ALPS.)

BERNARD of Chartres, known as "Sylvestris," a philosophical writer of the Platonic school, author of two curious works, "Megacosmus" and "Microcosmus," or "The Great World" and "The Little World."

Lived in the 12th century.

BERNARD of Menthon, the founder of the hospices of Great and Little St. Bernard, was descended from one of the most illustrious houses of Savoy, and early embracing the ecclesiastical life, became archdeacon of the church of Aosta, at the foot of the Alps. Here he employed himself for forty years in propagating Christianity among the mountaineers, and erected, in 962, on the ruins of two temples dedicated to Jupiter, the two monasteries mentioned above.

Born near Annecy, 923; died at Novara, 1008.

BERNARD of Thuringia, a hermit, who, at the close of the 10th century, announced that the end of the world was approaching. A total eclipse of the sun happening at that time, many people hid themselves in caves; but the return of light dispelled their fears, the hermit retired to his cell, and the world resumed its tranquillity.

BERNARD, ST., the founder of the order of Bernardines, one of the most distinguished saints of the Romish calendar, was the son of a knight of Burgundy, and was educated at the university of Paris, which in his time was one of the most celebrated seats of learning in Europe, and, at the age of 22, entered the Cistercian monastery of Citeaux, near Dijon, inducing upwards of thirty of his companions to accompany him in his retirement. By his rigorous practice of the austerities of the order (the strictest in France), Bernard so recommended himself, that he was chosen, in 1115, head of the colony which founded the abbey of Clairvaux. His celebrity was so great, that, in 1128, he was employed to draw up the statutes of the order of the Templars; and his influence prevailed so far at the courts of both France and England as to induce them to acknowledge, contrary to justice, Innocent II. as legitimate Pope, in opposition to Anacletus. In 1146 he persuaded the king of France, and other sovereigns, to enter on a crusade, which, having failed, Bernard was greatly blamed, and wrote an apologetical letter to the Pope. He was the great opponent of the famous Abelard. He was canonized by Alexander III. in 1174.

Born at Fontaine, 1091; died at Citeaux, 1153.

BERNARD, CLAUDE, surnamed Poor Bernard, was the eldest son of a distinguished French magistrate, in the time of Henry IV., and after a youth spent in dissipation, took orders and consecrated his life to the poor, the sick, and the criminal. For twenty years he exercised his charity at the hospitals in Paris, devoting his heritage of £20,000 to the use of the unfortunate.

Born at Dijon, 1588; died at Paris, 1641.

BERNARD, or BERNARD, duke of Saxe-Weimar, a celebrated general, who was one of the principal supports of the Protestant cause in Germany, during the Thirty-years War. His first essay in arms was made under the king of Bohemia, and when nineteen years of age he distinguished himself at the battle of Wimpfen. He afterwards served under Gustavus Adolphus, gaining several advantages over Wallenstein and aiding in the taking of Wurtsburg and Mannheim. On the death of Gustavus, at the battle of Lutzen, 1632, he took the command of the army, and followed up the victory. In 1634, however, he was beaten in the decisive battle of Nordlingen, which was gained by the Imperialists. From that time he allied himself closely to France, which had joined the Protestant league, and succoured and retook several towns—amongst others, Mayence, in 1635, and effected an admirable retreat into Lorraine. Subsequently in 1636, he supported the movements of Condé in Burgundy, and in 1638 took Rheinfeld, Fribourg, and Brisach. In the midst of his successes he died, some say by poison.

Born at Weimar, 1603; died at Neuberg, 1639.

BERNARD, SAMUEL, a French painter and engraver, who was a pupil of Vouet and professor in the Royal Academy at Paris. He excelled in miniature painting, and was the father of the celebrated banker Samuel Bernard, who rendered valuable services to the governments of Louis XIV. and XV.

Born at Paris, 1615; died at Paris, 1687.

BERNARD, CATHERINE, a celebrated French authoress, who composed many novels, poems, and two tragedies, "Brutus" and "Laodamia," the former of which was much esteemed. She was admitted a member of the Académie des Ricovrati at Padua, and obtained the poetical prizes many times at the French Academy, and at the Jeux Floraux at Toulouse. She was the friend of Fontenelle.

Born at Rouen, 1662; died at Paris, 1712.

BERNARD, EDWARD, a learned astronomer and philologer, who, in 1669, was appointed deputy to Sir Christopher Wren in the Savilian professorship of astronomy, and, in 1673, succeeded that great man. In 1684 he took his degree of D.D.; and, in 1691, was presented to the rectory of Brightwell, in Berkshire.—Bernard is celebrated for his knowledge of the Eastern languages and mathematics, and for the labour he expended in searching for and collecting MSS. for the reprints of the old mathematicians, which rendered the Oxford press famous at that period. His works are very numerous.

Born near Towcester, 1638; died at Oxford, 1697.

BERNARD, JAMES, a French divine and historian, who was educated at Geneva, after which he became minister of the church of Vinsobres; but when the persecution commenced, he retired to Switzerland till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and then went to Holland, where he established a school for fine arts, philosophy, and mathematics. He wrote an historical and political account of the state of Europe, and succeeded Le Clerc in the management of the "Bibliothèque Universelle." In 1693 he began the "Nouvelles de la République des Lettres." In 1705 he was chosen one of the ministers of the Walloon church at Leyden, and professor of philosophy and mathematics in that university.

Born at Nions, Dauphiné, 1658; died at Leyden, 1718.

BERNARD, PETER JOSEPH, called by Voltaire, Gentil-Bernard ("pleasant"), showed, at an early age, a great taste for poesy, and was at first only an attorney's clerk, but afterwards became secretary to Marshal Coigny, who had the command of the army of Italy. After the marshal's death, he obtained a lucrative appointment, and was then able to indulge his poetic faculties. He wrote an opera, "Castor and Pollux," which had a great success; "The Art of Loving," and a number of odes, songs, &c.—In 1771, having been guilty of an excess, he entirely lost his memory, and for four years was in a state of second childhood.

Born at Grenoble, 1710; died at Paris, 1775.

BERNARDES, DIEGO, bair-nar'-dais, a Portuguese poet, who has especially succeeded in the idyl, and is regarded as the Theocritus of Portugal. He called a collection of his eclogues "Lyma," from the name of the stream on the banks of which he composed his verses.

Born about 1540; died 1596.

BERNARDI, JOHN, bair-nar'-de, an Italian artist, who excelled in cutting grand subjects in crystals for jewellers, and whose works are said to rival those of the ancients.

Born at Castel-Bolognese, about 1495; died at Faënza, 1555.

BERNARDIN, ST., bair-nar'-deen, of Sienna, an Italian monk, whose courage and charity were conspicuous during the plague which ravaged Sienna in 1400. In 1404 he entered the order of Franciscans, and was sent to the Holy Land. On his return to Italy he founded above 300 monasteries. In 1438 he was made vicar-general of his order. He was much respected by the emperor Sigismund, and his eloquence had the most beneficial effect on all classes in Italy.

Born at Massa-Carrara, 1380; died at Aquila, 1444.

BERNARDINO, PASS OF, bair-nar-dē'-no, one of the principal passes between Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, on the route from Coire to Bellinzona. Height, 6,970 feet above the level of the sea.

BERNARDO DEL CARPO, a Spanish knight-errant, the hero of many fabulous exploits. He was the son of Chimena, sister of King Alphonso, by a private marriage with Sancho, lord of Saldergua, who was imprisoned and blinded by order of the king. Bernardo greatly distinguished himself against the Moors, and passed the last portion of his life in France.

Lived in the 9th century.

BERNAU, bair'-no, a Prussian town in the province of Brandenburg, 14 miles N. E. of Berlin. It has walls. There are an ancient town-house, and two churches. Manf. Linen, cotton goods, silk, velvet, and beer. Pop. 5,200.

BERNAUER, AGNES, bair-now'-ar, the daughter of a poor citizen of Augsburg, who attracted by her beauty duke Albrecht, son of the reigning duke of Bavaria, and was secretly united to him. His father, enraged at the union, ordered her to be arrested on a charge of sorcery, and she was brutally drowned in the Danube. Her husband took up arms against his father and ravaged the country, but, owing to the intercession of the emperor Sigismund, peace was restored, and the father erected a chapel to the memory of the murdered Agnes. The sad romantic story has been made the subject of popular songs and tragedies.

Died 1435.

BERNAY, bair-nai', French town in the department of Eure, on the left bank of the Charentonne, 26 miles W.N.W. of Evreux. It is a town of great antiquity, and the houses are generally quaint in style. The abbey, founded in 1077, is now used as a town-hall, and the abbey church as a market. The church of Notre Dame de la Conture is noted for the glass work; and the church of St. Croix for its beautiful altar and sculptures. Manf. Cotton, wool, lens, and ribbons. There is a trade in grain, flax, and horses. Pop. 5,800.

BERNAZZANO, bair-nat-sa'-no, an Italian painter of the 16th century. He excelled in landscape, fruit, flowers, and animals; and is said to have rivalled Zeuxis, having painted a fresco of a strawberry-plant, covered with fruit, so beautifully that the peacocks came and pecked at the wall till it was destroyed.

Died 1536.

BERNBURG, bairn'-boerg, an old town of Germany, 24 miles from Magdeburg, formerly the capital of Anhalt-Bernburg. The old castle, formerly the ducal residence, is defended by moats and surrounded by beautiful gardens. Among the public buildings are the church of St. Mary, a picture gallery, theatre, and gymnasium. Manf. Porcelain, starch, snuff, and paper. Pop., including the suburb of Waldau, 15,500.

BERNECASTEL, bairn'-eus-tel, a Prussian town in the province of the Lower Rhine, capital of a circle of the same name. A considerable trade, especially in wine, is carried on, and there are grindstone quarries, and lead and copper mines. Pop. 2,400.

BERNERA. (See HEBRIDES.)

BERNERS, JOHN BOURCHIER, Lord, ber'-ners, a favourite of Henry VIII., who employed him in several capacities, and gave him the appointment of governor of Calais, where he remained until his death.—He was the author of several productions; but his greatest work is his translation of Froissart's "Chronicles," which was undertaken by the king's command.

Born about 1474; died 1532.

BERNERS, JULIANA, prioress of Sopewell nunnery, near St. Alban's, and one of the earliest female writers of England. Holinshed says that she was "a gentlewoman endued with great gifts, both of body and mind, and wrote certaine treatises on hawking and hunting, delighting greatly herself in those exercises and pastimes. She wrote, also, a book of the lawes of armes and knowledge appertaining to heraldes."

Lived in the 15th century.

BERNESTADT, bairn-stat, a Prussian town, province of Silesia, 24 miles E.N.E. of Breslau, on the right bank of the Wida. There is an old castle, and the town is surrounded by walls. Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. Pop. 3,709.

BERNIA, or BERNI, FRANCIS, bair'-ne-a, an Italian poet and canon of Florence, who is famous for his witty burlesque and satirical pieces, and has given his name to that class of writing in Italy. He was attached to Alessandro and Ippolito de Medici, who had quarrelled, and is supposed to have been poisoned by the former.

Born, 1490, in Bibbiena; died at Florence, 1536.

BERNIER, FRANCIS, bair'-ne-ai, a French traveller and physician, a native of Anjou, whose account of his travels was much appreciated, as he visited countries before unknown to Europeans, and threw considerable light on the state of India up to the time of Aurungzebe, at whose court he resided twelve years, during eight of which he held the appointment of physician to the emperor. He was a favourite of the emir Danichmand, who took him to Cashmere; and on his return to France, Bernier published his travels and philosophical works.

Died at Paris, 1688.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, bair-ne'-ne, GIOVANNI LORENZO, a Florentine sculptor and architect, exercised his profession chiefly at Rome, where he produced his most famous works; amongst which may be mentioned "the Confession of St. Peter," the Barberini Palace, and the front of the College de Propaganda Fide. He executed also three busts of Charles I. of England from a picture by Vandyke, on viewing which he is said to have observed, that it was the most unfortunate face he ever beheld. At the age of 68 he visited Paris, at the pressing invitation of Louis XIV., and his progress to that city was one continuous ovation. He was received by Louis as a man whose presence honoured France; but when he saw the front of the Louvre, then being erected under Claude Perrault, Bernini said "that a country which had architects of that stamp had no need of him." While at Paris he executed a bust of Louis XIV., and on his return to Rome an equestrian statue of the same monarch, which was placed at Versailles. At 80 years of age he executed a statue of Christ, and presented it to Queen Christina of Sweden, who, however, declined it, saying she was not rich enough to pay for it as it deserved; he, however, bequeathed it to her by his will. Bernini was also a painter, and left about 150 pictures. He accumulated an enormous fortune.

Born at Naples, 1598; died at Rome, 1680.

BERNIS, FRANÇOIS JOACHIM DE PIERRES DE, bair'-ne, a French cardinal and archbishop of Albi, who was indebted to the marchioness of Pompadour for his preferments in church and state. After having been employed as ambassador to different courts, he was made minister of foreign affairs, and obtained a cardinal's hat. But the ill success of the French arms, and the derangement of the finances, occasioned his disgrace and temporary banishment from court. In 1764 he was recalled, and nominated archbishop of Albi. He was afterwards appointed ambassador to the Pope, and had a considerable share in procuring the banishment of the Jesuits. He had the additional title of protector of the French Church at Rome, where he lived in splendour and hospitality till the Revolution reduced him to poverty, on which he obtained a pension from the court of Spain. He wrote some works, consisting principally of poems.

Born at St. Marcel, 1715; died at Rome, 1794.

BERNOUILLI, JAMES, bair'-noo-eel'-e, a famous mathematician, who was destined for the Reformed church, but whose inclination led him to the study of mathematics, which he pursued privately and without any assistance but from books. In 1676 he set out on his travels, and at Geneva devised a method of teaching a blind girl to write. He wrote a treatise on the comet, which appeared in 1680, and soon after went to Holland, where he studied the new philosophy. He returned to Bâle in 1682, and read lectures on experimental philosophy and mechanics. About 1684, Leibnitz published, in the "Acta Eruditorum" at Leipsic, some essays on his new "calculus differentialis," but without disclosing the method. Bernouilli, however, and his brother, discovered the secret, and were highly praised by Leibnitz. A posthumous work, "De Arte Conjectandi," inquired into the possibility of extending the doctrine of probabilities to moral, political, and economical subjects.

Born at Bâle, 1654; died 1705.

BERNOUILLI, JOHN, brother to the above, whose labours in the sciences he shared, was in 1695 appointed professor of mathematics at Groningen, and on the death of James he returned to Bâle, where he succeeded him in the professorship of mathematics. In 1714 he published a treatise on the management of ships; and in 1730 his memoir on the elliptical figure of the planets gained the prize of the Academy of Sciences. His three sons, Nicholas, Daniel, and John, his nephew, and two grandsons, were also highly distinguished mathematicians.

Born at Bâle, 1667; died 1748.

BERNSTEIN, GEORGE HEINE, bairn'-stine, German Oriental scholar, professor in the university of Breslau, best known for his lexicon of the Syrian language.

Born near Jena, 1787; died 1860.

BERNSTORFF, JOHANN HARTWIG ERNST, Count of, bairn'-storf, a celebrated Danish statesman, who in 1750 became prime minister of Denmark, under Frederick V., in which office he distinguished himself as the patron of manufactures, commerce, and art. Under Christian VII. he was created a count, but was deprived of the offices he held at the instigation of Struensée; at whose death, however, he was reinstated. He emancipated the peasants on his estates, who in gratitude raised a monument to his memory.

Born at Hanover, 1712; died at Copenhagen, 1772.

BERNSTORFF, ANDREAS PETER, Count of, nephew of the preceding, was educated at Leipsic and Gottingen, and after travelling through Europe, became gentleman of the chamber to the king of Denmark. He was created count in 1767, and in 1769 was appointed prime minister, when he ceded to Russia the Gottorp part of Holstein for Oldenburg and Delmenhorst. He introduced a new system of finance and prepared the abolition of villanage in Schleswig and Holstein; he was also warmly opposed to any restriction of the liberty of the press, and his death was considered a public calamity.

Born at Hanover, 1735; died 1797.

BEROSUS, be-rō'-sus, Chaldean priest and historian, who translated the history of his native country, Babylonia, into the Greek language. He professes to relate the history of the world from the Creation down to his own time, and he makes that period to extend over more than half a million of years.

Lived in the 3rd or 4th century B.C.

BERRI, CHARLES FERDINAND, DUC DE, bair'-ré, younger son of Charles X. of France. Being compelled to leave France when very young, he served in the Russian army, and afterwards resided for several years in England, where he married an English lady, but the marriage was set aside on his return to France, in 1814, and two years afterwards he married the Princess Caroline of Naples. He was assassinated as he was leaving the opera-house by a man named Louvel.

Born at Versailles, 1778; died 1820.

BERRI, CAROLINE FERDINANDE LOUISE, Duchesse de, was the daughter of Ferdinand I., king of Naples and Sicily, and was married to the duke of Berry, the second son of Charles X. (See above.) Seven months after his death she gave birth to a son, who received the title of Duke of Bordeaux. He is also known as the Count de Chambord, and claims to be Henry V., legitimate king of France. The duchess passed through a variety of troubles, and in 1830, after the French revolution, accompanied Charles X. to Holyrood Palace, in Edinburgh. In 1832 a movement in La Vendée took place in her favour. She was under hiding in Nantes, when, being betrayed by a converted Jew, she was found in a small hole behind a stove, where she had been enclosed for sixteen hours, and was carried to the castle of Blaye. In 1833 she was released, having remarried a son of the prince of Lucchesi-Palli, with whom she retired to Sicily.

Born at Naples, 1798; died 1870.

BERRYER, PIERRE ANTOINE, bair'-re-ai, a distinguished French advocate and pleader, who, in 1815, assisted in the defence of the generals who followed Napoleon I. to Waterloo. From that period he rose to great eminence as a defender of order and an asserter of the liberties of his country. He unsuccessfully defended Louis Napoleon on his trial for landing at Boulogne, and in 1858 was engaged for the defence of the count de Montalembert, when that nobleman was proceeded against by the French government for certain alleged libellous expressions contained in his celebrated article in the "Correspondent" newspaper, "A Debate in the English Parliament on India." Berryer was a supporter of the claim of the Duke of Bordeaux to the throne, and was an active member of the National Assembly convoked after the revolution of 1848, but lost his seat in consequence of a vigorous protest against the coup d'état of 1851. He was elected a member of the French Academy in 1854; and, being on a visit to this country in 1865, the benchers of the Temple and of Lincoln's Inn gave a banquet in his honour.

Born at Paris, 1790; died at Angerville, 1868.

BERTAUT, JOHN, bair'-to, a French bishop and poet, whose first essays charmed the court of Henry III. He was mainly instrumental, with the cardinal of Penon, in the conversion of Henry IV., who gave him the rich abbey of Aumay, and he was named chief chaplain to Marie de Medici on her marriage with the French monarch. In 1606 he was made bishop of Séez. His poems were printed at Paris in 1620; and besides these he wrote several theological pieces.

Born at Caen, 1570; died 1611.

BERTHA, ST., ber'-tha, daughter of Charibert, king of the Franks. She married Ethelbert, king of Kent, and became the medium of the conversion of many Anglo-Saxons.

Lived in the 6th century

BERTHIER, ALEXANDER, bair'-te-ai, one of the marshals of Napoleon I., prince of Neufchatel and Wagram, and vice-constable of France. He first served in the American War of Independence, under Lafayette, and at the commencement of the French revolution was made a general. He behaved with great bravery in La Vendée, and was at the head of Napoleon's staff in Italy, Egypt, and Germany. In 1814 he submitted to the new régime and was created a peer; but when the emperor escaped from Elba, he retired to his family seat at Bamberg, where he shortly afterwards committed suicide by throwing himself from the third story of his palace.

Born at Versailles, 1753; died 1815.

BERTHOLLET, CLAUD LOUIS, bair'-tol-ai, one of the most eminent chemists of his day, who, with Lavoisier, Fourcroy, and Guyton de Morveau, planned a new chemical nomenclature, which, with all its drawbacks, was found of essential service to chemical science. He was successively superintendent of the government establishment for the improvement of dyeing, director of the Mint, and teacher of chemistry in the Polytechnic and Normal schools of Paris. He accompanied Napoleon I. in his Egyptian expedition; and on his return became a senator and an officer of the Legion of Honour. On the fall of the emperor, however, he was among the first to desert him; and Louis XVIII. conferred on him the title of count. He wrote a great number of memoirs and other scientific essays.

Born at Talloire, in Savoy, 1748; died at Paris, 1822.

BERTHOLSDORF, bairt'-ols-dorf, a market-town of Austria. It has an ancient church with a curious subterranean chapel, and the ruins of an old castle. Pop. 2,300.

BERTHOUD, FERDINAND, bair-too', Swiss chronometer maker, author of several works on the construction of chronometers, the means of ascertaining the longitude, and other professional subjects. He was a member of the French Institute, fellow of the Royal Society of London, and member of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Neufchâtel, about 1725; died at Montmorency, 1807.

BERTIE, ber'-te, a county of North Carolina, U.S., on the Roanoke, at its enfrance into Albemarle Sound. Area, 680 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing cotton and tobacco in abundance. Pop. 13,000.

BERTINORO, bair-te-nō'-ro, a city of Italy, in the province of Emilia, on the river Ronco. It is the seat of a bishopric. The wines of the neighbourhood are of great repute. Pop. 6,600.

BERTRAM, or BERTRAND DE BERN, ber'-tram, Comte de Hauteford, a warlike troubadour, who supported Prince Richard (afterwards Richard I. of England) in the war against his father. He was a vigorous poet, with a strong tendency to support the winning side. He ended his days as a monk. Dante, in the "Divine Comedy," places Bertram in the lowest pit of hell, because he incited a son to war against his father.

Lived at the end of the 12th century.

BERULLE, PIERRE DU, bair'-rule, French cardinal, founder of the congregation of the Oratory, an l engaged in many important negotiations. He was made a cardinal in 1627. He died suddenly, not without suspicion of poison.

Born in Champagne, 1575; died 1629.

BERVIE, ber'-ee, a royal borough of Scotland in Kincardineshire, 22 miles S.S.W. of Aberdeen. The church is a fine building in the Gothic style. Manf. Flax-spinning. The seaport, Gourden, is about a mile distant, and a good shipping trade, chiefly in grain, is carried on. Pop. 1,100.

BERWICKSHIRE, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by the county of Haddington, E. by the German Ocean, W. by Mid-Lothian, and S. by Roxburghshire and the river Tweed. Area, 446 square miles. Desc. The county is popularly divided into three districts, having marked characteristics, Lauderdale, or the valley of the Leader; Lammermuir, an upland district, so named from the hills which occupy it, with an average elevation of more than 1,000 feet; and the Merse, a comparatively level district, stretching to the south and east of the Lammermuir range. The coast line is rocky, and precipitous. The country is in general bare of wood, although planting has been carried on to a considerable extent, and the hilly tracts have been converted into extensive sheep pastures. Agriculture in all its branches is also pursued to great perfection. Rivers. The Tweed and its affluents, the Blackadder and the Whiteadder; the Eye, the Eden, and the Leader. Minerals. None of importance. Manf. Inconsiderable. The only harbour, properly so called, is at Eyemouth. Towns. DUNSE, GREENLAW, LAUDER, EYEMOUTH, and COLDSTREAM. Pop. 35,383.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, ber'-rik, on the north side of the Tweed, near its mouth, formerly a town and county in itself, independent of England and Scotland, but since the Municipal Reform Act included in England for all purposes except parliamentary elections; a seaport and municipal and parliamentary borough, and includes the townships of Tweedmouth and Spittal, connected by a bridge of fifteen arches. It is 47 miles E.S.E. of Edinburgh. The town-hall is a handsome structure, with a stately spire, 150 feet high, containing a peal of eight bells. The barracks, with the store-house, form a handsome square; and, besides the church, renovated in 1855, which is a spacious building, without a spire, there are several other places of worship for Presbyterians. The corn-exchange, opened in 1858, the jail, infirmary, and masonic hall, are handsome public buildings. There are large cemeteries at Berwick and Tweedmouth. The town is surrounded with walls. The amparts were built in the time of Elizabeth, and there are remains of older walls, built by Edward I. Its chief trade consists in exporting corn, pork, herrings, metal castings, and manures. The fisheries are important; and it has sail-cloth, cordage, and linen manufactories. It has a long pier, which was begun in 1811, and which shelters a harbour, and stretches a long way into the sea. The harbour is protected by batteries. A new dock has been constructed at Tweedmouth. The river is crossed, a quarter of a mile above the old bridge, by a magnificent railway viaduct, 126 feet high, with 28 arches. It was opened by Queen Victoria, in 1850. Pop., including townships, 13,995. Lat. 55° 46′ N. Lon. 1° 59′ W. A station on the North-Eastern and North British Railways.—This town was long the theatre of many sanguinary combats between the English and Scotch before it was finally ceded to England in 1502.

BERWICK, NORTH, a seaport-town of Haddingtonshire, Scotland, situated on the coast of the Frith of Forth, 20 miles from Edinburgh. It has a harbour and a small trade in corn. Pop. of parish, 1,643; of borough, 863.—In this parish are Tantallon Castle, the Bass Rock, and North-Berwick Law, which last is a conical hill, nearly 1,000 feet above the level of the sea.—A station on the North British Railway.

BERWICK, JAMES FITZJAMES, Duke of, French marshal. He was a natural son of the Duke of York, afterwards James II. of England, and Arabella Churchill, sister of the great Duke of Marlborough. He was educated in France, and saw military service in Hungary. In 1687 he returned to England, and was made Knight of the Garter and Duke of Berwick. He served under James II. in Ireland, where he was for a time commander-in-chief. In 1692 he went to France, where, during the remainder of his life, he highly distinguished himself by his military abilities and high character. He was killed at the siege of Philipsburg, on the Rhine.

Born at Moulins, 1670; died 1734.

BERZELIUS, JONS JAKOB, ber-zé'-le-us, a distinguished Swedish chemist, whose powers as an analyst were of the first order. He rose to the highest honours of his native country, and, in 1836, the Royal Society of London awarded him the Copley medal. He was professor of physics in the university of Stockholm, president of the Swedish Academy of Sciences, and a member of almost all the learned societies in the world; and at his death the members of the scientific societies of his native country wore mourning for two months out of respect for his memory.

Born at Wafversunda, East Gothland, 1779; died at Stockholm, 1848.

BESANCON, bai-sang'-sawng, a city of France, capital of the department of Doubs, on the river Doubs, 45 miles E. of Dijon. It was fortified by Louis XIV.; and, besides a library of 30,000 volumes, it has a museum, a Gothic cathedral, court-house, royal college, a barracks, an arsenal, and an hospital. It has also an academy of painting and sculpture, which was founded in 1773. Manf. Druggets, carpets, watches, jewellery, porcelain, stained paper, artificial flowers, ironmongery, coach-springs, and leather. It has also a trade in corn, wine, cattle, and iron goods. Pop. 57,067.—This is an ancient town, having been in existence in the time of the Romans, and some of its streets still have Roman names, and there are remains of a triumphal arch, theatre, and amphitheatre. It was taken twice by Louis XIV., and was in 1678 united to France. In 1814 it was bombarded by the allies.

BIRCH, THOMAS, birch, an English divine, who was indefatigable in literary pursuits, and has left many valuable historical and biographical works. He was designed by his parents, who were Quakers, for business; but, at his earnest desire, was permitted to indulge his taste for literature. In 1728 he was ordained in the established church, and was introduced to Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, to whom he principally owed his advancement. He was a fellow and secretary of the Royal Society, and a trustee of the British Museum, to which institution he bequeathed his library and MSS., and £500 towards increasing the stipends of the three assistant librarians. In 1753 he received the degree of D.D. His principal work was "The General Dictionary, Historical and Critical," in 10 volumes, which included a translation of Bayle's; and, besides this, he wrote several biographical and historical works.

Born in London, 1705; died from a fall from his horse, 1766.

BIRDE, WILLIAM, bird, an English musician, who was attached to the chapel royal of Edward VI.; and, in the reign of Elizabeth, was organist of the queen's chapel. His compositions are numerous and excellent, he being one of the principal contributors to Queen Elizabeth's "Virginal Book," and the celebrated canon, "Non Nobis Domine" is also generally ascribed to him.

Born 1540; died 1623.

BIREN, ERNEST JOHN DE, bé-rĕ, duke of Courland, was descended from a mean family in that country, and repaired in 1714 to St. Petersburg, where he ingratiated himself into the good graces of Anna, duchess dowager of Courland, who made him her favourite; and, when she became empress of Russia, intrusted to him the administration of the kingdom. His conduct was arbitrary and cruel. Several noble families were reduced to ruin, and more than 20,000 persons were exiled by him to Siberia. In 1737 the empress compelled the nobles to choose him duke of Courland, where he governed in the like despotic manner. On the death of the empress he assumed the regency, by virtue of her will; but in 1740 a conspiracy was formed against him by Marshal Munich, and he was condemned to death, which sentence was changed to banishment. Peter III. recalled him, and Catherine II. restored him to his former dignity. In 1763 Biren re-entered Mitau; and, profiting by the lessons of misfortune he had experienced, governed for the remainder of his life with mildness and justice. (See ANNA IVANOVNA.)

Born 1690; died 1772.

In 1236 he saved Lubeck, which was besieged by the Danes, and subsequently brought over to Christianity the inhabitants of Finland, whose incursions had desolated Sweden. At the death of Eric IX., he was named regent, and governed well and wisely till his death. It was he who founded the city of Stockholm.

Born 1210; died 1266.

BIRINGOCCIO or BIRINGUCCI, VANNUCCIO, bé-reen-gotch'-o-o, an Italian mathematician, who was the first of his countrymen who wrote on the art of casting cannon, making gunpowder, and fireworks. His work entitled "Pyrotechnia, was printed at Venice, in 1540, 4to.

Lived in the first half of the 16th century.

BIRKBECK, GEORGE, M.D., birk'-bek, one of the greatest friends of the working classes of England, and an active promoter of every professional or scientific pursuit which had for its aim public utility. In 1792 he became a lecturer on natural and experimental philosophy in the Andersonian Institution of Glasgow. In 1804 he relinquished his professorship and went to London, where he settled and rapidly rose into eminence as a physician. He was the originator of the mechanics' institutions, and in 1823 presided at a meeting which had for its object the founding of the "London Mechanics' Institution." On the 15th December of the same year he was elected president of that institution, an office which he held to the time of his death.

Born at Settle, in Yorkshire, 1776; died in London, 1841.

BIRKENFELD, beer'-ken-felt, a principality of West Germany, belonging to Oldenburg, and inclosed by Rhenish Prussia and Meissenheim. Area, 143 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and well wooded, and watered by the Nahe, one of the tributaries of the Rhine. Pro. Cattle, hemp, flax, and oil-seeds. Minerals. Coal and iron. Pop. 31,000.—This province was ceded to Oldenburg by the treaty of Vienna, in 1815; and its capital has the same name.

BIRKENHEAD, bir'-ken-hed, a seaport, market town, municipal and parliamentary borough of Cheshire, on the left bank of the Mersey, opposite Liverpool. The rapid progress of this town is very extraordinary. In 1821 it was merely a little fishing village with only 200 inhabitants, now it is one of the most important and thriving towns in England. About 1835 it began to rise in importance as a suburb of Liverpool, and since then its development has been remarkable. In 1844 the foundation of new docks was laid, and the first dock was opened in April, 1847. In 1857 the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was established by Act of Parliament, and now the docks have an area of 170 acres, and a lineal quay space of nearly 10 miles. The chief docks are the Great Float (150 acres), communicating with smaller docks; the Morpeth Dock (11 acres, with a smaller dock), and there are three large graving docks. The largest steamers afloat can be received. The warehouses are immense piles of buildings, with canals between to give access to the separate blocks. There are in the town nine or ten churches, the oldest being St. Mary's, in the Decorated Gothic style, and the churchyard, including the burial-ground and ruins of an ancient priory, founded in the 12th century. There are 24 other places of worship, some being handsome buildings; a large market-hall, built at a cost of £35,000, and opened in 1845; public slaughter-houses (the first of large size opened in England), erected in 1846; a town-hall, school of art, free library, and industrial schools, built as a memorial of the Prince Consort. Birkenhead park, 190 acres, was opened in 1847, cost £140,000; and the cemetery, 20 acres, cost about £40,000. Being so new a town, it is regularly laid out, and the houses are generally large and handsome. The first street tramway in this country was laid down in Birkenhead. The principal communication with Liverpool is by large steamers, forming what is known as Woodside Ferry, used by about nine millions of passengers annually. The landing-stage is 800 feet long, and there is a floating bridge 670 feet long and 30 feet wide for the convenience of the traffic. Manf. Iron foundries, machinery, and iron-bridge work, on the most extensive scale. Some of the largest iron-plated ships in the world have been built at Birkenhead. Coal, guano, and grain are the principal articles of export. The population in 1871 was 65,971. In 1881 it had increased to 83,324, or at the rate of nearly two thousand per annum. Parliamentary borough in 1861; municipal in 1877. A station on the Great Western and London and North-Western Railways.

BIRKENHEAD, SIR JOHN, a political writer, who, in the civil war, conducted, in favour of the court, a periodical work, called "Mercurius Aulicus," and also wrote a number of pamphlets against the parliamentarians, when these were in power, for which he was several times imprisoned.

At the Restoration he was knighted and made master of requests; and was a member of the Royal Society.

Born at Northwich, Cheshire, 1615; died at Westminster, 1679.

BIRMAN EMPIRE. (See BURMAH.)

BIRMINGHAM, bir'-ming-ham, a parliamentary borough in Warwickshire, but with suburbs extending into Staffordshire and Worcestershire. It stands by a small stream, the Rea, and embraces within its boundaries the neighbouring parishes of Aston and Edgbaston. Birmingham is the centre of the hardware manufactures of England, and is one of the greatest industrial towns in the world. With its suburbs, it is nearly six miles long and three miles wide, and has 190 miles of streets and roads. The town is irregularly built, on an undulating site. Near the centre is an open space, the Bullring, in which are the parish church, St. Martin's, rebuilt in 1873; St. Philip's, built by a pupil of Wren, St. Bartholomew's, St. Mary's, St. Paul's, and St. James's, Ashted, were erected in the last century. There are a cathedral, St. Chad's, and several chapels for the Roman Catholics; a great many places of worship for almost every denomination. King Edward VI.'s Free Grammar-school was founded in 1552, and rebuilt in 1835 from designs by Barry. The Queen's College was incorporated by royal charter in 1843; medicine and theology are now the only subjects studied. Sir Joseph Mason's Scientific College was begun in 1875, at a cost to the donor of £40,000, and endowed with property valued at £100,000. There is a college at Moseley for the training of congregational ministers. The town possesses two large hospitals and a dispensary for the relief of indigent sick persons at their own residences. The Town-hall, where assemblies and public meetings are held, is one of the most magnificent structures in the town. It is in the finest style of Greek architecture, modelled upon a Greek temple, and was erected in 1850, at a cost of £52,000, and is capable of accommodating 5,000 persons standing or 2,300 seated. Its organ is one of the finest in the kingdom, and the triennial musical festivals, which are held in this building, are unsurpassed throughout the country. Near the Town-hall are the spacious buildings of the Midland Institute and Free Libraries. The new Corporate Buildings, in the Italian style, were commenced in 1875; the cost will be nearly £200,000. The Market-hall, in High Street, is a fine building in the classic style, erected in 1833, having cost £70,000. The other most noticeable edifices are the Central Railway Station, 1,100 feet long, 80 feet high, and covered with an arched roof of glass and iron 212 feet wide in a single span; the Gothic Exchange (opened in 1865), the Post-office, and the Art Gallery. There are two theatres and several music-halls. There are statues of James Watt, Sir Robert Peel, Dr. Priestly, Joseph Sturge, and Thomas Attwood; of the late Prince Consort, in the Art Gallery, and of Sir Rowland Hill, in the Post-office. The Corporation of Birmingham possesses five parks and pleasure-grounds—Aston Park (opened by the Queen in 1858), Calthorp, Cannon Hill, Adderley, and Highgate Parks. Edgbaston is the residence of the wealthier classes.

Railways.—A station on the London and North-Western, Great Western, and Midland railways.

Manf.—Brass work of all kinds, especially ornaments; jewellery, firearms; steel pens (of which about 20,000,000 are made weekly), buttons, pins, screws, nails, cutlery, tools, papier-maché articles, steel toys and ornaments, wire, glass (especially table-glass), ornamental iron castings, and innumerable articles which it would be impossible to specify. Steam engines and locomotives are made at Soho, where James Watt and Boulton established their famous factory, and railway carriage building is a very important industry.

Pop. 400,757, according to the census of 1881, increasing at the rate of nearly 6,000 a year.

History.—The origin of the name is uncertain; in ancient records it is spelt about 100 different ways. The town was besieged and taken by Prince Rupert in 1643; the button manufacture established in 1689; Soho works established, 1764; made a Parliamentary borough, 1832; incorporated, 1843.

BIRNEE, OLD AND NEW, bir'-nee, two towns of Bornu, Central Africa. The old town is about 70 miles N. of Lake Tsad, and is very large. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 13° 15' E.

BIRON, ARMAND DE GONTAULT, baron de, be-rawng', a celebrated French general. He displayed great courage and prudence in the civil war, being present with the Catholic army at the battles of Dreux, St. Denis, and Moncontour, although he secretly favoured the Huguenot party, and saved several of his friends in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572. In 1577 he was made a marshal of France, and was dispatched by Henry III. to the Low Countries to succour the duke of Alençon, but was defeated by the duke of Parma. On the death of Henry III. he was one of the first to recognize Henry IV., and rendered great services to that prince at the battle of Arques and the attack on Paris. He was killed at the siege of Epernay.

Born in Périgord, 1524; died 1592.

BIRON, CHARLES DE GONTAULT, duc de, son of the above, was admiral and marshal of France, and is noted for the friendship which Henry IV. entertained for him, and for his treason towards that monarch. He made his first essays in war under his father, and covered himself with glory at the battles of Arques and Ivry, and at the sieges of Paris and Rouen. The king loaded him with honours, and saved his life at the fight of Fontaine Française, and sent him ambassador to England. Notwithstanding, however, all these favours, Biron entered into a conspiracy with Spain and Savoy against his sovereign; and the plot being revealed by Lafin, who had been its instigator, he was beheaded.

Born 1562; died 1602.

BIRR, bir, formerly called PARSON'S TOWN, a town in King's County, Ireland, 34 miles from Limerick. Pop. 5,400.—Here the earl of Rosse erected his magnificent telescope for the study of astronomy.

BIRU, or BEROO, be-roo', a kingdom of the Soudan, Western Africa, to the south of the Sahara and east of the Niger river. The limits are not clearly defined. The chief town is Walet.

BISCAY, or VIZCAYA, bis'-kai, one of the three Basque provinces, inclosed by the Bay of Biscay, Old Castile, Alava, and Guipuscoa. Area, 1,200 miles. Biscay being an ancient designation, is no longer officially recognized.

BISCAY, BAY OF, named by the French Golfe de Gascogne, that part of the Atlantic Ocean which lies between the island of Ushant in France and Cape Ortegal in Spain, having the Spanish province of Biscay to the south. It washes the whole west coast of France and the north coast of Spain. It receives the waters of the Adour, Charente, Gironde, and Loire, and contains the islands Belleisle, Ré, and Oleron, on the coast of France. The depth varies from 20 fathoms on the W. of France, to 200 on the N. of Spain.

BISCEGLIA, be-sai'-le-a, an Italian seaport, in the province of Terra di Bari, on a rocky promontory of the Adriatic, with a small harbour.

There are a cathedral, several churches and convents, and the ruins of a hospital founded for the relief of pilgrims going to the Holy Land. Pop. 21,765.

BISCHWEILER, bish'-vail-er, a town of Alsace, 14 miles N. of Strasburg. Manf. Woollen and linen stuffs, oil, soap, and earthenware. Pop. 9,300.

BISHNUPUR, bish-noo-poor, a town in British India, district of Banhura. Pop. 18,000.

BISHOP, SIR HENRY ROWLEY, bish'-op, one of the best of English musical composers, who received his musical tuition under Signor Bianchi; and in the course of nearly twenty years, during which he was connected with Drury Lane or Covent Garden theatres, produced upwards of seventy operas, ballets, and musical entertainments. Many of his songs and glees are the most beautiful effusions in English melody, and by their qualities of animation, grace, and pathos, will yet long continue to charm the ear. He was one of the directors of the Philharmonic Society, Reid professor of music at Edinburgh; was knighted in 1842, being the first musician so honoured; and in 1848 was elected professor of music at Oxford University. Among his best works are "Guy Mannering," "The Slave," "The Virgin of the Sun," the "Miller and his Men," and "Maid Marian." He died in poverty.

Born in London, 1786; died 1855.

BISHOP AUCKLAND, a market-town in Durham, 11 miles S.W. of the city of Durham. It is beautifully situated near the confluence of the Wear and the Gaunless. The town-hall has a tower 100 feet high. The parish church is a mile distant, but there are several churches and chapels in the town. The episcopal palace of the bishop of Durham is a spacious edifice, surrounded by a large park. Manf. Cotton and machinery. Pop. 10,087 A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

BISHOP-STORTFORD, stor'-ford, a market-town in Hertfordshire, on the river Stort, 11 miles E.N.E. of Hertford. A navigable canal, completed in 1769, joins the river Lea, and allows communication with the metropolis by water. The town is built on the side of a hill, and consists of four principal streets in the form of a cross. The church, St. Michael's, is a fine building, was first erected in the 16th century, but was partly rebuilt in 1820, and there are other churches. There are a town-house, a collegiate school, high school, and a diocesan training school. The vestiges of a castle, built by William the Conqueror, on an artificial mount, are to be seen here. Pop. 6,250.

BISHOP-WEARMOUTH, weer'-mouth, a parish of Durham, united by an iron bridge over the Wear to the town of Sunderland. (See SUNDERLAND.)

BISIGNANO, bee-se-nia'-no, an Italian town, province of Cosenza, 15 miles N. of Cosenza. There are a cathedral and a castle. A trade in silk is carried on. Pop. 4,100.

BISKARA, bisk'-a-ra, a town of Algeria, in the province of Constantine. It is an important military position and station on the caravan route. Carpets and bournous are manufactured. Pop. 7,400.

BISMARCK-SCHONHAUSEN, OTTO EDWARD LEOPOLD, prince, bis'-mark-shoehn-how-sen, minister-president of Prussia and chancellor of the German empire. Studied law in the universities of Gottingen and Berlin. He first attracted attention as deputy at the meeting of the United Diets in 1847. In the troubled times of 1848 he was often consulted by the king of Prussia, and thenceforth his rise was rapid. He was one of the parliamentary leaders of the Conservative party. Having been ambassador to Vienna and Paris, and occupied other distinguished positions, he was appointed in 1862 premier and foreign minister, and shortly afterwards made his famous declaration—"The great questions of the day are not to be decided by speeches and majorities, but by iron and blood." From that time he was the leading spirit of Prussia. In 1865 he was raised to the rank of count; and after the Austro-Prussian war had the title of prince conferred on him.

Born at Schönhausen, 1815.

BISSAGOS, bees-sa'-goes, a group of volcanic islands, about 20 in number, with numerous islets, lying off the western coast of Africa, between the Gambia and Sierra Leone, near the mouth of the Rio Grande.

BISSAO, bees'-sa-o', one of the largest islands in the archipelago of the Bissagos. Ext. 40 miles long by 30 wide. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 11° 24′ N. Lon. 14° 10′ W. It is the centre of the Portuguese slave-trade, and all the white inhabitants upon it are engaged in the odious traffic. There is also a trade in hides, wax, and rice.

BISTRITZ, bees'-treetz, a town of Transylvania, the capital of a district, and a small river of the same name, 30 miles from Szamasujvar. Manf. Cloth, leather, cordage, potash, and soap. Pop. 3,500.

BITBURG, bit'-burg, a Prussian town, capital of a circle of the same name, 18 miles N.N.W. of Treves. Manf. Cloth and leather. Pop. 2,300.

BLACK, JOSEPH, blak, an eminent chemist. He was educated first at Belfast, and then at the University of Glasgow. In 1765 he succeeded Dr. Cullen in the chemical chair at Edinburgh. He was the author of several chemical works, and was the discoverer of carbonic acid gas, and a theory of latent heat, on which subject he issued a pamphlet; but his researches principally appeared in the "Philosophical Transactions of London," and in the "Memoirs of the Royal Society of Edinburgh." James Watt, the inventor of the steam-engine, was greatly indebted to the knowledge of Dr. Black.
Born at Bordeaux, of Scotch parents, 1728; died at Edinburgh, 1799.

BLACKBURN, blak'-burn, a market-town and municipal and parliamentary borough of Lancashire, 30 miles N.N.W. of Manchester. The town, which is irregularly built, contains many places of worship, among them the parish church, a fine building in the florid Gothic style; a free grammar-school, a large town-hall, market-house, exchange, cloth-hall, several banks, lying-in hospital, a horticultural society, an assembly-room, and a theatre. A public park was opened in 1857. Blackburn is a place of considerable commercial importance. Manf. Extensive, principally cotton goods; there are also iron foundries, engineering works and breweries, and coal is abundant in the neighbourhood. Pop. 104,012. A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

BLACKHEATH, blak-heeth', an open and elevated common at the N.W. extremity of Kent, near Greenwich. In the vicinity is Morden College, a hospital erected by Sir John Morden, in 1695, for the reception of decayed merchants. Many fine villas stand on the heath, which is crossed by the Roman Watling-street, and which has been the scene of some remarkable events in history. A station on the North Kent Railway.

BLACKLOCK, THOMAS, blak'-lok, a Scotch divine and poet, who was the son of a mason, and lost his sight by the small-pox in his infancy. In 1740 he was deprived of his father; and Dr. Stephenson, a physician of Edinburgh, then placed him at the university. In 1762 the earl of Selkirk procured for him a presentation to the church of Kirkcudbright; but the appointment was violently opposed by the congregation, on account of his blindness and the too great elevation and refinement of his preaching. After two years' litigation, he resigned, and retired to Edinburgh on a small annuity. His poems were published in 1754.
Born at Annan, 1721; died at Edinburgh, 1791.

BLACKMORE, SIR RICHARD, blak'-mor, a court physician to William III. and Anne, who persisted in writing long epic poems, remarkable for dulness, though admired at the time. He also wrote treatises on theology and medicine.
Died 1729.

BLACKPOOL, blak'-pool, a favourite watering-place on the coast of Lancashire, between the estuaries of the Ribble and the Wyre. There are three piers. About 100,000 persons visit the town annually. Pop., permanent, 14,448.

BLACKROCK, blak'-rok, a town in Ireland, 4 miles S.E. of Dublin. A favourite bathing place and suburban retreat. Pop. 2,920.

BLACK SEA, or EUXINE, the Pontus Euxinus of the ancients, a large inland sea, bounded on the west by Turkey, on the north by the southern provinces of Russia; on the east by Circassia and Transcaucasia, and on the south by Asia Minor. The greatest length from east to west is about 720 miles; the greatest breadth from north to south 380 miles. Area, 158,000 square miles. It is estimated that this large sea receives the drainage of 825,000 square miles in Europe, and 114,000 in Asia. It communicates with the Sea of Marmora, and also with the Mediterranean by the narrow channel of the Bosphorus. The sea receives the water of more than forty rivers; among which are the Danube, the Dniester, the Dnieper, the Bug, the Don, and the Kuban. It was anciently called Axenus, from Ashkenaz, the son of Gomer, who settled on its shores, in Asia Minor. But this origin being forgotten in course of time, the Greeks explained the term by axeinos, "inhospitalis," in which they were favoured by the inhospitable and stormy nature of the sea itself, as well as by the savage manners of the people who dwelt around it. In the course of time, however, when their ferocity had been gradually softened by intercourse with foreign nations, and by the numerous colonies which had been planted on their coasts, the name of the sea was changed to euxinos, "hospitalis." Its modern name, the Black Sea, has been obtained from the gloomy appearance of its black and rocky shores, covered with dark and impenetrable woods, as well as from the dreadful storms and thick fogs with which it is infested in winter. Lat. between 40° 45′ and 46° 45′ N. Lon. extending from 27° 30′ to 41° 50′ E.

BLACKSTONE, SIR WILLIAM, blak'-stone, a learned English judge, who, in 1738, was entered at Pembroke College, Oxford, and at the age of 20 composed a treatise on the elements of architecture. He also cultivated poetry, and obtained Mr. Benson's prize medal for the best verses on Milton. These pursuits, however, were abandoned for the study of the law, when he composed his well-known effusion, called "The Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse." In 1741 he was entered at the Middle Temple, and in 1744 chosen fellow of All-souls College. He held various high legal offices, and sat in Parliament for Hindon and Westbury. In 1770 he became one of the judges in the Court of King's Bench, whence he removed to the Common Pleas. He was the author of several legal works of great value, but his most famous work is the "Commentaries on the Laws of England."
Born in London, 1723; died 1780.

BLACKWALL, blak'-wawl, a suburb of London, on the N. side of the Thames, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Pop. 28,384.—Here are the East and West India docks and shipbuilding-yards.—A station on the North London and Outer Circle District railways.

BLACK WATER, two rivers in Ireland; one in the county of Cork, rising near Killarney, and falling into the sea at Youghal, and the other traversing the counties of Armagh and Tyrone, and falling into Lough Neagh.

BLACKWELL, ALEXANDER, blak-wel, son of the principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen, studied medicine at Leyden and took the degree of M.D. He afterwards set up as a printer in London, but becoming bankrupt, was imprisoned. His wife produced a splendid Herbal, with 500 illustrations, designed, engraved, and coloured by herself. This work attracted great attention, and her husband's release resulted. In 1740 he went to Stockholm as physician to the king, but was charged with being implicated in a conspiracy, and cruelly tortured and executed. He protested his innocence to the last.

Died 1749.

BLACKWELL'S ISLAND is in the East River, opposite New York, in the United States, and is the seat of the penitentiary and a lunatic asylum.

BLADEN, blai'-den, a county of North Carolina, United States. The chief products are Indian corn, potatoes, and rice. Elizabeth is the chief town. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 16,158.

BLAIR, ROBERT, blare, a Scotch poet, and the minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, Scotland. He is known to fame as being the author of "The Grave."

Born at Edinburgh, 1699; died 1747.

BLAIR, HUGH, an eminent Scottish divine, was the son of a merchant of Edinburgh, where he received his education. In 1739 he took the degree of M.A., and in 1741 was licensed to preach. The year following he was ordained to the parish of Collessie in Fife, and to the charge of the Canongate church at Edinburgh, where he officiated till 1758, when he was removed to the High Church, which was the most important ecclesiastical charge in Scotland. The university of St. Andrews conferred on him, in 1757, the degree of D.D., and in 1759 he began a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres, which were so much applauded, that in 1762 George III. endowed a professorship for him at Edinburgh, with a salary of 70*l.* a year. In 1763 he wrote a dissertation on the poems of Ossian, in which he urged many ingenious observations in behalf of their authenticity. In 1777 a volume of his sermons appeared, which attained so rapid a sale as to induce the author to publish another volume in 1779, which was as well received as the former; and these were subsequently followed by three volumes more. In 1780 he obtained a pension from the crown of 200*l.* a year, and three years afterwards he quitted his professorship through infirmities; but his salary was continued to him for life, and an addition of 100*l.* a year was made to his pension. At that time he published his lectures, which have had an immense circulation, and, as has been the case with his sermons, been translated into various languages.

Born at Edinburgh, 1718; died 1801.

BLAIR, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. The surface is very mountainous, and nearly half of the county is too rugged for cultivation. The iron mines are rich. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 52,740.

BLAIR, or PORT BLAIR, the chief place of the ANDAMAN ISLANDS, on the south-east shore of the South Island. There is an excellent harbour. Lat. 11° 42' N. Lon. 93° E. It was selected as a convict settlement, in 1789, by Lieutenant Blair.

BLAIRGOWRIE, blare-gow'-re, a town in Perthshire, Scotland. It is beautifully situated, and is a well-built, thriving town. Manf. Linen, and there are many spinning mills. Pop. 5,252.

BLAKE, ROBERT, blaik, one of England's most skilful and intrepid naval and military commanders, was the eldest son of a merchant, and educated at Oxford. In 1640 he represented Bridgewater in Parliament, and at the beginning of the civil war took part with the Parliamentarians, and served under Colonel Fiennes at Bristol, when that town was taken by Prince Rupert. He afterwards assisted in taking Taunton by surprise, and of this place he was made governor, and in 1645 defended it against Goring with such bravery for two successive sieges, that he was publicly thanked and rewarded by Parliament. In 1649 he was appointed commander of the fleet in conjunction with Dean and Popham; and soon afterwards sailed in search of Prince Rupert, whose fleet he blockaded in Kinsale harbour. The prince afterwards escaping to Lisbon, he was there followed by Blake, who demanded leave of the king of Portugal to attack him, and, being refused, he took several of the Portuguese ships coming home from Brazil laden with treasure. During his absence Prince Rupert made sail to the Mediterranean, whither he was followed by Blake, who attacked him in the harbour of Malaga, and destroyed nearly the whole of his fleet. After this he returned to England with several prizes, again receiving the thanks of Parliament, by whom he was also made warden of the Cinque Ports. Soon after this he reduced the Scilly Isles, Guernsey and Jersey, for which he was again thanked by the house and appointed one of the council of state. On the prospect of a war with the Dutch in 1652, he was appointed sole admiral of the fleet, and was attacked in the Downs by Van Tromp, who had forty-five sail, whilst Blake had only twenty-three. He fought, however, with such determination, that the Dutch admiral was glad to retreat. In the November following, Van Tromp sailed into the Downs, with above eighty men-of-war, and off the Goodwin Sands, on the 29th of that month, an obstinate battle was fought between him and Blake, who had only half his force, and who was compelled to run with his shattered ships into the Thames. It was on this occasion that Van Tromp passed through the English Channel with a broom at his maintop, signifying that he had swept the sea of the English ships. In February, 1653, Blake was enabled to put to sea with eighty men of war, and off Cape la Hogue fell in with the Dutch, who had an equal number and 300 merchantmen under convoy. A most bloody engagement ensued, which lasted three days, and in which the Dutch lost eleven men of war and thirty merchant vessels, whilst the English lost only one ship. In June following the fleets of the belligerent admirals fought again off the Foreland; and the Dutch sustaining a severe defeat barely saved themselves in the shallow waters of Calais. In 1654 Blake sailed into the Mediterranean, where he demolished the castle of Tunis because the dey refused to deliver up the English whom he held as captives. In 1656 a squadron of his ships, under the command of Captain Stayner, intercepted a Spanish Plate fleet, and took the admiral, vice-admiral, and two galleons. Blake having received information that another Plate fleet lay at Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe, sailed thither, and notwithstanding the strength of the place, boldly went in, burnt the ships, and came out with comparatively little loss, whilst the slaughter of the Spaniards was immense. For this he again received the thanks of Parliament, and was presented with a diamond ring worth 500*l.* He soon afterwards returned to his station at Cadiz, but his ill-health inspired him with a strong desire to return to England; and accordingly he set sail for his native land, but died as his ship was entering Plymouth harbour. His body was interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster Abbey, whence it was removed at the Restoration, and buried in St. Margaret's churchyard.
